Not many days afterward Mr. and Miss Waldron found themselves at the entrance of a college, where the young ministers of their denomination were in training for the future discharge of the duties belonging to their office. It was a large modern building in the suburbs of a busy manufacturing town, the distant hum of which blended with the quiet of a place of study. Of course it possessed none of the venerable associations of ancient colleges; but there was a sober air of respectability and steady work about it, not altogether unlike the factories of the neighboring town.

Miss Waldron appeared to be in her proper element — to breathe her native air. No romance clustered about the place, but there was the clear fact of seventy or eighty students wrestling from morning till night, and possibly from night till morning again, with those knotty problems of doctrine which exercised her own spirit. An atmosphere of controversy was wafted through the long corridors, into which study-doors opened on each side in regular ranks. A murmur of theological discussion, perceptible only to fine ears, breathed in the quiet air. Again Miss Waldron felt that, by having been born a woman, she had missed her avocation. Here was her true home, and the pulpit was her sphere.

The president of the college, the Rev. James Harvey, D.D., received the ex-member of parliament and his daughter, with a mingled deference and dignity due to their position and his own. They were old acquaintances, and could dispense with some of the formalities of strangers; so that Mr. Waldron quickly opened to him the mission he had come upon, in behalf of the church at Little Aston.

"I do not promise that it shall be a very great thing for a young man," he said. "I shall ask no assistance from the church. I do not think of offering a salary of more than a hundred pounds a year, until I see how he suits me. But it will be an opening, and most probably would be the stepping-stone to another and wealthier church. A young minister, with my influence, might obtain a good charge in a year or two."

"No doubt, no doubt, Mr. Waldron," replied Dr. Harvey.

"We require," said Miss Waldron, thinking it was time for her to speak, "a young man of eminent piety, who will have no thought except for souls. He must be an interesting preacher, with a pleasant voice and choice language, but above all, sound in doctrine. We want no German neology among us. We should like one, too, who could make himself a pleasing companion to my poor brother, who is still in the bondage of sin—one who would exert a wholesome influence over him; and as Robert is exceedingly fastidious, it is essential that he should be a gentleman, Dr. Harvey. It is still more important that he should not be self-willed and opinionative; though he must not be weak-minded, or he will soon fall into the usual follies of a young pastor. He must be one who will look to us for guidance and companionship; and who could visit at Aston Court upon suitable terms."

The last sentence was a little vague, and a young pastor might reasonably have demanded a definition of the words "suitable terms." But Doctor Harvey bowed low to Miss Waldron, and remarked that it would be a singular advantage to any young man. He mused for some minutes, with his pen upon his lips, as if he were passing his seventy students in review before his mind's eye. His aspect remained grave and calculating; but presently it brightened, and he nodded his head assentingly to his own thoughts.

"I have two of our young men in my eye at this moment," he said, "either of whom might do well for you, if you could assure them leisure to complete their course of study at Little Aston."

"Certainly," replied Miss Waldron; "we have a complete library, which shall be at their disposal; and I should myself take great interest in their studies."

"There is David Scott," pursued Dr. Harvey, "a fine logical and analytical mind, with the true ring of Calvin in it; pure gold, sir, but a little unrefined as yet. And there is Carl Bramwell. You recollect Charles Bramwell, our minister at Park Lane Chapel, and his father, old John Bramwell? They are the father and grandfather of this young man. A good lineage, and a young fellow of great promise, but a little too much inclined to be speculative, if he has a fault. It would be the making of either of them to be under your eye for a year or two. We will go and visit them both in their studies, if you do not mind the trouble."

Neither of them minded the trouble and they rose to accompany the Doctor with alacrity. The profound tranquillity of the place, and the associations connected with it, brought an unusual thrill of excitement to Miss Waldron. She trod with a quicker step, and spoke in a lower key, as they passed by, one after another, the closed doors. At length Doctor Harvey paused at one, and turning to her, said, "David Scott," as he knocked a sounding knock upon the panel, and waited for a moment to hear the words "come in."

"He is a trifle deaf," said the doctor, "but a fine fellow."

Miss Waldron felt a chill, which was not removed by the appearance of the student, a gaunt, awkward, ill-dressed lad from Scotland, who stared at her with embarrassment, and was hardly able to respond coherently to the observations made to him by Doctor Harvey. Their visit lasted but a few minutes; and Miss Waldron left the study with a painful sense of discouragement.

"I am sure he will not do for us at all," she said, plaintively.

"You ought to have seen him first in the pulpit," replied Doctor Harvey; "he is quite another being there, and handles his subject like a master. He will make a mark in the world by-and-by, I can assure you. But this is Carl Bramwell's room."

The doctor knocked lightly, but received no answer. There was an unbroken silence within the study. Miss Waldron's spirits sank yet lower; she felt doomed to disappointment.

"Bramwell must be absent," said the doctor; "but we will just look in and see his books."

OBEDIENCE TO LAW.

S. S. Lesson for June 22, Rom. 13: 1-10. Golden Text, verse 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Self-Seeking Christians—Their Religious Life Insurance—Selfish Motives in Coming to Christ—An Unspiritual Bishop's Interference—The Growing Spirit of Lawlessness—Rules for Christian Employés—A Christian Officer's Trial—Christian Workers' Inconsistencies—"Conscience Sake," a Neglected Appeal—The Divine Law as to Debt—Love an Obligation.

"LET every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God." There are certain believers, or would-be believers, who seem to think that if they are pious there is not so much need to trouble about whether they are honest, truthful, and amenable to the laws of the land. Their actions would lead people to think that Christians have a dispensation to lie and steal; and consequently outsiders, judging of the tree by its fruit, often avoid vital religion. Are these Christians at all? No doubt many of them have had something to do with Christ, but their hearts have never been really changed, and self is still their ruling passion. If a man has been a self-seeker all his life and has become converted with the idea that he will do in the other world, and get forgiveness of his sins just because it will make his mind more easy, and give him a real hope of heaven, he is seeking self as much as he did when he went to the theatre in order to obtain amusement. He is only seeking to do the best for himself, and he does not come to Christ because God has a claim upon him as His creature, and because it is robbing Jesus of His purchased right if he does not come.

When a man really gives himself up to God as His property, then he naturally looks on all which God permits in its relation to God; he does not question whether the government under which he lives accords with his likes or dislikes, he obeys because it is "ordained of God," and he leaves all the consequences of that obedience to Him. A very earnest clergyman some twenty-five years ago held revival meetings in his parish, and many souls were converted. The bishop of the diocese, who was an unspiritual man, forbade him to continue this work. He replied, "Very well, my lord; there are fifty to a hundred former drunkards, now sober men through attending these meetings; but you take the responsibility, and I will discontinue them." This the bishop dare not do, and they were continued. The clergyman would not disobey, but trusted God to make his way out of the difficulty, and He delivered him.

In our day there is a GROWING SPIRIT OF LAWLESSNESS;

we see it in nations, in churches, in families. Boys call both their fathers and their schoolmasters "the governor," and seem to think that nobility consists in a contempt of authority. Servants, following their example, show no respect to those with whom they live. In the early days of Christianity such as despised the law were found elsewhere, but never among true Christians, because in those days Christianity meant entire self-renunciation. God's Word is, "Whosoever resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God." This power may be that of magistrates, teachers, employers, or parents, but to those who are subject, it is "the ordinance of God." "Yes," say some, "but my employer is unjust." Can you trust God with this trial, and let Him show you your way? A tradesman's clerk says, "But how in my case; my employer insists on my telling lies, and declaring that such and such things are genuine when they are not." In such cases the power over you is not the ordinance of God, resist it at any cost. But we know of some who pretend to be very conscientious but their general character is such that their employers have no respect for them or their scruples either. Let a young man be always punctual to a moment in coming to business in the morning, scrupulously attentive to all the orders he receives, and then let him tell his employer that he cannot say what is untrue; even if he gets his discharge, his employer respects him.

The apostle is speaking chiefly of government when he says, "Rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil. The law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless and disobedient, for the ungodly and for sinners, for unholy and profane" (1 Tim. 1: 9). Therefore, he continues, "Do that which is good, and thou shalt have praise of the same." God would have His children to be so true, so honest, so right in their lives, that magistrates would be forced to say of them, "These are our best citizens." Thus saying, the magistrate or ruler becomes "the minister of God" to a Christian, helping by his testimony to establish God's kingdom. A Christian officer in India was much snubbed for his piety. Once the work of three officials was put upon him. Instead of complaining, he just quietly trusted God for strength, although his work was daily till midnight, and not a particle of the business committed to him went wrong. It is an awful thing if a Christian through a legal offence should make a temporal ruler God's minister of wrath to him! "Wherefore ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath but also for conscience sake." Among such believers as have sought the Lord only with selfish motives, there are many who have not the least consideration as to how what they do may affect those around them.

"FOR CONSCIENCE' SAKE"

is an appeal which falls powerless on their ears and hearts. With them conscience is at a discount; "What I like," is their rule of life, not "what God will." We have heard of professedly Christian parents passing their children as under twelve at the booking office of a railway station, and so defrauding the company as much as though they took the amount of the half-ticket off the counter, and made away with it. We have met with many cases of professedly Christian workers to whom money has been given for a certain object—for rent, gas, etc.—who have appropriated that money for themselves. What is the difference between this kind of stealing and that of the shoplifter or the pickpocket? Money given to pay a gas company belongs to that company, and not to the person who is trusted to convey it. The excuse which is given is, "I was in need and wanted the money." On such ground any man who could find need for money might go and rob the first person he meets with.

Would to God they were only worldly and unconverted people who do these things! but alas! we know many professedly Christian people who do them. If these are the teachers, what can we expect from the taught! These are they who have never been turned away from themselves. In their hearts they say, "God's cause may suffer, but I wont; I'll take care to look after my interests, and I'll look after His when it suits me." Oh, that professing Christians understood how to do things "for conscience' sake." "For this cause" (for conscience' sake) "pay ye tribute also; for they are God's ministers attending continually upon this very thing." Our blessed Lord, when required to pay tribute, said to Peter, "Lest we should offend them (in other words for conscience' sake), go thou to the sea, and cast an hook, and take up the fish that first cometh up; and when thou hast opened his mouth, thou shalt find a piece of money; that take, and give unto them for me and thee" (Matt. 17: 27). "Why should I pay taxes; I don't care for all this pomp of royalty." Such may be the spirit of some ungodly man, but a child of God, who seeks His glory, knows that whatever God has permitted is the very best for us, and he glorifies God in the willingness with which he pays taxes. "Render therefore to all their dues; tribute to whom tribute is due; custom to whom custom; fear to whom fear; honor to whom honor."

but to love one another." Men without conscience do not look upon debt as wrong. God would have His children free from all obligation to man. Money which we owe is not ours; it belongs to him whose goods we have taken in exchange, and thus, if we do not pay him, we have really robbed him of the goods. God's rule is clear, "Owe no man anything but to love one another." We owe to others the debt of love we have incurred from God. Such as seek religion only for self-satisfaction cannot comprehend how they can owe anything to others. Such as are turned from themselves to God see themselves as His property, and the property of every soul of man. "He that loveth another hath fulfilled the law."

Some have strange ideas about love. A young man fell in love with a young woman, and because he could not get as much of her society as he wished, but saw that she preferred some one else, he killed her. There was no love in his heart, it was only gross, hideous selfishness. A love which demands and exacts, and then wounds the object of its love, if it cannot detain what it wants, is not really love at all, but only intense selfishness. Love gives, but demands nothing; love comes down to the lowest to bring them up. Love does not plan out pleasure for itself, but yields itself to the will of another. Six commandments of the law are included in one command to love. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor, therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." It is this divine love which conforms us to the image of Christ; this is the great purpose of God concerning us: being perfected in love, the law of God and the law of man will be, not broken, but fulfilled.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Meeting of the International Conference on the Egyptian Question is anticipated with considerable anxiety. Statements have been made indicating that the Gladstone administration contemplates re-establishing the joint control over Egypt of England and France, an arrangement which never worked well, and was mainly the cause of the rising of the people under Arabi, with its attendant catastrophes. Until the conference assembles, the extent of the English concessions to France will not be disclosed. The English people are indignant with Mr. Gladstone for proposing to surrender to France a share of the results purchased by English blood and money. A prominent journal says: "If the international control and financial management are conceded a disunion of the English Cabinet will result. The minority of the Cabinet is against joint control, and favors no concessions to France. A group of Liberal members of Parliament have notified Mr. Gladstone of their intention to vote against the government, if it surrenders to France or Europe the position England has won on the Nile."

Arabi Pacha's Opinion of the Trouble in the Soudan is entitled to the respect due to a man who probably knows more about the people there than any other Egyptian. He said recently that the complication in the Soudan was the outcome of the unwise policy pursued by the English. Clemency and an impartial inquiry into the people's grievances could alone restore order; otherwise there would be frightful bloodshed before the end was reached. It was certain that the Mahdi would never make overtures for peace, and that he would fight until captured or killed. Arabi declined to say whether he believed the Mahdi to be a true prophet. He said that he felt the highest regard for the British, and hoped to see the day when the Egyptians in Egypt would be on the same footing as the English in England.

The Franco-Chinese Difficulty has Ended in the treaty of peace between France and Annam, which was signed last week. By its terms the provinces of Bin-thuan and Than-goa are restored to Annam. A customs system similar to that in force in Cochin China is established. A French military occupation of all strategic points in Annam and Tonquin may be effected if necessary. A permanent French garrison will hold a portion of the citadel of Hue, capital of Annam. Annam accepted the treaty as proposed by France, without making any modifications. By it Annam is placed under a French protectorate. The French resident in Cochin China will represent Annam in all her foreign relations, and Annam will form a customs union with Cochin China. The departments of public works, of postal and telegraph service, and of finance and customs, will form a single branch of administration under the direction of a French agent.

French Intrigues in Morocco are Reported. The Sherif of Wazan, a powerful subject of the Sultan of Morocco, has declared himself a French citizen, having accepted an invitation from the French Minister there to naturalize himself. The Sherif is resisting his sovereign, and the French are encouraging him to arouse an agitation among the people in favor of annexation to France. The Sherifs compose a large and powerful party in Morocco, numbering several thousand persons, who all claim lineal descent from the Prophet Mohammed. The Sherif of Wazan—Hadj Abd-esselhamel Arby by name—enjoys a hereditary reputation for peculiar sanctity, and is on that account looked up to by the Mohammedan inhabitants of the country, and also of Algeria, as the living head of their religion, and even as being endowed with supernatural power. He is a blood relation of the Sultan, and owns a large tract of country known as the Wazan district, between Tangier and Fez. Owing to these circumstances the Moorish noble enjoys a social position and also an amount of political influence possibly second to none throughout the Empire, except the Sultan. By placing himself and his followers under the protection of the French Government he gives that government a pretext for interference in Moorish affairs, which will probably be used as a similar pretext has been used in Madagascar and elsewhere. The object appears to be to obtain control of the Mediterranean southern coast, and so gain compensation for loss of French influence in Egypt.

The New French Divorce Law is Arousing considerable discussion. It provides that a divorce may be granted on proof of either adultery, cruelty, serious insult, conviction of dishonesty, or offence against public morals, or desertion for a period of ten years. Any couple finding their married life insupportable, but not wishing to accuse each other of any of the offences nullifying marriage, can make a declaration that they are no longer able to live together. This formal declaration must be supported by the acquiescence of three of the nearest relatives of both husband and wife, and repeated four times in the course of a year. The possessions of the household are valued, and one half is settled upon the children of the marriage, to become theirs on attaining their majority. One of the parents must contract to undertake entire responsibility for bringing up the children. After all this is done the court will be empowered to pronounce a decree of divorce. It is significant that this legislative effort to make divorce easy is accompanied by another sign of the times. The fact is announced that in the last census no less than seven and a half millions registered themselves as having no religion.

The Consumption of Intoxicating Liquor in England is the subject of a letter addressed by Mr. W. Hoyle to the London Times. He points out that the nation's expenditure upon intoxicating liquors during 1883 amounted to $627,386,375, a decrease of $3,870,420 as compared with 1882. In 1882 there was a decrease from 1881 of $4,115,505. In 1860, with a population of 28,778,000, the expenditure of the United Kingdom upon intoxicating liquors was $426,384,350. Year by year the expenditure rose, until in 1876 it reached the enormous sum of $736,443,795. Thus while the population had only grown fifteen per cent, the drink bill had grown seventy-two per cent. Between 1876 and 1880 the drink bill receded from $736,000,000 to $610,000,000. This was largely owing to the great depression in trade, and to some extent it was also due to the vigorous efforts of temperance reformers. In 1881 the drink bill rose again to $635,000,000, since which year it has fallen to the extent of about $3,800,000.

Discontent is Prevalent among the Loyal citizens of Ireland as well as among the Parnellites. It has been developed to a serious extent by a letter recently written by the Lord Lieutenant on the subject of Orange meetings in Ulster. It appears that when the Land Leaguers arranged to hold a meeting in any town the loyal inhabitants, prompted by the Orange societies and the prospect of the congenial amusement of a free fight, got up a counter-demonstration close at hand, and military had to be sent by the government to keep the peace between the two Irish crowds. Lord Spencer now prohibits the counter-demonstrations, and orders that the Orange meetings shall not be held at the same time and place as nationalist meetings. He will not interfere with such counter-demonstrations, if they are held at such times and places as will not bring hostile bodies into collision. The policy of the government is to maintain the right of public meeting and to preserve the public peace. This decision of the government has exasperated the loyalists in the north of Ireland, and it seems likely that indignation meetings will be held. The Dublin Express says: "The government has unconditionally surrendered to the party of sedition. We believe, however, that the loyalists will meet the rebel demonstrations with loyal demonstrations, and that these will only cease when they are met by the bayonets and bullets of the Queen's troops." Cynical Englishmen recommend that the counter-demonstrations be encouraged, and the military withdrawn, and Irishmen abroad be induced to go to Ireland and participate in the favorite national pastime of quarrelling and fighting.

Mr. Moody's Services in the Temple Gardens have been as successful as in other parts of London. The cable reports that fully six thousand persons were present on June 4th. Mr. Moody announced that Mr. Sankey was too unwell to take part in the service. He added that Mr. Sankey's complete restoration to health was deemed improbable, and that his voice, which had so often led thousands of assembled worshippers in the songs of Zion, would probably never be heard again in their services. The preacher said that the great singer's present prostration was so complete that he had been compelled to retire from the work of evangelization, and would sail for his home in the United States on June 12th. Mr. Moody pronounced a touching eulogium upon the services and devotion of Mr. Sankey, and concluded by asking the prayers of the congregation for the preservation of his useful and honored life. The response was very earnest and affecting.

"Thy Healer," A New Magazine Devoted to the subject of faith-healing, may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price five cents, including postage. It is issued in London on the first and fifteenth of each month, and will be sent to subscribers promptly on its receipt in New York. The annual subscription is one dollar. It is edited by Mrs. M. Baxter whose expositions of the International Sunday-school lessons are published every week in this journal. It contains incidents of faith-healing reported from Bethshan, the London faith-healing institution, and from other similar institutions in Europe, and articles by eminent writers on the subject.

The Ladies' Manual of Fancy Work is the title of a useful book issued at the low price of fifty cents. It contains over four hundred illustrations, and has ninety-two pages of descriptive matter with directions for the manufacture of the articles mentioned. Those articles, though technically described as "fancy work," are many of them of a useful character. Tasteful patterns for lace-work, embroidery for cushions and slippers, knitting, tatting, crochet work, and net-work are among the illustrations, and directions for making carriage rugs, school-bags, purses, door-mats, and innumerable articles which may be ugly, but which it is much more pleasant to have pretty, are given in plain and simple language. The book in paper covers may be had, postage paid, by sending fifty cents to Mr. J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York.

Bible and Sunday-School Books: Inquiries about these books are frequently addressed to the office of the CHRISTIAN HERALD. We therefore call the attention of our readers to the fact that Mr. Thomas Whittaker, of 2 and 3 Bible House, New York City, makes a specialty of supplying any and all of the numerous editions of the Holy Scriptures, and of furnishing books for Sunday-school libraries, and will receive and answer any inquiry in reference thereto. The "Oxford Teachers' Bible," in various forms of binding, from $1.25 upward; illustrated quarto family Bibles with both versions of the New Testament, $4.50 upward; Bibles with and without references in cloth, leather, and morocco bindings constantly on hand. Selections made and orders by mail promptly forwarded. Books for Sunday-school libraries selected with care from the choicest works in that line of all publishing houses, and special sets of approved books can be forwarded at particularly low rates. Catalogues free on application. The same publisher has recently issued a new and cheap edition of "Thoughts for Weary Hours," 35 cents per copy. "Personal Piety," a help "to Christians to walk worthy of their calling," 60 cents. "Little Things for Every-Day Life," 50 cents, postpaid.

The Late Sir H. BARTLE FRERE, the Christian Statesman and Governor.

THE LATE SIR H. BARTLE E. FRERE.

A Heroic Christian Statesman—His Birth in 1815—His Overland Journey to India in 1834—Acts for the Civil Service in the Deccan—Becomes Commissioner of Sattara in 1846 and of Scinde in 1850—His Great Public Works—Preserves the Punjaub in the Mutiny—Becomes Member of Supreme Council in India in 1859—Is Governor of Bombay from 1862 to 1866—Lady Frere's Efforts for Hindoo Women—Returns to England in 1867—His Mission to Zanzibar in 1872—His deep Interest in Missions—Made Governor of the Cape, etc.

On Thursday, May 29th, the cable brought intelligence of the death of Sir Henry Bartle Frere, one of the most distinguished of the many eminent statesmen whose names are identified with the modern history of India. He was not only a wise and courageous man but an earnest Christian, and was one of the most conspicuous illustrations in our day of the fact that religion in the heart does not unfit a man to fulfil the duties of life. Sir Bartle Frere has been carried to his grave in the great London Cathedral, honored by his fellow-countrymen as a man of whom his country might justly be proud. His life was pure though surrounded by strong temptations; his administration was wise and beneficial to those he ruled; and when confronted with imminent and deadly peril he counted not his own life dear to him, but voluntarily increased his peril that he might deliver others and serve his country in her need. His duty to God and to his country occupied his first thought, and doing that he left his own interests and welfare in God's keeping. Such a life, the life of a Christian hero, deserves to be known and studied, especially by those who regard religion as a bar to public usefulness or to success in an honorable secular career.

Sir Henry Bartle Edward Frere was born in 1815, and was the fifth son of Mr. Edward Frere, one of a family who have been planted in England ever since the Conquest. He had an uncle named James Hatley Frere, who is known by his writings on the interpretation of prophecy and as the inventor of one of the most successful systems for teaching the blind to read. Young Frere, having passed his early years in Wales, was sent to King Edward the Sixth's Grammar School at Bath, and thence to Haileybury, where it was the custom then to train young men of promise for the Indian service.

THE JOURNEY TO INDIA.

In 1834, having duly qualified for the Indian Civil Service, he was appointed to the Bombay presidency. At that time the route to India viâ Suez had not been established; no steamers from England went beyond Malta, and there was no recognized mode of transit across the desert. The then Governor-General of India, Lord William Bentinck, sent a steamer to Suez to meet persons from England, with the view of testing the feasibility of the much questioned overland route. In expectation of meeting the experimental steamer, Mr. Frere left Falmouth in May, 1834. At Malta he spent some weeks in the learned retreat of his uncle, Hookham Frere, who had taken part in the diplomatic transactions of the opening years of this century, and who was full of anecdotes about Pitt, Canning, and Wyndham. At Malta, too, he met the famous traveller, Dr. Joseph Wolff, who discoursed to him of Central Asia, and aided him in the study of Arabic, at length pronouncing him "fit to scold his way through Egypt."

Mr. Frere left Malta in a Greek vessel for Alexandria, and made his way to Cairo; but no tidings could he learn of the expected steamer. With three other travellers, also bound for India, he took the route of Thebes and Upper Egypt, struck across, on camel-back, from Kenné to Crossier, and thence in an open boat, exposed to the terrible heat of the Red Sea; in August, sailed to Yambo, Jedda, and Mocha, and, after hardships, they were at length landed at Bombay. He was the first servant of the East India Company who reached India by the afterward much-used overland route.

Within three months after his arrival he successfully passed an examination in Hindustani; afterward also in the Mahratta and Guzerat languages. Early in 1835 he was called to a special and having been selected to assist in an inquiry into the land assessment of Indapore. This inquiry disclosed much cruelty and oppression in the mode of assessing and collecting the revenue. In its prosecution he became well acquainted with the district in which he was employed, living, during the rains, in temples or houses for wayfarers, or in a tent roughly thatched over. Coming into daily contact with the people in their own homes, he gained an entire understanding of the native habits and character. Subsequently, as assistant to the Revenue Commissioners, he travelled over every part of the Bombay presidency, the southern Mahratta country alone excepted.

For five years Mr. Frere took part in the work of reforming the assessment of other provinces besides the Deccan. The new system which he helped to inaugurate was based upon a low assessment, careful surveys, and fixity of tenure. First applied to Indapore, it was in time extended with happy results throughout the whole Bombay presidency and Scinde, and into the neighboring provinces of Berar and Mysore. Speaking of the native cultivators of a district which had come under the new system, Mr. Frere, in a letter written in 1849, and which was read before a committee of the House of Commons said, "From being the most wretched and depressed set in the Deccan, they have become thriving, independent fellows, thoroughly grateful for what has been done for them."

In 1842 General Sir George Arthur, a distinguished officer, who had seen much service, was appointed Governor of Bombay. The gentleman whom he had selected as his died on his passage out, and Mr. Frere was appointed to the post. In the following year Sir Charles Napier invaded Scinde. This war gave rise to a bitter controversy between Outram and Napier. Scinde was conquered and annexed. During the war General Napier was in constant communication with Sir George Arthur and his secretary, Mr. Frere, as it was from Bombay that he drew his supplies.

In 1844 Mr. Frere married Catherine, the second daughter of Sir George Arthur, and in the year following took his furlough in England, when again he had the opportunity of paying a passing visit to his uncle at Malta. On his return to India he was selected to fill the important post of resident at Sattara, in succession to Colonel Outram. Shortly afterward Sattara lapsed to the East India Company through the failure of natural heirs, and Mr. Frere was appointed commissioner. Here he introduced the improved revenue system which had worked so beneficially in other provinces. The first tunnel ever made in India was made by Mr. Frere at Sattara. This country has ever remained well affected to British rule.

On the conquest of Scinde the government of the acquired province was intrusted to Sir Charles Napier, who had acquired it. What Napier did for Scinde during the four years of his governorship forms one of the brightest pages of Indian history. When Mr. Frere afterward became in 1850, he devoted himself to carry out the ideas of its first British administrator. "It was the policy of Mr. Frere," says Colonel Malleson, in his "Recreations of an Indian Official," "to encourage great works which might be useful to the people and remunerative to the government. The roads of the province, the harbor of Kurrachee, and ultimately railroads, received at his hands the most prompt attention. The harbor of Kurrachee, as it now is, was mainly his own work; for, though Sir Charles Napier had marked the spot as one which was destined to become the outlet of the Punjaub, it was left to Mr. Frere to carry out the design—to make the harbor sufficiently capacious to receive large ships and to place the steam navigation of the Indus on a thoroughly efficient footing."

During Mr. Frere's administration some 6000 miles of roads were opened up, and the great work called the "Supply Channel" was constructed, in order to supply water to a network of canals extending 300 miles from the point where it leaves the Indus, and irrigating many thousands of square miles. He obtained the sanction of the government for the construction of the Scinde Railway, and for a considerable grant of money for the works of the beautiful harbor of Kurrachee.

In the early part of 1856 Mr. Frere again visited England, on account of his health. He had obtained a furlough of three years which after long service he well deserved; but scarcely had he arrived in England than he heard of the outbreak of the Persian war. He foresaw that this would probably involve trouble in India and at once hurried back to his post in India, and the first news he heard on landing was that had broken out at Meerut. He saw at once that the fate of India depended on the attitude of the Punjaub. And, although he had only two European regiments to keep in check the mutinous spirit in his own province, on his own responsibility, and without waiting for instructions from Bombay, he despatched his strongest regiment, the Bombay Fusiliers, to Mooltan, the key of the Punjaub, and sent also a steamer to divert to Calcutta some other troops which were returning to Scinde from the Persian Gulf. During the worst days of the mutiny, Mooltan and Ferozepore were held by the troops sent by Mr. Frere. The outbreaks in Scinde itself were promptly suppressed, the mutineers were punished, and additional troops were despatched to the southern Mahratta country and to the Punjaub, until with less than two hundred European bayonets he kept in check the Mahommedan population of the province, amounting to a million and a half.

For these services Mr. Frere, in 1858, received the thanks of both Houses of Parliament; and again in 1859, when he was nominated a K.C.B. and appointed a member of Lord Canning's Council at Calcutta. In the House of Commons it was said of him that, if Sir John Lawrence, by holding the Punjaub, had saved India, Mr. Frere, by risking Scinde to secure Mooltan, had saved the Punjaub. "When the head and heart are threatened, the extremities must take care of themselves." So wrote Bartle Frere to Lord Elphinstone, and the remark indicates the wise and unselfish policy on which he acted in the terrible crisis of the mutiny.

When Sir Bartle Frere reached Calcutta in 1859, to take his seat as a MEMBER OF THE SUPREME COUNCIL

of India, he found the finances in disorder, the army dissatisfied, and Lord Canning at the height of his unpopularity. He speedily won the regard and confidence of Lord Canning, and became, indeed, his most trusted counsellor. This he did a second time when Mr. Laing was compelled by ill health to return to England. To the many services rendered by Sir Bartle Frere, and to his influence in the Supreme Council of India in promoting the wise and beneficial measures of the closing years of Lord Canning's rule, we need not here further advert. He was the right-hand man of the Viceroy, and in fact it was owing not a little to the wise and beneficial measures he promoted that the popular feeling in regard to Lord Canning, before he retired, so completely changed. In March, 1862, that nobleman retired, and Sir Bartle Frere acted as president of the Council until the arrival of Lord Elgin. Shortly afterward he was appointed to succeed Sir George Clark as

GOVERNOR OF BOMBAY.

Bombay, once a small and unhealthy fishing town, has grown to be the emporium of the East. During the present century it has rapidly ncreased in importance, till now it numbers nore inhabitants than any city of the British Empire, London alone excepted, and no Eng-ish port out of the British Islands carries on a arger foreign commerce. As governor of the Bombay presidency Sir Bartle Frere found in-:essant occupation for the next five years of his ife.

Sir Bartle Frere has always displayed a keen nterest in all educational questions, and has lone much to promote the education of the natives of India. In his efforts in this work he ad the enthusiastic co-operation of

LADY FRERE

'Following the example of her mother," ays Colonel Malleson, "who had been the first ady occupying the position of wife of the governor who showed a deep interest in the ducation of native ladies, Lady Frere devoted erself to the cause with all the ardor of her nature. To her example and exertions may be ttributed the great advance made, during her usband's five years' rule, in the civilization nd education of the female community of Bom-ay. She it was who first opened the doors of Government House to the female relatives of the Parsees and other native gentlemen of the presi-lency. She it was who visited them in their wn houses, endeavoring to convince them of he advantages which must accrue from a more iberal training. Nor were her labors fruitless. n respect to female education Bombay is greatly n advance of the other presidencies of India."

During the time of Sir Bartle's governorship he ramparts of Bombay were pulled down ; the uilding of the Deccan College, the Poona Engineering College, the Elphinstone College, nd the Sassoon Hospital, and many other im-ortant public works, were begun or completed, nd a municipality was organized for Bombay hich, since its establishment in 1865, has been he means of effecting a large reduction in the ortality of the city.

It was in 1866 that a severe mercantile crisis ccurred in Bombay. The governor foresaw, nd did what he could by timely legislation to void, the evils of reckless trading. He passed he Cotton Frauds Act and the nd also issued a notification warning officers of he Government against share speculations.

Sir Bartle Frere retired finally from Indian ervice and returned to England in 1867. He ook his place as a member of the Indian ouncil, and besides, as one of its vice-presi-ents, took an active part in the affairs of the oyal Geographical Society. He also engaged n roducing a memoir of his uncle, John Hook-am Frere, the diplomatist, and to a volume of ssays, published under the title "The Church nd the Age," he made a contribution on Indian Missions. This paper is valuable as the testi-ony of a man who knew India well—espe-ially Western India—on such a subject. With warm interest in all forms of educational and issionary effort he traced the progress of ie enlightenment of India very much from his wn personal observation during the last thirty-ve years.

"Christianity suited to all Forms of Civiliza-on" is the title of a lecture delivered by Sir artle Frere in connection with the Christian vidence Society, in which he again drew his cts from what he himself saw and knew.

Dr. Livingstone's last expedition was organ-ed at Bombay before Sir Bartle Frere had eased to be governor. He gave to Dr. Living-one the hospitality of Government House and l the aid in his power, sympathizing, as he ost cordially did, with the aims of the great xplorer.

He again left England in 1872, on

A MISSION OF MERCY

) Zanzibar and Muscat, in order to negotiate ith the rulers of those states for the suppres-on of the slave trade within and around their respective territories. To the immense joy of the people of England, his mission was a complete success.

Sir Bartle Frere always gave his cordial support to the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society, both at public meetings and at deputations to Her Majesty's Government. He pleaded at Exeter Hall at many missionary anniversaries, and he was to be found nobly standing side by side with all who would send the light of gospel life and love to the dark places of the earth. He was made vice-president of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts.

At the banquet given to Sir Bartle Frere by the Royal Geographical Society, on the eve of his departure to Africa, Sir Henry Rawlinson, the president, thus adverted to his public services: "Sir Bartle Frere is not only a geographer, or a patron of geographers: he is a statesman, an earnest, thoughtful, and honest statesman; one of the clear-headed, large-hearted men who will go down to future ages as among the benefactors of mankind. His administration of Scinde during the Sepoy rebellion of 1857 evinced the highest qualities of statesmanship, and brought him prominently forward as one of the ablest men of his day. It has been said that he found the province a desert and left it a garden. He began the administration under all possible disadvantages, but he succeeded in converting the lawless marauders of the province into industrious and peaceful peasants. His subsequent government of Bombay was equally creditable to him, and it is still remembered in India with feelings of the deepest gratitude. The chief characteristic of Sir Bartle Frere, if he will allow me to say so, is an entire abnegation of self, an absolute devotion to the interests of those committed to his care."

In the Prince of Wales's memorable tour to India in 1875-6, Sir Bartle Frere accompanied the Prince, and in 1877 he was appointed and High Commissioner of South Africa. In this post he gave great satisfaction until he got into trouble with Cetywayo, the King of the Zulus, in 1879, and, in spite of the pacific recommendations of the home government, precipitated a war with the Zulus, which finally resulted in their defeat and the capture of Cetywayo after a long and bitter struggle. The Zulu war resulted in creating a great deal of opposition to Sir Bartle and his policy in England, and in December, 1880, he resigned his position. Since then Sir Bartle Frere lived in comparative retirement.

LOOKING.

By Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D.

WHAT we see in anything or any man is largely due to the eyes with which we look. It is a rule that we ordinarily bring from anything according to that which we carry to it.

A picture, one of Raphael's, may always be the same in itself, but is it not really as many pictures as there are beholders? An untutored child sees in it only a group of persons, perhaps only a woman and a child. An anatomist sees something which never enters the eyes of the child. An artist sees a third picture, a poet a fourth, a saint a fifth. It depends upon the eye and, still more, upon what is behind the eye.

An old blind beggar sits by the wayside. To the political economist who passes by he seems a factor in that great system we call "society." An oculist does not see that picture at all, but he does behold a very interesting patient. The artist sees what he afteward reproduces in a picturesque sketch, the poet what he afterward weaves into the lines of a touching poem. A philanthropist beholds an object of charity, a destitute and afflicted fellow-being. As Jesus looks upon the man He sees a soul for whose salvation He has an unutterable longing. It is what is in the beholder rather than in the spectacle.

In many places in the history of our Lord there is the statement that Jesus "looked." If only those on whom He looked could have known what was behind those eyes, how they would have been thrilled! In the third chapter of the Acts of the Apostles is a story, one phrase in which led to what is written above. Peter and John were going up to the temple to worship. It was the "hour of prayer." A lame man lay at the gate which was called "Beautiful." Many had seen him that day. Perhaps Peter and John had seen him often before. But somehow on this occasion Peter looked with different eyes—that is, with a different state of mind and heart. The phrase, "Fastening his eyes upon him," is very impressive and instructive. Pentecostal power had quickened and strengthened all Peter's faculties. Love for the ascended Lord and apostolic responsibility had so transformed Peter that even on his way to pray he was moved to work. He looked upon the man, and as he looked the man gained a kind of fascination for the apostle, who saw in him not simply an ungainly beggar who had never walked, but a human being in whom might be shown the power of the ascended Jesus.

And so the lesson comes to us all to take heed how we look as well as how we hear. The best preparation for the eyes is in the heart. A selfish man sees in everything only an instrument for his selfishness or an obstruction to his selfish enjoyment. A generous man sees in the same things outlets for the refreshing and fertilizing streams of his soul. A sinister spirit can find faults everywhere and in every being, even in saints, in martyrs, in apostles and in Jesus; and there is no human being living so utterly worthless that a truly Christian man can find nothing in him to love. Let us not judge the world and men by what we see in them, but by that judge ourselves. If all things seem yellow, we have the jaundice. If we see all the faults and none of the beauties of our fellow-man we may be sure that something has gone wrong with us. If we see only what we may pervert and destroy we are like the devil; if our eyes seek and find something in every soul which we may make the field of operations for that soul's uplifting and sanctification, we are like Jesus.

THE GALVANIC BATTERY AMONG IDOLATERS.

A MISSIONARY gives the following amusing account of the introduction of a magnet and galvanic battery in a place called Manana, on the coast of Africa:

"One day, I was showing a number of natives a magnet. I put down a needle, and gave the magnet to one of them. When he put it near the needle and saw the needle attracted to the magnet, they were all greatly astonished, and each wanted to make sure there was no deception. They made the most curious remarks about the magnet, holding it closely to see by what means it could hold. I asked them if their idol could do anything like that. They held a short consultation, and decided that it could not do even what this magnet had done.

"On another occasion I was showing some of them our galvanic battery, and letting them feel its power. One man prepared himself for a shock by calling loudly on some idol power to help him. He was one of a large string who had joined hands, and he stood the shock pretty well, even when the others were shouting because of the current.

"So he called loudly on his gods for help, and came forward alone to take hold of the handles; the others looked on very eagerly, anxious to see what effect the prayers would have in keeping off the powers of the white man's machine. As the man took hold he repeated rapidly some sort of prayer which he expected to help him; but as I turned the current on pretty strong, I soon changed the recitation into a roar, and he retreated amid the shouts of the others. He was something of a medicine man among them, so I was glad I had caught him."

ROMANCE OF CRIME.

Here is the mightiest of the Babylonish kings. Look at him. He did more for the grandeur of the capital than did all his predecessors or successors. Hanging gardens, reservoirs, aqueducts, palaces, all of his own planing. The bricks that are brought up to day from the ruins of Babylon have his name on them, "Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassor, King of Babylon." He was

A GREAT CONQUEROR.

He stretched forth his spear toward a nation, and it surrendered. But he plundered the temple of the true God. He lifted an idol, Belmerodach, and compelled the people to bow down before it, and if they refused they must go through the red-hot furnace, or be craunched by lion or lioness. So

GOD PULLED HIM DOWN.

He was smitten with what physicians call lycanthropy, and fancied that he was a wild beast, and he went out and pastured amid the cattle. God did not excuse him because he had committed the sin in high places, or because the transgression was wide resounding. He measured Nebuchadnezzar in high place just as he would measure the humblest captive.

But in our time, you know as well as I, that there is a disposition to put a halo around iniquity if it is committed in conspicuous place and if it is wide resounding and of large proportions. During the past two months there has been an epidemic of and there is not a State or a city, and hardly a village which has not been called to look upon astounding forgery, or an absconding bank cashier or president, or the wasting of trust-fund or swindling mortgages. I propose this morning, in carrying out the suggestion of my text as far as I can, to scatter the fascinations around iniquity, and show you that sin is sin and wrong is wrong, whether in high place or low place, and that it will be dealt with by that God who dealt with impalaced Nebuchadnezzar.

Those of you who have heard me preach for the last sixteen years know that I preach two kinds of sermons—the one on the faith of the Gospel, the other on the morality of the Gospel—and the one is just as important as the other, for you know that in this land to-day there are hundreds of men hiding behind the communion tables and in churches of Jesus Christ who have no business to be there as professors of religion. They expect to be all right with God, although they are all wrong with man. And while I want you to understand that by the deeds of the law no flesh living can be justified, and a mere honest life cannot enter us into Heaven, I want you as plainly to understand that unless the life is right the heart is not right. Grace in the heart and grace in the life; so we must preach sometimes the faith of the Gospel and sometimes

THE MORALITY OF THE GOSPEL.

It seems to me there has not been a time in the last fifty years when this latter truth needed more thoroughly to be presented in the American churches. It needs to be presented to-day.

A missionary in the islands of the Pacific preached one Sabbath on honesty and dishonesty, and on Monday he found his yard full of all styles of goods which the natives had brought. He could not understand it until a native told him: "Our gods permit us to purloin goods, but the God you told us about yesterday, the God of Heaven and earth, it seems, is against these practices, and so we brought all the goods that do not belong to us, and they are in the yard, and we want you to help us to distribute them among their rightful owners." And if in all the pulpits of the United States to-day rousing sermons could be preached on honesty and the evils of dishonesty, and the sermons were blessed of God, and arrangement should be made by which all the goods which have been improperly taken from one man and appropriated by another man should be put in the City Halls of the country, there is not a City Hall in the United States that would not be crowded from cellar to cupola. Faith of the Gospel, that we must preach and we do preach. Morality of the Gospel we must just as certainly proclaim.

Now look abroad and see the fascinations that are thrown around

DIFFERENT STYLES OF CRIME.

The question that every man and woman has asked during the last two months has been, Should crime be excused because it is on a large scale? Is iniquity guilty and to be pursued of the law in proportion as it is on a small scale? Shall we have New York Tombs for the man who steals an overcoat from a hat-rack, and all Canada for a man to range in if he have robbed the public of three millions?

Look upon all the fascinations thrown around fraud in this country. You know that for years men have been made heroes of and pictorialized and in various styles presented to the public, as though sometimes they were worthy of admiration if they have scattered the funds of banks, or swallowed great estates that did not belong to them. Our young men have been dazed with this quick accumulation. They have said, "That's the way to do it. What's the use of our plodding on with small wages or insignificant salary, when we may go into business life, and with some stratagem achieve such a fortune as that man has achieved?" A different measure has been applied to the crime of Wall Street from that which has been applied to the spoils which the man carries up Rat Alley.

So a peddler came down from Vermont some years ago, took hold of the money-market of New York, flaunted his abominations in the sight of all the people, defied public morals every day of his life. Young men looked up and said, "He was a peddler in one decade, and in the next decade he is one of the monarchs of the stock market. That's the way to do it."

There has been an irresistible impression going abroad among young men that the poorest way to get money is to earn it. The young man of flaunting cravat says to the young man of humble apparel, "What, you only get $1,800 a year? Why, that wouldn't keep me in pin-money. I spend $5000 a year." "Where do you get it?" asks the plain young man. "Oh, stocks, enterprises, all that sort of thing, you know." The plain young man has hardly enough money to pay his board, has to wear clothes after they are out of fashion, and deny himself all luxuries. After a while he gets tired of his plodding, and he goes to the man who has achieved suddenly large estate, and he says, "Just show me how it is done." And he is shown. He soon learns how, and although he is almost all the time idle now, and has resigned his position in the bank, or the factory, or the store, he has more money than he ever had, trades off his old silver watch for a gold one with a flashing chain, sets his hat a little further over on the side of his head than he ever did, smokes better cigars and more of them. He has his hand in! Now, if he can escape the penitentiary for three or four years he will get into political circles, and he will get political jobs, and will have something to do with harbors, and pavements, and docks. Now he has got so far along he is

SAFE FOR PERDITION.

It is quite a long road sometimes for a man to travel before he gets into the romance of crime. Those are caught who are only in the prosaic stage of it. If the sheriffs and constables would only leave them alone a little while, they would steal as well as anybody. They might not be able to steal a whole railroad, but they could master a load of pig iron.

Now I always thank God when I find an estate like that go to smash. It is plague-struck, and it blasts the nation. I thank God when it goes into such a wreck it can never be gathered up again. I want it to become so loathsome and such an insufferable stench that honest young men will take warning. If God should put into money or its representative the capacity to go to its lawful owner, there would not be a bank or a safety deposit in the United States whose walls would not be blown out, and mortgages would rip, and parchments would rend, and gold would shoot, and beggars would get on horseback, and stock gamblers would go to the almshouse.

How many dishonesties in the making out of invoices, and in the plastering of false labels, and in the filching of customers of rival houses, and in the making and breaking of contracts. Young men are indoctrinated in the idea that the sooner they get money the better, and the getting of it on a larger scale only proves to them their greater ingenuity. There is a glitter thrown around about all these things. Young men have got to find out that God looks upon sin in a very different light.

A YOUNG MAN

stood behind the counter in New York selling silks to a lady, and he said before the sale was consummated, "I see there is a flaw in that silk." The lady recognized it, and the sale was not consummated. The head man of the firm saw the interview, and he wrote home to the father of the young man living in the country, saying, "Dear sir, come and take your boy; he will never make a merchant." The father came down from the country home in great consternation, as any father would, wondering what his boy had done. He came into the store, and the merchant said to him, "Why, your son pointed out a flaw in some silk the other day, and spoiled the sale, and we will never have that lady, probably, again for a customer, and your son never will make a merchant." "Is that all?" said the father. "I am proud of him. I wouldn't for the world have him another day under your influence. John, get your hat and come; let us start." There are hundreds of young men under the pressure, under the fascinations thrown around about commercial iniquity. Thousands of young men have gone down under other thousands have maintained their integrity. God help you! Let me say to you, my young friend, that you can be a great deal happier in poverty than you ever can be happy in a prosperity which comes from illy gotten gains. "Oh," you say, "I might lose my place. It is easy for you to stand there and talk, but it is no easy thing to get a place when you have lost it. Beside that, I have a widowed mother depending upon my exertions, and you must not be too reckless in giving advice to me." Ah, my young friend, it is always safe to be right, but it is never safe to be wrong. You go home and tell your mother the pressure under which you are in that store, and I know what she will say to you if she is worthy of you. She will say, "My son, come out from there; Christ has taken care of us all these years, and He will take care of us now; come out of that."

And remember that the man who gets his gain by iniquity will soon lose it all. One moment after his departure from life he will not own an opera house, he will not own a certificate of stock, he will not own one dollar of government securities, and the poorest boy that stands on the street with a penny in his pocket, looking at the funeral procession of the dead cheat as it goes by, will have more money than that man who one week ago boasted that he controlled the money market.

Oh, there is such a fearful fascination in this day about

THE USE OF TRUST-FUNDS.

It has got to be popular to take the funds of others and speculate with them. There may be many in this house who are practising that iniquity. Almost every man in the course of his life has the property of others put in his care. He has administered, perhaps, for a dead friend; he is an attorney, and money passes from debtor to creditor through his hands; or he is in a commercial establishment, and gets a salary for the discharge of his responsibilities; or he is treasurer of a philanthropic institution, and money for the suffering goes through his hands; or he has some office in city, or State, or nation, and taxes, and subsidies, and supplies, and salaries are in his hands. Now, that is a trust. That is as sacred a trust as God can give a man. It is the concentration of confidence. Now, when that man takes that money—the money of others—and goes to speculating with it for his own purposes, he is guilty of theft, falsehood, and perjury, and in the most intense sense of the word is a miscreant.

There are families to-day—widows and orphans—with nothing between them and starvation but a sewing machine, or kept out of the vortex by the thread of a needle red with the blood of their hearts, who were by father or husband left a competency. You read the story in the newspaper of those who have lost by a bank defalcation, and it is only one line, the name of a woman you never heard of, and just one or two figures telling the amount of stock she had, the number of shares. It is a very short line in a newspaper, but it is a line of agony long as time; it is a story long as eternity.

Now, do not come under the fascination which induces men to employ trust-funds for purposes of their own speculation. Cultivate old-fashioned honesty. Remember who, when he was leading the British army over the French frontier, and his army was very hungry, and there was plenty of plunder on the French frontier, and some of the men wanted to take it, he said: "Soldiers, do not touch that; God will take care of us; He will take care of the English army; plenty of plunder, I know, all around, but do not take it." He told the story afterward himself, how that the French people brought to him their valuables to keep—he supposed to be their enemy—brought him their valuables to keep. And then, he said, at a time when the creditors of the army were calling for money and for pay all the time, and they had so much all around about he did not feel it right for him to take it, or for the army to take it. An author beautifully wrote in regard to it: "Nothing can be grander or more noble and original than this admission. This old soldier, after thirty years of service, this iron man and victorious general, established in an enemy's country, at the head of an immense army, is afraid of his creditors. This is a kind of fear that has seldom troubled conquerors and victors, and I doubt if the annals of war present anything comparable to this sublime simplicity."

Oh, that God would scatter these fascinations about fraud, and let us all understand that if I steal from you one dollar I am a thief, and if I steal from you $500,000 I am five hundred thousand times more of a thief!

So there has been a great deal of fascination thrown around

LIBERTINISM.

Society is very severe upon the impurity that lurks around the alleys and low haunts of the town. The law pursues it, smites it, incarcerates it, tries to destroy it. You know as well as I that society becomes lenient in proportion as impurity becomes affluent or is in elevated circles, and finally society is silent, or disposed to palliate. Where is the judge, the jury, the police officer that dare arraign the wealthy libertine? He walks the streets, he rides the parks, he flaunts his iniquity in the eyes of the pure. The hag of uncleanness looks out of the tapestried window. Where is the law that dares take the brazen wretches and put their faces in an iron frame of a State prison window?

Sometimes it seems to me as if society were going back to the state of morals of Herculaneum, when it sculptured its vileness on pillars and temple wall, and nothing but the lava of a burning mountain could hide the immensity of crime. At what time God will rise up and extirpate these evils upon society I know not, nor whether He will do it by fire, or hurricane, or earthquake; but a Holy God I do not think will stand it much longer. I believe the thunderbolts are hissing hot, and that when God comes to chastise the community for these sins, against which He has uttered Himself more bitterly than against any other, the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah will be tolerable as compared with the fate of our modern society, which knew better, but did worse.

We want about ten thousand pulpits in America to thunder: "All adulterers and whoremongers shall have their place in the hell that burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death." It is hell on earth and hell forever. We have got to understand in Brooklyn, and New York, and all parts of this land that iniquity on Madison Square, or Brooklyn Heights, or Beacon Hill is as damnable in the sight of God as it is in the slums. Whether it has canopied couch of eider-down, or dwells amid the putridity of a low tenement house, God is after it in His vengeance. Yet the pulpit of the Christian Church has been so cowed down on this subject that it hardly dares speak, and men are almost apologetic when they read the Ten Commandments.

Then look at the fascinations thrown around

ASSASSINATION.

There are in all communities men who have taken the lives of others unlawfully, not as executioners of the law, and they go scot free. You say they had their provocations. God gave life and He alone has a right to take it, and He may take it by visitation of Providence, or by an executioner of the law, who is His messenger. But when a man assumes that divine prerogative he touches the lowest depth of crime.

Society is alert for certain kinds of murder. If a citizen going along the road at night is waylaid and slain by a robber we all want the villain arrested and executed. For all garroting, for all beating out of life by a club, or an axe, or a slungshot, the law has quick spring and heavy stroke; but you know that when men get affluent and high position, and they avenge their wrongs by taking the lives of others, great sympathy is excited: lawyers plead, ladies weep, judge halts, jury is bribed, and the man goes free. If the verdict happen to be against him a new trial is called on through some technicality, and they adjourn for witnesses that never come, and adjourn and adjourn until the community has forgotten all about it, and then the prison door opens, and the murderer goes free.

Now, if capital punishment be right, I say let the life of go with the life of the vulgar assassin. Let us have no partiality of hemp, no aristocracy of gallows. Do not let us float back to barbarism, when every man was his own judge, jury, and executioner, and that man had the supremacy who had the sharpest knife, and the strongest arm, and the quickest step, and the stealthiest revenge. He who wilfully and in hatred takes the life of another is a murderer, I care not what the provocation or the circumstances. He may be cleared by an enthusiastic court-room, he may be sent by the Government of the United States as Minister to Spain, as on one occasion, or modern literature may polish the crime until it looks like heroism; but in the sight of God murder is murder, and the judgment day will so reveal it.

Now, do not be fascinated by the glamour thrown over crime of whatever sort. Because others have habits that seem brilliant, but yet at the same time are wicked, do not choose such faults. Stand independent of all such influences. Put your confidence in the Lord God. He will be your strength. "Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord." Cultivate

OLD-FASHIONED HONESTY.

This Book is full of it. Old-fashioned honesty such as was spoken of by Dr. Livingstone, the famous explorer. You may not know he was descended from the Highlanders. Dr. Livingstone says one day one of the old Highlanders called his children around him, and said, "Now, my lads, I have looked all through our family line; I have gone back as far as I can, and I find that all our ancestors were honest people; there doesn't seem to be one rogue among them, and you have good blood. Now, my lads, be honest."

There are hundreds of young men in this house to-day who have good blood. Shall I ask three or FOUR PLAIN QUESTIONS?

Are your habits as good as when you left your father's house? Have you a pool ticket in your pocket? Have you a fraudulent document? Have you been experimenting to see how accurate an imitation you could make of your employer's signature? Oh, you have good blood. Remember your father's prayers. Remember your mother's example. Turn not in an evil way. Have you been going astray? Come back. Have you ventured out too far?

As I stand here sometimes looking over this audience, my heart fails me. There are so many tragedies present, so many who have sacrificed their integrity, so many far away from God. Why, my brother, there have been too many prayers offered for you to have you go overboard. And there are those venturing down into sin, and my heart aches to call them back.

At Brighton Beach or Long Branch you have seen men go down into the surf to bathe, and they waded out further and further, and you got anxious about them. You said, "I wonder if they can swim?" And then you stood and shouted, "Come back! come back! You will be lost! you will be lost!" They waved their hand back, saying, "No danger." They kept on wading deeper down and further out from shore, until after a while a great wave with a strong undertow took them out, their corpses the next day washed on the beach. So I see men wading down into sin further and further—further from God—and I call to them, "Come back! come back! You will be lost! you will be lost!" They wave their hand back, saying, "No danger, no danger." Deeper down and deeper down, until after a while a wave sweeps them out and sweeps them off forever. Oh, come back! The one furthest away may come.

"Oh," you say, "you don't know where I came from; you don't know what my history has been; you don't know what iniquity I have plotted; I have gone through the whole catalogue of sin." My brother, I do not know the story, but I tell you this: the door of mercy is wide open. "Though your sins be as scarlet they shall be as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." Though you had been polluted with the worst of crimes, though you have been smitten with the worst of leprosies, though you have been fired with all evil passions, this moment on your brow, hot with iniquitous indulgences, may be set the flashing coronet of a Saviour's forgiveness.

"Pleased with the news, the saints below
In songs their tongues employ;
Beyond the sky the tidings go,
And heaven is filled with joy.

"Nor angels can their joy contain,
But kindle with new fire;
The sinner lost is found, they sing,
And strike the sounding lyre."

THE SIGNS OF THE LAST DAYS.

Rev. F. Whitfield.

THE subject is an intensely solemn one, and I believe we are now in the midst of these scenes we have been warned should come to pass. I wish to call your attention to some of the signs of the end. Now, wherever we find a picture of the last days, whether in the Old Testament or in the New, it is a terribly dark picture, the only relieving feature being the coming of the Lord Himself; so far from there being an improvement it is evident everything is going from bad to worse, culminating in apostasy just before the Lord comes.

One cannot imagine how any one with the Bible in his hand can dream of a converted world before the Lord comes; there is not a single passage between the covers of the Book that gives the slightest countenance to such an idea. Now, when we speak of the characteristics of the age as described by Paul and Peter, men say, "Oh, but we have always had such men and such things. But our answer is, the Lord does not tell us there will be anything striking ere He comes; it will just be what has always been, but culminating to a point.

I believe the signs will be fulfilled in the most natural way—so natural that the world will not take notice of them, and none but the true children of God will be able to see these events as they come one after another. And I believe they will happen in a comparatively brief period, even as things now go on at high-pressure rate. We shall then, I believe, know simply by the culmination of these apparently natural events that the Lord is at hand.

Now the signs assume five aspects: 1st, the Jews; 2d, the religious; 3d, the social; 4th, the national; 5th, the physical aspects.

The Jews.—What is the meaning of the persecutions, the anxiety, the unrest with regard to the Jew? And the Jew is coming to the front everywhere, in preparation for that day when "God doth build up Zion." We have it clearly in Ps. 102 there is a set time, and that Psalm is being fulfilled before our very eyes.

The religious aspect.—What is one of the characteristics of Christianity both of Churchmen and Nonconformists? An impatience of doctrine; a deification of man; a rejection of Divine authority; an effort to pervert every Scripture that crosses cherished views.

Then the social aspect.—we have heard "there are raging waves of the sea foaming out destruction." And our Lord in Luke 21 speaks of seas roaring, and that, I believe, is the great sea of human life. Look around, Nihilism in Russia, Fenianism in England, Communism in France, the Black Band in Spain, Socialism in Germany, and there is everywhere Agnosticism and Scepticism; these all meeting together and culminating to the end. And partly social and partly religious there is Spiritualism—"the doctrine of demons"—and the waves of Rationalism and Ritualism, Universalism, and Annihilationism. The spirit of society is "do away with God," and see the disregard of the Lord's Day, and the spirit of politics before religion—all these are marks of the time before the Lord come.

The national aspect.—One spirit is manifested everywhere—in the nation, the family, in society—it is lawlessness. The tide of democracy is rolling in like a flood, and that is lawlessness. And God orders that the spirit precedes the person, so that the world, the Church, and Christians are preparing for the lawless one. This impatience of restraint and authority is everywhere.

And, lastly, the physical aspect.—Take the earthquakes; a scientific man said lately there had been more earthquakes in the last centuries than in all preceding centuries. There shall be signs in the sun, and we have had these.

It is not any one of these, but all of them converging to a point, to that time when the Lord shall come to take His people to be with Him in the air, and soon to come to Mount Zion, and all His saints with Him, to take to Him His great power and reign. Take with all these one practical word, "When ye see these things beginning to come to pass, look up."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Forty Years' Bedridden.—At a Recent Meeting Mr. Lee said: "I knew a woman in my native town who lay in bed with a diseased spine for forty years. Her summer and winter quarters were in one room. In winter she lay in a bed close to the fire; in summer she was carried to a bed a few yards away further from the fire. She was helpless, poor, and sick, but she was never in want. The fame of her piety and happy resignation was spread far and near, and many Christians visited her, and never left without leaving some tangible token of their sympathy."

Saved from Delirium Tremens.—At a Mizpah meeting, recently, Mr. Simpson related that "At Mr. Moody's first Mizpah meeting at Stratford, one man testified that previous to his conversion to Christ, he used to spend ten pounds per week on drink. He had the great blessing of a Christian, praying wife, who for seven weary years pleaded with God on his behalf. Her patient, persevering faith prevailed just as it seemed to be hopeless for her to go on trusting for his conversion. One day, after recovering from a fit of delirium tremens, he was convicted of sin, and saw that he was rushing down to eternal woe. The Spirit of the Lord brought light and salvation to him through showing him the suitability and sufficiency of Christ's salvation, and now he is rejoicing in complete deliverance from his old master—strong drink."

A Sunday-School Teacher's Surprise.—Mr. Peden related: "An experienced Sabbath-school teacher was recently requested to address a missionary meeting in the East End of Glasgow. On his arrival at the hall on the appointed evening, you may judge how great his surprise and gratification were when he learned that the missionary who was present was an old Sabbath-school scholar of his own, over whom he had prayed for long, but had never learned the result of his faithful work and prayers till that night, many years after the youth had left his class. It was the more gratifying that the boy had been one of the most troublesome that he had ever had under his care. He had, however, been constrained to accept Jesus as his Saviour, and in every way sought to honor and serve Him. He had devoted himself to His service in the foreign mission-field, and many have been won to Christ through his instrumentality."

His Child Drowned to Save his Soul.—"A gentleman, who held a good position in society, attended the house of God with undeviating punctuality, had a fine respectable family, read prayers every night, and, in fact, as people say, he was an exemplary man in all respects. Notwithstanding all this, he did not heed the realities of God. One Sunday, however, something or other caught his attention for the first time in the sermon, and after that he began to think that the minister was preaching at him. Very much annoyed, he threatened never to go back to the church; but as Sunday came round he was forced again to go to church, still he firmly resisted the pleadings of the Holy Spirit. The Lord then took another way of making him yield. One of his children was drowned in a mill-dam. This event broke his proud spirit, and with a sore heart he gave himself to the Lord. God is calling you by gentle means; do not harden your heart and deny Him admittance, but turn to Him lest He take stern and terrible means to break your rebellious spirit."

New Patients for a Doctor.—Dr. Cameron Related: "The incident which made me engage in evangelistic work was meeting with a returned prodigal, who had been blessed under Mr. Moody. I thought, 'This is a case Mr. Moody would like to hear about, I will tell him.' As we were crossing from St. Andrew's Hall to Berkeley Street Church, I said to Mr. Moody, 'So-and-so was blessed at such a time.' 'I am glad to hear it; but are you a Christian yourself?' 'Yes, I am.' By this time we were in the church. 'Well, you might speak to some of those people over there,' said Mr. Moody, 'I have no time to-night.' I answered, I really had no time, but my inward feeling was that such work was not for me; it was for Mr. Moody, Mr. Scroggie, and the like to do such a thing, but it was not in my line. I was a church member, an elder, and altogether very respectable. The next night, under the pressure of my conscience, though against my wishes, I went to the inquirers' meeting, and seeing two students dealing with anxious inquirers, I thought, 'If you can do it, I can.' That night I dealt with a minister's son, not a prodigal, but he felt that all was not right with him. When he decided for Christ, I felt a blessing come upon my own soul, and ever since it has continued with me."

"Old Charlie" on the Winning Side.—Mr. Pittendreigh tells the following incident: "In Peterhead, where I was laboring during the summer-time, I heard that a noted character had been converted. Being desirous to learn the details of his conversion, I visited 'Old Charlie,' as he was called, to get them from his own lips. On entering his house, I saw that his countenance still bore the impress of his former evil life, and noted that some of the marks of sin would never be effaced in this world. After the usual greetings, I put the question, 'Sir, are you on the Lord's side?' He answered, 'Ay, there's three o' us kens that!' I did not know what he meant, and repeated my question, 'Brother, are you on the Lord's side?' 'Ay,' he again replied in his blunt way, 'there's three o' us kens that.' 'Pray tell me who are the three?' I asked. Whereupon with a beam of light in his eyes, and with much reverence, he said, 'The Lord Jesus, the devil, an ma'sel. Blessed be His name, I'm on the winning side!'"

The Ladies' Song to a Sailor.—The Rev. Mr Andrews remarked: "We do not always see the result of our own labors, but frequently others do. I was up visiting one of my people in the Royal Infirmary one day, and saw in the next bed to his an old man lying. From the marks tatooed on his arm I judged him to be a sailor, which proved to be correct, as our conversation showed. I said to him, 'You are a sailor?' 'Yes, sir,' he answered. 'I am sorry to see you lying there.' 'You have no need to be sorry, sir,' was his answer; 'I am so happy I would not give it for all Glasgow.' Then I noticed that there was a peculiar bright gleam in his eyes, so I asked, 'How is that? you are ill with heart disease!' His reply was—'When I was in the infirmary before, not this one, but the "Western," some very kind and beautiful ladies from the West End came and sang "Take me as I am." It was just the thing for me; I was an awful sinner. No one spoke to me directly about my soul or Christ as my Saviour, but I just made that hymn my prayer, and Jesus took me as I was. It is a fine thing to see these ladies coming from their grand houses to sing to the like of us.'"

Panic-Stricken Soldiers in a Thunder-Storm—A soldier said: "While serving with the army in India, at the Himalayan Mountains, I saw a sight which I never saw before nor since—British soldiers scattering panic-stricken at the sound of heaven's artillery. We were paraded for church, but heavy rain came on, and in obedience to the rules of the army, when the rain is too heavy for the soldiers to march to church, one of the officers prepared to read prayers inside the barracks. Just as we were ready to enter, a ball of fire flashed past, followed by a peal of thunder, which made us all quake. As the sound reverberated through the vast mountain ranges, the soldiers broke from the ranks, and fled for shelter. The sergeants and officers, being more under the control of discipline, stood their ground, though trembling with fear. I felt then as I never did before the awful majesty and irresistible power of God; but this feeling soon wore off. It was not conversion; it was simply fear. There are many whom the terrors of God-law make to tremble, but not all such find the 'peace unspeakable' through faith in Christ as their Saviour."

"THE TEACHING OF THE TWELVE APOSTLES" AND THE SECOND ADVENT.

A Letter to "The Episcopal Recorder."
By the Rev. J. T. Cooper, D.D., of Allegheny.

The Document Admitted to be Genuine—Its Pre-Millenarian Teaching—The Editors' Note—1. Why the Note was Required—2. Post-Millenarianism Excluded—3. Increasing Lawlessness Expected—4. Distinction between the Church and the Kingdom Recognized—5. Not a mere Emphasis of the Resurrection of the Righteous.

MESSRS. EDITORS: Your readers have doubtless heard of the Writing which, as it would seem, was discovered in the year 1875 by Bishop Bryennios of Serres in the ancient Mesopotamia. This Writing has only made its appearance lately in this country. It is entitled "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles."

The copy of this work which I have lately purchased contains an introduction by Professors Hitchcock and Brown of the Union Theological Seminary. These gentlemen say that "The genuineness of the document can hardly be doubted." They also say that "It belongs undoubtedly to the second century, possibly as far back as 120 A.D., hardly later than 160 A.D."

The object of this article is to call attention to the statement which this document makes in relation to the Second Advent of our Lord. It is as follows:

"Chap. 16.—Watch for your life'sake; let your lamps not go out, and your loins not be relaxed, but be ready; for ye know not the hour in which our Lord cometh. But ye shall come together often, and seek the things which befit your souls; for the whole time of your faith thus far will not profit you, if ye do not become perfect in the last time. For in the last days the false prophets and the corruptors shall be multiplied, and the sheep shall be turned into wolves, and love shall be turned into hate; for they shall hate one another, and shall persecute and shall deliver up, and then shall appear the world-deceiver as the Son of God, and shall do signs and wonders, and the earth shall be given into his hands, and he shall commit iniquities which have never yet been done since the beginning.

"Then all created men shall come into the fire of trial, and many shall be made to stumble and shall perish. But they that endure in their faith shall be saved from this curse. And then shall appear the signs of the truth; first the sign of an opening in heaven, then the sign of the trumpet's sound, and thirdly, the resurrection of the dead; yet not of all, but as it hath been said: The Lord will come and all the saints with Him. Then shall the world see the Lord coming upon the clouds of heaven."

I think it is not too much to say that any one who has any acquaintance with the controversy that has been going on in the Church in relation to the Second Advent would unhesitatingly draw the conclusion, if he were to read the foregoing without knowing anything in relation to its authorship, that it was written by a Seiss, or a Bonar, or some other anti-post-millenarian. I was, therefore, not a little surprised to find the learned professors of the Union Theological Seminary, who have edited this document, expressing themselves as follows:

"The document concludes with a vision of the Lord coming upon the clouds of heaven, and all the saints with Him. The Resurrection is of the dead, though 'not of all the dead.' Not a word is said of any second resurrection. If there is to be a second resurrection it is only implied. Of course no interval is indicated. Pre-millenarianism, accordingly, is not directly, perhaps not even indirectly, taught. Following the lead of the New Testament, as in Matt. 24: 31, and in 1 Thess. 4: 13-18, our document may, after all, only be emphasizing the resurrection of the righteous."

After reading the foregoing note something like the following thoughts suggested themselves to my mind, which I would beg leave to present to the candid reader:

1. If some at least of the radical and distinguishing views of those who are called pre-millenarians are not taught in this paragraph where was the call for this note? What suggested it to the minds of these brethren to guard the reader against the conclusion that

THIS DOCTRINE IS THERE?

Have we not in this fact pretty conclusive evidence that in the judgment of these gentlemen the intelligent reader would be very likely to say, Why, these old Christians must have been pre-millenarians!

2. The only ground on which these learned professors can claim, with any show of reason, that pre-millenarianism is not taught in this paragraph is that they had not the least idea of a millennium, or, in other words, a period of a thousand years in which there would be on the earth a reign of righteousness and peace. Now it is quite possible that this was the case, for it is only in the Apocalypse that such a period is expressly indicated, and this document makes no quotation from that book. No one knows certainly that its authors had ever seen it or even heard of it. But while this is admitted is it not clear as the sun at noon day that these Christians were actually looking for their Lord at that time?

3. The document not only excludes the idea of any specific period as certainly intervening, much less a thousand years, but it represents that intervening time as characterized by increasing lawlessness and wickedness. Notice the words: "Seek the things which befit your souls; for the whole time of your faith thus far will not profit you, if ye do not become perfect in the last time." And then we have a description of these "last days." Reader, are we not forced to the alternative of admitting either that these early Christians knew nothing of a millennium or if they did they could not have placed it before the Advent? Which of these will you take?

4. We have indicated the possibility that these Christians did not hold to the idea of a millennium; yet, if we look at other parts of this document we shall find it distinguishing between

THE CHURCH AND THE KINGDOM.

Thus in chap. 9 we have these words in relation to the Eucharist: "Just as this broken bread was scattered over the hills, and having been gathered together became one, so let Thy Church be gathered together from the ends of the earth into Thy kingdom; for Thine is the glory and the power through Jesus Christ forever." So also in chap. 10 we have the prayer that the Lord would gather His Church from the four winds into His kingdom. Now in view of the fact that the document so plainly distinguishes between His Church and His kingdom and that it does not mention heaven as that kingdom, it is submitted that a state of things similar to that which is presented in the Apocalypse may possibly be intended.

5. It seems to me that the way in which this document spaks of ought to satisfy every fair-minded person that these early Christians did not believe that there would be at the coming of the Lord any Resurrection but that of saints. I was not a little surprised, and I may say saddened in heart, to find these worthy brethren saying "our document may, after all, only be emphasizing the Resurrection of the righteous." Will the reader be so good as to look back to the language employed. The result will be, I am sure, that he will at once see in it far more than these editors profess to have discovered. Why would the authors of this document, after saying that as a third sign of the Lord's coming there should be "the resurrection of the dead; yet not of all," and in proof of this quote the Scripture—"The Lord will come and all the saints with Him"—why this language if they meant simply to emphasize the resurrection of the righteous? Such an inference never can fairly be drawn from these words. I do not know whether the authors of this document believed in the resurrection of the wicked or not, but I do know that they here assert that none but the righteous will rise at the coming of the Lord.

I do not attach any very special importance to this document even on the presumption of its genuineness. There is in it very little evangelical truth, and it contains nothing that is not with equal clearness and distinctness set forth in the New Testament. The object of this paper has been simply to express my decided disapproval of the treatment, in the way of exegesis, which it has received from the hands of these editors.

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

THE following narrative of a remarkable faith cure is furnished by a subscriber personally acquainted with the lady so singularly restored:

A daughter of Hiram Hutchins, D.D., pastor of the Bedford Avenue Baptist Church, Brooklyn, had been a sufferer from spinal disease for twenty-two years. Twelve years ago she was pronounced incurable by her physicians, and was obliged to retire from the ordinary activities of life. After that she became increasingly an invalid, other diseases of a serious nature supervening. At the time of her healing she had long been confined mostly to her room and very often to her bed. She was unable to shake hands or to wait upon herself. Very slight exertion resulted in violent illness. In January last, in the presence of her family, prayer was offered for her healing. An hour afterward she walked to church, where she gave her testimony, and shook hands with over fifty persons, after which she walked home, feeling perfectly well. She entered immediately upon a very active life, attending, during the next four weeks, twelve or fourteen services a week, making many calls upon the sick, etc. She goes alone long distances out of town on the Master's errands, and has never lost a day from illness. The curvature in her spine has also disappeared.

CONSUMPTION CURED.

The New York Tribune publishes a despatch from Cleveland, Ohio, dated April 18th, describing the cure of Mrs. W. H. Painter, the wife of a minister of that city. She was suffering from disease of the lungs and frequent recurrences of a most distressing sick-headache, which caused her prostration for days at a time. For many years the doctors have asserted that one of her lungs was entirely gone, and one year ago, while living in Brooklyn Village, her remaining lung became so much affected that for many weeks her life was despaired of. Since then she has been living at Fredericktown, where she was again prostrated with a severe illness, five or six weeks ago. As soon as Mrs. Painter rallied slightly she was taken to the home of her daughter, at Clyde, seemingly more dead than alive.

The change did not seem to bring much benefit, and for several weeks she had remained much prostrated, being able to sit up only a few minutes each day. She was visited by Christian friends, who encouraged her with the hope that there was yet power in faith in the Lord to raise one as weak as she. Grasping this hope, it was made the subject of special prayer for several days, until on Tuesday, April 15th, when reading in her Testament, she found a passage which confirmed her faith in the fullest degree. A few minutes later she was impressed with the thought that the work was done. She rose and went rejoicing through the house, shouting "Glory to God for His wonderful manifestations of goodness!" Since then, she declares she has had no return of her pain, and her sick-headaches have entirely left her.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Republican Nomination Continues to evoke numerous protests. It appears to be more widely disliked than was at first supposed. Though exceedingly popular in Western states, and though the experienced and energetic workers of the party everywhere loyally support it, some of the most prominent Republican journals and some of the most influential members of the party condemn it in unmeasured terms. In New York and Massachusetts especially, there is marked disaffection. Unless a decided change occurs between this date and November, New York will certainly not give its thirty-six votes for the Republican candidate. Whether the Republicans can afford to dispense with the vote of the Empire State cannot as yet be determined. At the last Presidential election the loss of the State would have been fatal to the success of the party's candidate. Some of the opposition to Mr. Blaine is based on the reports industriously circulated reflecting on his integrity in the past; but some of it is also due to apprehensions as to the future. Mr. Blaine's organs have been making a strong appeal to the Irish citizens to support him, on the ground that he will inaugurate a spirited foreign policy if he should be elected. One of them predicts his success distinctly on this ground. It says: "A distinctively American policy, a policy of determined industrial antagonism to British influence, will arouse intense enthusiasm among Irish-Americans. Nor will there be wanting other citizens who will remember how Great Britain behaved during the rebellion and how American commerce was chased from the seas by British cruisers." Though Irish-Americans may be longing for a conflict with Great Britain, a large number of citizens of native birth and of other nationalities are not so anxious for war, and are alarmed by these suggestions. They are probably only baits thrown out to catch Irish votes; but as business men desire a peaceable, dignified, conservative administration Mr. Blaine has, during the past week, lost favor among them to some extent by this kind of recommendation. Intense anxiety is manifested as to the result of the Democratic Convention. If its candidate should be one for whom disaffected Republicans could vote without loss of self-respect, he would evidently secure many Republican votes.

A Conference of Republican and Independent voters was held at Boston, Mass., on Friday, June 13th, to take into consideration the Republican nominations and to decide on a course of action. The call was signed by fifteen hundred citizens, some of whom have been among the most prominent members of the party in Massachusetts, and some assisted at the organization of the party. The general feeling at the Conference appeared to be that no steps should be taken for the presentation of an independent ticket until the Democratic nominations have been made, and an intimation was given that if those nominations were acceptable a third ticket would not be placed in the field. The chairman, Colonel Charles R. Codman, said: "We have no favors to ask and no bargains to make, but there are statesmen in the Democratic party for whom independent Republicans may vote without a blush. If the Democratic party wants our votes it knows how they are to be obtained. If it does not, we know how to withhold them." Others favored the formation of a new party. Prominent among those was President Eliot, of Harvard, who said: "I hope that out of this meeting will grow a new party as one was grown years ago. We want to found a new party in our country—a party of national principles and one which looks forward to a national triumph." A committee of twenty-five was appointed to proceed to New York to confer with the independent Republicans of this state.

Mr. S. J. Tilden Gave to the Press Last Week a formal and emphatic refusal to become a candidate for the Presidency. He was impelled to decline in advance by the knowledge that so many State Democratic conventions had either instructed delegates to vote for his nomination or had explicitly favored it by resolution. The unanimity of this sentiment in his favor led to the belief that Mr. Tilden would be nominated by acclamation. To prevent inconvenience and embarrassment he therefore published his letter stating the reasons why he could not accept the nomination. They were mainly, that the duties that would devolve on a Democratic President would be of a very onerous character, requiring energy and strength for their efficient performance, and that his advanced age and physical infirmities unfit him to undertake them. His refusal is a source of disappointment to his friends, who, nevertheless, respect his motives. The candidates whose names are now most favored are Senator Bayard, of Delaware, Governor Hoadly and Senator Payne, of Ohio, and Governor Cleveland, of New York. Many Republicans in New York would vote for the last named if he were nominated. His supporters at the election for Governor included many Republicans, who, since the election, have approved his conduct in the chair.

The Charges of Fraud against Brigadier-General Swaim are to be investigated by a court-martial. The announcement causes widespread regret on account of the high position held by General Swaim as Judge Advocate General and because of his intimate relations with the late President Garfield. The regret is not that the General should be tried, but that the Court of Inquiry should have found the charges to be of a nature so serious as to warrant a trial. The President appears to have had no option in ordering a trial, as the Court of Inquiry was unanimous in its report. It said: "While the court is not prepared to say that any specific act developed by the evidence is actually fraudulent, yet the evidence does show a series of transactions discreditable to any officer of the army, and which especially demands the severest condemnation when engaged in by an officer holding the high position and peculiar relations to the administration of justice in the army held by Brigadier-General Swaim." General Swaim's acquittal after a full and fair trial would be a welcome issue of the unpleasant affair.

Lawlessness, the Prevailing Characteristic of the times, was the subject of Judge Gildersleeve's charge to the Grand Jury at the recent session of his court in New York. He said: "It is clearly manifest that offences against property of a most aggravated and appalling character are on the increase; that a spirit of lawlessness, bred of extravagance or greed of great riches, and taking root in the numerous channels of speculation to be found in our city, has been spreading through the community. This spirit has developed a class of criminals from walks in life where we might expect to find those who respect our laws and have some regard for legal obligations and the rights of others. Gentlemen, the growth of this evil is alarming. While in obedience to the law we are punishing the low thieves from the sloughs and slums of the city for stealing small sums, let us not neglect the guilty in high places who steal large sums, and are amenable to the same law."

The Mayors of Cities in which Gambling flourishes may wisely profit by the example of the Mayor of Boston, Mass., who has found a means of enforcing the law there. He ascertained that numerous gambling-houses were being run at full blast, not only in by-places, but in the most prominent thoroughfares of the city. The policemen whose beats covered these establishments neither disturbed them nor reported them. The Mayor suspected that these officers were in receipt of hush money from the gamblers, and he at once removed them and put on a set of men whom he could trust. This started the rumor that the Mayor had determined to remove the whole Board, for cause. In a short time all the gambling houses and haunts that could be found were cleared and closed, and the gamblers—said to be two hundred or more—turned out.

The Subject of Temperance was Considered by the general assembly of the United Presbyterian Church recently in session in St. Louis, and unequivocal resolutions were adopted indorsing personal abstinence and prohibition. The resolutions state that the assembly recognizes the question of temperance reform as one of the greatest moral issues of the time, and gives hearty and emphatic indorsement to the proposition that total abstinence is the only safe rule for the individual, and that the prohibition by the State of the manufacture and sale of all alcoholic liquors as a beverage is the true method of dealing with this monstrous evil. A resolution was also carried earnestly recommending church sessions to provide unfermented wine for communion purposes.

A Children's Sanitarium at Coney Island was opened on Thursday last. It is the gift of Mr. D. Willis James, who expended $10,000, upon it. Other philanthropists have contributed to the cost of furnishing it. The building is to be managed by the Children's Aid Society, which intends, during the latter part of this month, to send deformed, sickly, and convalescent children from asylums and institutions, and in July and August poor mothers with infants suffering from cholera infantum or intestinal disorders. Each party of seventy mothers and children will probably spend a week at the Home. In certain cases mothers and infants will be sent down for the day for the change of air. The design of the institution and the liberality of its promoters cannot be too highly commended. The poor little creatures for whose benefit it is established have claims on our kindness which have been too much overlooked. The Children's Aid Society has also received from Mrs. R. L. Stuart, who is now in Europe, a gift of $50,000 to be used in building, on the east side of the city, a lodging-house for homeless boys. This will be the fifth house of this kind endowed by friends of the Children's Aid Society.

A Cheque for Fifty Dollars, Received at the office of the CHRISTIAN HERALD from a missionary in China last week, is a gratifying evidence of the usefulness of the paper. In the letter accompanying the cheque the missionary states that the copies now being sent there are not sufficient to supply the demand; "They are read so much that they are worn out before they can be bound." The proprietors of the paper and those engaged in work upon it count such testimonies of appreciation as this among the most encouraging results of the enterprise.

Mrs. M. L. Shipman, the English Lady evangelist, has just concluded a series of special services at Girardville, Pa. The meetings were largely attended, and at every meeting some souls were brought into the light. Mrs. Shipman desires to express her thanks for much sympathy and the prayers of God's people during her illness. Her throat, though much better than it was a month ago, is still seriously affected.

Miss Clara Barton's Labor among the Sufferers by the floods in the South-west is still going forward. She reports to the Red Cross Association, of which she is President, that having completed the work along the Lower Mississippi, she is now moving slowly up the Ohio River, with the Red Cross steamer, on her return home. She stops at out-of-the-way places, where much distress still exists, and has supplied hundreds of destitute families with household supplies that could not otherwise have been acquired in months. Miss Barton reports vast tracts of country in the Lower Mississippi Valley as still under water and the suffering as extreme. Much stock must perish, notwithstanding the timely Government aid and the generous responses to the Red Cross appeal. She is still shipping supplies to the local societies South, and will keep one general agent in the field until the calls for help cease.

The Breaking of a Cable Led to a Serious Loss of property and the sacrifice of three lives in Montana, on June 9th. Near the town of Thompson in that territory there are some dangerous falls. The Bitter Root River, which contracts just below Thompson to a quarter of a mile in width, is very rapid, and from ten to thirty feet deep. The miners on the way to the Cœur-de-Lion region to find the trail to the gold fields are carried over at that point in a ferry-boat drawn by a cable. Experience showed that by no other means could safety be insured, as the river there is a perfect torrent. On the day of the accident the boat was loaded with pack-horses and supplies for Eagle City, and there were eight passengers beside the ferry-man. When near the centre of the river the cable parted, and the boat was carried with lightning rapidity over the falls. Five of the passengers and the ferryman jumped out on the rocks, and were afterward rescued, but three passengers were drowned. It seems inexplicable that a cable, on the strength of which so much depended, should have been allowed to become defective. In approaching the river of death the Christian has no fear that such a catastrophe will befall him. Having trusted his soul to Christ, he is sure that He is able to bring it safely into the haven of rest and happiness (Isa. 43 : 2).

A Serious Cave-in of the Earth near Wilkesbarre, Penn., occurred on June 9th. Just before midnight the people of Poke's Hollow were startled from their slumbers by a loud report and a rocking sensation, like that produced by an earthquake. They dressed hurriedly, and proceeded to examine their houses and the neighborhood with lanterns. They soon discovered that the earth had caved in over a mine. Large fissures in the earth, running a distance of one hundred yards, were discovered. The surface for about four acres had sunk fully seven inches, and in many places ten inches. The foundations of eighteen houses were completely knocked from under them, so that they toppled on one side. One of the men living there was awakened by his three children rolling out of bed. The family were removed as soon as possible to a place of safety. That house became a complete wreck, and the others are in a bad condition. All the families have moved out, and at present find quarters in their neighbors' houses. The bottoms of all the wells have fallen out, and the waters rushed into the mine below. It was considered by experts that a further drop of the earth might be expected at any moment, and the inmates of the wrecked houses were warned not to return to their places of abode under any circumstances. One would have thought that the warning would not have been required after such an experience. In the affairs of life men are usually too cautious to dwell in such insecurity, though in spiritual matters they live without concern in a position far more perilous (1 Thess. 5 : 3).

The Richest Little Girl in the World is Said by a Washington journal to be the daughter of a captain in the Navy, well known in that city. She is one of the heiresses of her maternal grandfather, a millionaire, who died not long ago in Boston, Mass. Under his will she inherits seven million dollars and twenty thousand dollars a year left for her education and support until she attains her majority. The child is only seven years old. She is doubtless the object of envy to many who know of her expectations, who wish that they had happened to have been descendants of the old millionaire. Yet when such people are told of a greater inheritance which they may enjoy, becoming heirs of God and of eternal riches, they pay no heed, and despise those who do enjoy that privilege (James 2 : 5).

A Disappointed Lover Committed Suicide at Minneapolis, Minn., on June 13th. Most of his life had been spent in the mountains, where he had succeeded in amassing a large fortune. Having become rich, he about a month ago went East to marry a lady to whom he had been attached from boyhood. On his arrival he found that the lady was already married, and his disappointment was intense. The prospect of marrying her had been his incentive to labor and his consolation in solitude during many years. To have his cup of happiness dashed from his lips just at the time when all obstacles seemed to be removed, was a blow under which his mind reeled. He went back West, and blew out his brains. He is not the first man by thousands who has toiled many years for love of a woman, and lost her after all. Like those who make ambition, or money, or pleasure their supreme end in life, they have cried in the end, "All is vanity." Only they who give themselves and their lives to God and His service are certain of their reward (Col. 3 : 23, 24).

Red Tape in Hospital Management Sometimes leads to inhumanity. On June 11th a young man hurriedly summoned a physician to attend a patient lying ill on a barge in the North River opposite Fourteenth Street, New York. When the physician arrived he found a man in need of prompt hospital treatment, and advised that an ambulance be called. The son of the sick man went to a police station for the purpose, but the police said their precinct did not extend to the river, and they therefore had no authority to act in the matter. The sergeant at the desk referred him to Bellevue Hospital. Thither he went, and was told that his request could not be granted, as the barge was not in the hospital district. He was referred this time to St. Vincent's Hospital as being the proper place to apply. On making application there he was met with the reply that the hospital authorities could not take the patient, as their district only extended to the south side of Fourteenth Street. These inquiries had consumed the whole day, and the man might have died if the physician first summoned had not, on being informed of the facts, insisted on the officials doing their duty without further dispute. There is reason to fear that many godless people needing spiritual assistance are similarly left to perish because they lie outside the beaten paths of Christian effort (Luke 10 : 29).

THE FIRST FRUIT OF THE SPIRIT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But the fruit of the Spirit is love."—GALATIANS 5 : 22.

Man's Worst Enemy—Two Displays of Love—I. A Winnowing Fan—What it Blows Away—Counterfeit Love to Man—Lust a Devil—Its Kindred—Its Victims—Counterfeit Love to God—All Forms of Hate—Self-Indulgence—II. A Jewel—First on the List—Not Amiability—Naturally Sour People—III. A Picture—A Fruit Picture—Sticky Talk—IV. A Crown—The Love in the Heart—Special Adoration for the Holy Ghost.

THE worst enemy we have is the flesh. Augustine used frequently to pray, "Lord, deliver me from that evil man, myself." All the fire which the devil can bring from hell could do us little harm if we had not so much fuel in our nature. It is the powder in the magazine of the old man which is our perpetual danger. When we are guarding against foes without, we must not forget to be continually on our watch-tower against the foe of foes within. "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit." On the other hand, our best friend, who loves us better than we love ourselves, is the Holy Spirit.

It would not be proper to compare the love of the Spirit with the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, so as even by implication to set up a scale of degrees in love; for the love of the regenerating Spirit is infinite, even as is the love of the redeeming Son. But yet for a moment we will set these side by side. Is not the indwelling of the Spirit of God equal in loving-kindness to the incarnation of the Son of God? Jesus dwelt in a pure manhood of His own; the Holy Spirit dwells in our manhood, which is fallen, and as yet imperfectly sanctified. Jesus dwelt in His human body, having it perfectly under His own control; but alas! the Holy Spirit must contend for the mastery within us; and though He is Lord over our hearts, yet there is an evil power within our members, strongly intrenched and obstinately bent on mischief. "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh."

The Holy Ghost when He comes into us is the author of all our desires after true holiness. He strives in us against the flesh. That holy conflict which we wage against our corruption cometh entirely of Him. We should sit down in willing bondage to the flesh, if He did not bid us strike for liberty. The good Spirit also leads us in the way of life. If we be led of the Spirit, says the apostle, we are not under the law. He leadeth us by gentle means, drawing us with cords of love, and bands of a man. "He leadeth me."

The Holy Ghost not only creates the inward contest against sin, and the agonizing desire for holiness, and leads us onward in the way of life, but He remains within us, taking up His residence, and somewhat more; for the text suggests a still more immovable steadfastness of residence in our hearts, since, according to the figure, the Spirit strikes root within us. The text speaks of "fruit," and fruit cometh only of a rooted abidance; it could not be conceived of in connection with a transient sojourning, like that of a wayfaring man. The stakes and tent pins that are driven into the ground for an Arab's tent bear no fruit, for they do not remain in one stay; and inasmuch as I read of the "fruit of the Spirit," I take comfort from the hint, and conclude that He intends to abide in our souls as a tree abides in the soil when fruit is borne by it.

I. Now, coming to our text, I shall notice the matters contained in it, and the first thing which my mind perceives is

A WINNOWING FAN.

I would like to be able to use it, but it is better far that it should remain where it is, for "the fan is in His hand, and He will thoroughly purge His floor." The handle of this winnowing fan is made of the first word of the text, that disjunctive conjunction, that dividing monosyllable, "But." "But the fruit of the Spirit is love!"

That "but" is placed there because the apostle had been mentioning certain works of the flesh, all of which he winnows away like chaff, and then sets forth in opposition to them "the fruit of the Spirit." If you will read the chapter, you will notice that the apostle has used no less than seventeen words, I might almost say eighteen, to describe the works of the flesh. Human language is always rich in bad words, because the human heart is full of the manifold evils which these words denote. Nine words are here used to express the fruit of the Spirit; but to express the works of the flesh —see how many are gathered together!

The first set of these works of the flesh which have to be winnowed away are the counterfeits of love to man.

is one of the vilest things under heaven. That heavenly word, love, has been trailed in the mire of unclean passion and filthy desire. The licentiousness, which comes of the worship of Venus, has dared to take to itself a name which belongs only to the pure worship of Jehovah. Now, the works which counterfeit love are these: "adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness." To talk of "love" when a man covets his neighbor's wife, or when a woman violates the command, "Thou shalt not commit adultery," is little less than sheer blasphemy against the holiness of love. It is not love, but lust; love is an angel, and lust a devil. The purities of domestic life are defiled, and its honors are disgraced when once the marriage bond is disregarded. When men or women talk of religion, and are unfaithful to their marriage covenant, they are base hypocrites. Even the heathen condemned this infamy; let not Christians tolerate it.

The next fleshly work is "fornication," which was scarcely censured among the heathen, but is most sternly condemned by Christianity. It is a wretched sign of the times that in these corrupt days some have arisen who treat this crime as a slight offence, and even attempt to provide for its safer indulgence by legislative enactments. Has it come to this? Has the civil ruler become a panderer to the lusts of corrupt minds? Let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints. "Uncleanness" is a third work of the flesh, and it includes those many forms of foul offence which defile the body and deprive it of its true honor; while to bring up the rear we have "lasciviousness," which is the cord which draws on uncleanness, and includes all conversation which excites the passions, all songs which suggest lewdness, all gestures and thoughts which lead up to

UNLAWFUL GRATIFICATION.

We have sadly much of these two evils in these days, not only openly in our streets, but in more secret ways. I loathe the subject. All works of art which are contrary to modesty are here condemned, and the most pleasing poetry, if it creates impure imaginations. These unclean things are the works of the flesh in the stage of putridity—the very maggots which swarm within a corrupt soul. Bury these rotten things out of our sight! I do but uncover them for an instant that a holy disgust may be caused in every Christian soul; and that we may flee therefrom as from the breath of pestilence.

Yet remember, oh you that think yourselves pure, and imagine you would never transgress so badly, that even into these loathsome and abominable criminalities high professors have fallen; ay, and sincere believers trusting in themselves have slipped into this ditch, from whence they have escaped with infinite sorrow, to go with broken bones the rest of their pilgrimage. Alas, how many who seemed to be clean escaped from pollution have so fallen that they have had to be saved so as by fire! Oh, may we keep our garments unspotted by the flesh; and this we cannot do unless it be in the power and energy of the Spirit of holiness. He must purge these evils from us, and cause His fruit so to abound in us that the deeds of the flesh shall be excluded forever.

The winnowing fan is used next against the counterfeits of love to God; I refer to the falsities of superstition—

"IDOLATRY AND WITCHCRAFT"—

"but the fruit of the Spirit is love." Alas! there are some that fall into idolatry; for they trust in an arm of flesh, and exalt the creature into the place of the Creator; "their God is their belly, and they glory in their shame." The golden calf of wealth, the silver shrines of craft, the goddess of philosophy, the Diana of fashion, the Moloch of power, these are all worshipped instead of the living God. Those who profess to reverence the true God, yet too generally worship Him in ways which He has not ordained. What sensuous worship is now approved? Men cannot worship God nowadays unless their eyes, and ears, and noses are gratified; when these senses of the flesh are pleased, they are satisfied with themselves; "but the fruit of the Spirit is love." It ill-becomes us to make that gaudy which should be simple and spiritual. The fruit of the Spirit is not idolatry—the worship of another god, or of the true God after the manner of will worship. No, that fruit is obedient love to the only living God.

"Witchcraft," too, is a work of the flesh. Under this head we may rightly group all that prying into the unseen, that rending of the veil which God has hung up, that interfering with departed spirits, that necromancy which calls itself spiritualism, and pays court to familiar spirits and demons—this is no fruit of the Spirit, but the fruit of a bitter root. Brother Christians, modern witchcrafts and wizardry are to be abhorred and condemned, and you will be wise to keep clear of them, trembling to be found acting in concert with those who love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil.

But next, this great winnowing-fan drives away with its "but" all the

FORMS OF HATE.

The apostle mentions "hatred," or an habitual enmity to men, usually combined with a selfish esteem of one's own person. Certain men cherish a dislike to everybody who is not of their clique, while they detest those who oppose them. They are contemptuous to the weak, ready to take offence, and little careful whether they give it or no. They delight to be in minorities of one, and the more wrongheaded and pugnacious they can be, the more are they in their element. "Variance," too, with its perpetual dislikes, bickerings, and quarrellings, is a work of the flesh. Those who indulge in it are contrary to all men, pushing their angles into everybody's eyes, and looking out for occasions of fault-finding and strife. "Emulations" —that is, jealousy. Jealousy in all its forms is one of the works of the flesh; is it not cruel as the grave? There is a jealousy which sickens if another be praised, and pines away if another prospers. It is a venomous thing, and stingeth like an adder: it is a serpent by the way, biting the horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backward.

"Wrath" is another deed of the flesh; I mean the fury of angry passion, and all the madness which comes of it. "But I am a man of very quick temper," says one. Are you a Christian? If so, you are bound to master this evil force, or it will ruin you. If you were a saint of God to the very highest degree in all but in this one point, it would pull you down; ay, at any moment an angry spirit might make you say and do that which would cause you life-long sorrow. God save you, men and brethren, every one of you, from the domination of these dark principles of hate, which are the works of the flesh in its corruption. "But the fruit of the Spirit is love."

Next time you begin to boil over with wrath, think you feel a hand touching you and causing you to hear a gentle voice whispering, "But the fruit of the Spirit is love." Next time you say, "I will never speak to that man again, I cannot endure him," think you feel a fresh wind fanning your fevered brow, and hear the angel of mercy say, "But the fruit of the Spirit is love." Next time you are inclined to find fault with everybody, and set your brethren by the ears, and create a general scuffle, I pray you let the chimes ring out, "But the fruit of the Spirit is love."

If you wish to find fault, it is easy to do so; you may begin with me and go down to the last young member that was admitted into the church, and you will not have to look long before you can spy out something which needs improvement; but to what end will you pick holes in our coats? Whenever you are bent on the growling business, pause awhile and hear the Scripture admonish you, "The fruit of the Spirit is love." When you wax indignant because you have been badly treated, and you think of returning evil for evil, remember this text, "The fruit of the Spirit is love." "Ah," you say, "it was shameful!" Of course it was; and therefore do not imitate it; do not render railing for railing, but contrariwise blessing, for "the fruit of the Spirit is love."

The winnowing-fan is at work: God blow your chaff away, brethren, and mine too!

The next thing which the winnowing-fan blows away is the excess of

SELF-INDULGENCE—

"drunkenness, revellings, and such like." Alas! that Christian people should ever need to be warned against these animal offences, and yet they do need it. The wine-cup still has its charms for professors. Nor is this all; it is not merely that you may drink to excess, but you may eat to excess, or clothe your body too sumptuously, or there may be some other spending of money upon your own gratification which is not according to sober living.

II. The second thing which I see in the text is —that jewel is love. "The fruit of the Spirit is love." What a priceless Kohinoor this is! We love the Father as He is. We love His dear Son as He is. We love the ever-blessed Spirit as He is. Following upon this, for God's sake we love the creatures He has made. It is true in a measure that

A JEWEL

> "He prayeth best that loveth best > Both man and bird and beast."

Every tiny fly that God has made is sacred to our souls as God's creature. Our love climbs to heaven, sits among the angels, and anon bows among them in lowliest attitude; but in due time our love stoops down to earth, visits the haunts of depravity, cheers the garrets of poverty, and sanctifies the dens of blasphemy, for it loves the lost. Love knows no outcast London, it has cast out none. It talks not of the "lapsed masses," for none have lapsed from its regard. Love hopes good for all, and plans good for all; while it can soar to glory it can descend to sorrow.

Love is a grace which has to do with eternity; for we shall never cease to love Him who first loved us. But love has also to do with this present world, for it is at home in feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, nursing the sick, and liberating the slave. Love is a very practical home-spun virtue, and yet it is so rich and rare that God alone is its author. None but a heavenly power can produce this fine linen; the love of the world is sorry stuff.

Love has to do with friends. How fondly it nestles in the parental bosom! How sweetly it smiles from a mother's eye! How closely it binds two souls together in marriage bonds! How pleasantly it walks along the ways of life, leaning on the arm of friendship! But love is not content with this, she embraces her enemy, she heaps coals of fire upon her adversary's head; she prays for them that despitefully use her and persecute her. Is not this a precious jewel indeed? What earthly thing can be compared to it?

You must have noticed that in the list of the fruits of the Spirit it is the first—"The fruit of the Spirit is love." It is first because in some respects it is best. First, because it leads the way. First, because it becomes the motive principle and stimulant of every other grace and virtue. You cannot conceive of anything more forceful and more beneficial, and therefore it is the first. But see what followeth at its heel. Two shining ones attend it like maids of honor, waiting upon a queen. "The fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace;" he that hath love hath joy and peace. What choice companions!

Love has this for its excellence, that it fulfils the whole law; you cannot say that of any other virtue. Yet, while it fulfils the whole law, it is not legal. Nobody ever loved because it was demanded of him; a good man loves because it is his nature to do so. Love is free—it bloweth where it listeth, like the Spirit from which it comes. Love, indeed, is the very essence of heart liberty. Love, moreover, is Godlike, for God is love. Love it is which prepares us for heaven,

WHERE EVERYTHING IS LOVE.

Mark, beloved, that the love we are speaking of is not a love which cometh out of men on account of their natural constitution. I have known persons who are tenderly affectionate by nature; and this is good; but it is not spiritual love; it is the fruit of nature and not of grace. An affectionate disposition is admirable, and yet it may become a danger, by leading to inordinate affection, a timid fear of offending, or an idolatry of the creature. I do not condemn natural amiability; on the contrary, I wish that all men were naturally amiable: but I would not have any person think that this will save him, or that it is a proof that he is renewed. Only the love which is the fruit of the Spirit may be regarded as a mark of grace. Some people, I am sorry to say, are naturally sour; they seem to have been born at the season of crab-apples, and to have been fed on vinegar. They always take a fault-finding view of things. They never see the sun's splendor, and yet they are so clear-sighted as to have discovered his spots. Such people as these have need to cry for the indwelling of the Spirit of God, for if He will enter into them His power will soon overcome the tendency to sourness, for "the fruit of the Spirit is love." Spiritual love is nowhere found without the Spirit, and the Spirit is nowhere dwelling in the heart unless love is produced. So much for this jewel!

III. I see in the text a third thing, and that is a rich and rare picture painted by a Master, the great designer of all things beautiful, the divine Spirit of God. What doth He say? He saith, "The fruit of the Spirit is love." We have seen many fine fruit pictures; and here is one. The great artist has sketched fruit which never grows in the gardens of earth till they are planted by the Lord from heaven. Oh, that every one of us might have a vineyard in his bosom, and yield abundance of that love which is "the fruit of the Spirit."

What does this mean? "Fruit," how is love a fruit? The metaphor shows that love is a thing which comes out of life. You cannot fetch fruit out of a dead post. A dead tree bringeth forth no fruit. God implants a spiritual life in men, and then out of that life comes love, as the fruit of the Spirit.

Love appears as a growth. Fruit does not start from the tree perfectly ripe at once; first comes a flower; then a tiny formation which shows that the flower has set; then a berry appears, but it is very sour. You may not gather it. Let it alone a little while, and allow the sun to ripen it. By and by it fills out, and there you have the apple in the full proportions of beauty, and with a mellow flavor which delights the taste. Love springs up in the heart, and increases by a sure growth. Love is not produced by casting the mind in the mould of imitation, or by fastening the grace to a man's manner as a thing outside of himself. We have known people who have borrowed an affectionate mannerism and a sweet style; but they are not natural to them; they are not true love. What sweet words! What

DAINTY PHRASES!

You go among them and at first you are surprised with their affection, you are a "dear sister" or a "dear brother," and you hear a "dear minister," and you come to the "dear Tabernacle," and sing dear hymns to those dear old tunes. Their talk is so sweet that it is just a little sticky, and you feel like a fly which is being caught in molasses. This is disgusting; it sickens one. Love is a fruit of the Spirit, it is not something assumed by a man, but something growing out of his heart. Some men sugar their conversation very largely with pretentious words because they are aware that the fruit it is made of is unripe and sour. In such a case their sweetness is not affection but affectation. But true love, real love for God and man, comes out of a man because it is in him, wrought within by the operation of the Holy Ghost, whose fruit it is.

How sweet is the fruit of the Spirit! I say "fruit" and not fruits, for the text says so. The work of the Spirit is one, whether it be known by the name of love, or joy, or peace, or meekness, or gentleness, or temperance. Moreover, it is constant; the fruit of the Spirit is borne continually in its season. It is reproductive, for the tree multiplies itself by its fruit; and Christianity must be spread by the love and joy and peace of Christians.

IV. Lastly, you see in my text

A CROWN.

"The fruit of the Spirit is love." Let us make a diadem out of the text, and lovingly set it upon the head of the Holy Spirit, because He has produced in the people of God this precious thing which is called "Love."

How comes heavenly love into such hearts as yours and mine? It comes, first, because the Holy Ghost has given us a new nature. There is a new life in us that was not there when we first came into the world, and that new life lives and loves. It must love God who has created it, and man who is made in His image. It cries "My Father," and the essence of that word, "My Father," is love.

The Spirit of God has so entered into us that He has caused love to be our delight. What a pleasure it is when you can preach a sermon full of love to those to whom you preach it, or when you can visit the poor, full of love to those you relieve! To stand on the street corner and tell out of Jesus' dying love—why, it is no irksome task to the man who does it lovingly; it is his joy and his recreation.

Now, my dear hearer, have you this love in your heart? Judge by your relation to God. Do you live without prayer? Do you very seldom read God's Word? Are you getting indifferent as to whether you go and worship with His people? Ah, then, be afraid that the love of God is not in you! But if you feel that everything that has to do with God you love—His work, His service, His people, His day, His book—and that you do all that in you lies to spread His kingdom, both by prayer, by word of mouth, by your liberality, and by your example; if you do love you can easily see it, I think, and there are many ways by which

YOU CAN TEST YOURSELF.

Well, suppose that to be satisfactorily answered, then I have this further question: Do you and I—who can say, "Lord, thou knowest that I love Thee"—do we sufficiently bless the Holy Spirit for giving us this jewel of love? If you love Christ, then say, "This love is given to me; it is a rare plant, an exotic, it never sprang out of my natural heart. Weeds will grow apace there, but not this fair flower." Bless the Holy Spirit for it. "Oh, but I do not love God as I ought!" No, brother, I know you do not, but bless Him that you love Him at all.

Do be grateful to the Holy Ghost. Worship and adore Him specially and peculiarly. You say, "Why specially and peculiarly?" I answer—Because He is so much forgotten. Some people hardly know whether there be any Holy Ghost. Let the Father and the Son be equally adored, but be careful in reference to the Holy Spirit, for the failure of the church toward the Holy Trinity lies mainly in a forgetfulness of the gracious work of the Holy Spirit. Therefore I press this upon you, and I beg you to laud and magnify the Holy Ghost, and sedulously walk in all affectionate gratitude toward Him all your days. As your love increases, let your worship of the Holy Spirit become daily more and more conspicuous, because love is His fruit although it be your vital principle. To the God of love I commend you all. Amen.

A GERMAN WIDOW ENLIGHTENING HER PASTOR.

THE Rev. Dr Lyth, in his reminiscences of the life and work of the good German pastor Flattich, tells us that his first parish was Hohenasberg, and that its population consisted almost entirely of idlers and beggars. The clear-sighted eye of the new incumbent soon discovered the black spot in the social picture, and in his preaching, and especially in his pastoral visitations, he uttered his earnest protest against it. The effect of this kind of doctrine was soon evident. They were no longer to be seen wandering about in search of relief; nevertheless, that their old supplies might not be entirely cut off, they hit upon the expedient of sending their children into the neighboring villages and hamlets to collect the alms which they were now ashamed to ask for themselves. This made the matter so much the worse, and was no sooner brought under Flattich's observation than he lifted up his voice in louder and sterner rebuke.

Flattich ultimately had the happiness of seeing a parish which had before been composed almost entirely of beggars and ragged loungers transformed into a community of honest and industrious peasants, who could eat their daily bread with a hearty "Our Father which art in heaven."

Flattich relates a story of a poor widow in Hohenasberg, which is very instructive. "When I was in my first parish, which abounded with needy people, there lived in a cottage, not far from the parsonage, a poor old widow, whose movements I could easily overlook. Beyond the pittance she earned by flax-spinning she had no means of subsistence except the produce of a little garden which surrounded her humble dwelling, and supplied her with a moderate quantity of fruit, which she dried for the winter.

"As autumn drew on, and the fruit began to ripen, a number of destitute children from the neighboring cottages climbed over the wall, and committed sad depredations on the apples and pears without any sign of molestation on the part of their rightful proprietress. As if it only afforded her pleasure to allow the young urchins to steal her fruit, so soon as she perceived that they wished to slip into the garden she left the window at which she was sitting busy with her distaff, and turned her attention to her other domestic arrangements, and only returned to the window when they had eaten as much as they wished and taken their departure.

"At last I could endure it no longer; I hurried across the road, drove the young thieves out of the garden, and went into the cottage. 'Dame,' said I, 'you carry this thing too far. You allow yourself to be robbed of your fruit by these graceless rogues without ever interfering or administering a word of reproof. And what is most provoking of all, as soon as you see them coming, you go away from the window, that they may commit what havoc they please without interruption. Have you forgotten that winter is coming, and if you would have the means of subsistence you must gather in what little you have?'

"To this she quietly replied: 'My dear sir, don't be angry with me. Only come with me into the garden, and you shall see all the fruit with which God has blessed me.' Thereupon she took me by the hand and led me out into the garden, and with a stick she had in her hand she pointed me to the uppermost branches thickly covered with fine fruit, and far more abundant than in any of the gardens round about. 'See,' she said, 'the little fellows cannot climb up there; they only gather what is hanging below, and that I can cheerfully spare, for the poor children are hungry, and what I sacrifice below God lays up for me above.'"

ESCAPE OF A TASMANIAN EVANGELIST FROM BUSHRANGERS.

(See Illustration.)

The Rev. Henry H. Gaud, whose arduous ministerial career has now extended over a period of forty-five years, was a missionary in Tasmania thirty years ago. The scene depicted in the picture on this page relates to his remarkable deliverance from death by violence. The details of such deliverances are animating to the soul, and are in fulfilment of that blessed promise made by our Divine Redeemer to His servants, "Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." Not, of course, that we may suppose, when the hand of violence is permitted to fall on the ministers of Christ, or when they are whirled to their eternal reward amid the wild roaring of waves, that the promise is less fulfilled. In these cases, such ends formed a part of their mission. Great results were to be achieved. Hence the proverb that "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church."

The ministerial rides in Tasmania, though not so lengthy as in other settlements, are still long enough to tax the strength of an ordinary rider. Mr. Gaud found himself generally somewhat tired on Sunday nights, having preached three times and ridden from fifteen to twenty miles between each service. On the occasion referred to, two of the services were over, and the preacher was on his way to the third. As he rode, his thoughts were occupied with his sermon rather than with his surroundings; and the horse he was riding, one of the fleetest in the settlement, and of which Mr. Gaud, as a good equestrian, had reason to be proud, taking advantage of his rider's inattention, had gradually reduced its pace to a gentle trot. Suddenly, without an instant's warning, the bushes by the side of the path parted, and two men jumped out calling on the preacher to "bail up."

Mr. Gaud, like most preachers in the settlement, was a poor man, carrying little of value to the bushrangers, but he had no desire for an encounter with them. They might vent their disappointment at the smallness of their booty in ill-usage, and were pretty certain to rob him of his horse, which would be a terrible loss to so poor a man. Their appearance, therefore, was as unwelcome to him as to richer travellers. Time to consider what should be done there was none, but a silent looking up to God for aid is the impulse of every godly man when confronted with danger, and so the preacher offered an ejaculatory prayer.

The deliverance was sudden and complete. As the men sprang out, the minister's horse shied with a movement that would have unseated a less experienced rider. The rays of the setting sun shining on the gun-barrels of the bushrangers shot a gleam into the horse's eyes, which increased its alarm. It reared, plunged, and then dashed along the path with lightning speed. It was as much as Mr. Gaud could do to keep his seat. With an imprecation one of the bushrangers raised his gun and fired. The preacher heard the bullet whiz past his head, and knew that he was near death. The horse's alarm was increased by the report of the gun, and he put out all his strength in his headlong flight, putting his rider in fresh peril as he bore him away from the other danger. But the preacher was mercifully preserved. It was nearly half an hour before he gained control of the animal, and then the bushrangers were left far behind, and he was in sight of the settlement, and could see the walls of the building where he was to preach. As he reined up his panting steed a few minutes later at the door, he uttered a cry of thanksgiving from the depths of his heart. The sermon that evening was not the one he intended to preach, but a new one, the product of his recent experience. The little congregation listened intently as he dwelt with deep feeling on his text, "The Lord is my rock, and my fortress, and my deliverer. . . . The sorrows of death compassed me, and the floods of ungodly men made me afraid. . . . In my distress I called upon the Lord, and cried unto my God" (Ps. 18 : 2-6).

MARGARET SCOTT'S SUITOR.

"Good-by, Margaret, God bless you and keep you unspotted from the world." The words were spoken in a voice thick with tears by a man about fifty years of age, whose hair was thickly sprinkled with the snow of years, and whose brow was furrowed with the lines of care. He stooped, and tenderly kissed, as he spoke, a girl of about nineteen, who looked up at him cheerfully, but whose eyes were red with weeping. "Dear father," she said, "I know He will. The God of the country is the God of the city too. You have trusted Him all your life, trust Him now with your daughter. He is faithful."

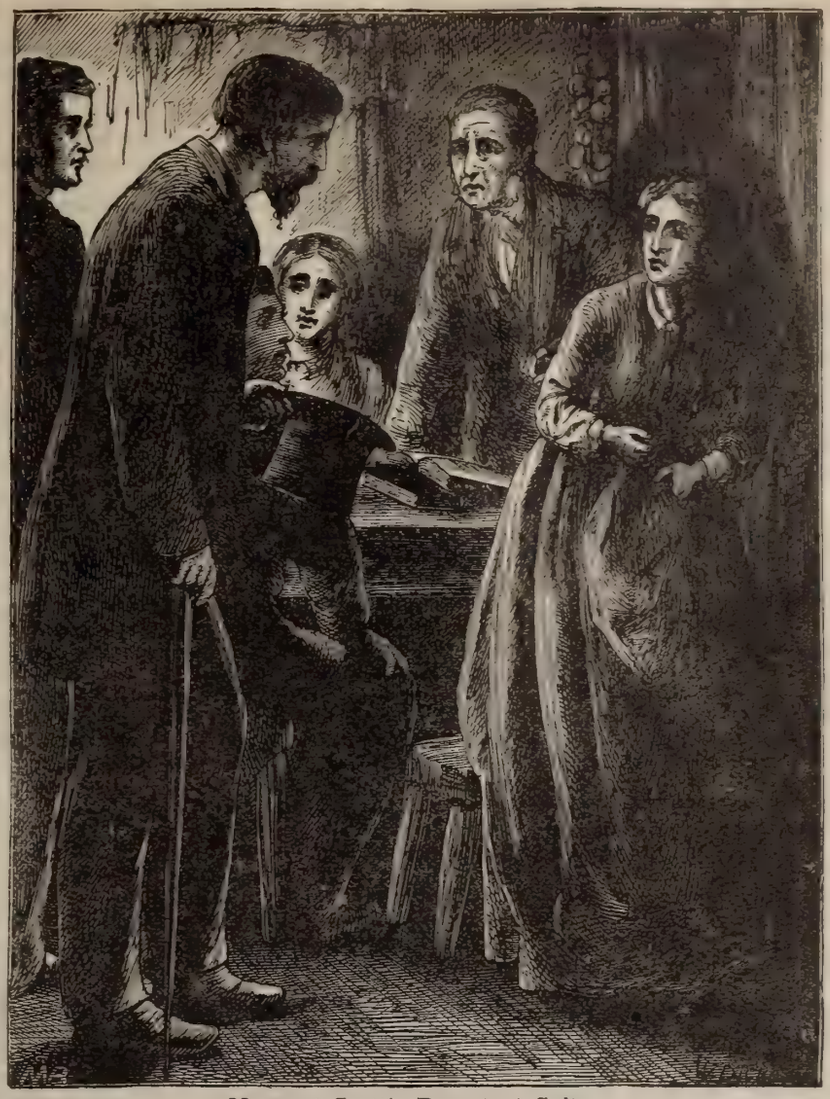
"I know, my dear, I know. He never failed me; I commit you into His hands, but it is hard to part. I never thought it would come to this. I bore the loss of property and the loss of friendship, and could see God's hand in it; but now I am losing my daughter, I am in the dark."

"Not quite, father. Your sight is dim, that is all. God's hand is in this as in all the rest. It was necessary for one of us to go. There is not enough for us all, and when this employment was offered me we all thought it providential. Robert will be through college in another year, and Mary will be getting married; then I shall come back to you. In the mean time I shall earn a little money, and you will have more to spare for yourselves. It is the best thing that could have happened. You must think that, father."

"I try, my dear, but it is very hard. If I had only taken my money out of the bank before it failed, you would never have had to go away. Oh, what a fool I was!"

"Too late to think of that, father. You acted for the best, and the loss was no fault of yours. Perhaps some day the bank will pay you some of it back again."

"Little hope of that, I fear, my dear; but I pray God may send me my daughter back." Another fond farewell embrace, and the train carried the girl off to her employment in the city, while her father stood by the track at the little depot wistfully looking after it until it was out of sight. Then he turned and walked sadly homeward.



Margaret Scott's Repentant Suitor.

It was a sad home to which the man returned. The rascality of others lay upon it as a heavy load. Only one more week would the unhappy man and his beloved wife and daughter be able to call it home. Henry Scott must leave the house in which he was born, and must see the familiar furniture and the dearly-prized associations of his youth scattered among strangers, sold to the highest bidder. He must go into an humble frame cottage, with the roughest and rudest surroundings, and live, as best he could, on the wreck of his fortune. Worse than all, there would be a gap in the family circle; the place of his dearly loved Margaret would be empty, while she toiled amid the dirt, and discomfort, and temptations of the city for her bread. As she testified, he was a faithful Christian, but in this matter he was trusting feebly, dimly.

"Here is a letter from Margaret, mother," Mr. Scott said, as he entered his wife's bedroom one morning some six months after these changes had occurred. "It will do you as much good as a whole bottle of medicine. The dear girl no sooner heard you were sick than she wanted to come right away to help to nurse you. I expected she would, but I told her she must not think of it. So she sends loving messages, like the good girl she is."

The suffering mother took the letter and read it, weeping tears of joyful affection all the time. The daughter's anxious affection cheered her, as her husband expected, but neither that nor medicine could bring her back health and strength. A few more weeks passed, and then Margaret was summoned, and arrived only just in time to clasp her dying mother in a last embrace before they parted, never more to meet in this world.

During the next year she wrote more frequently than ever to her father, knowing well that now the companion of his life had been removed he would, more than before, need her cheering, consolatory words. In one of her letters she alluded to a trial through which she herself was passing, and begging her father's prayers for her that strength might be given her to do right in painful circumstances. He was troubled about this, and looked forward with yearning to the time, now fast approaching, when Mary's marriage would necessitate Margaret's coming home to live with him.

It was a glad day for the fond father when a letter came announcing Margaret's return. It was the eve of the marriage. Everything was ready. The last stitch had been set, and all the arrangements were completed. The little family gathered around the table in the lowly home, and the father had opened the old family Bible to read a psalm and offer prayer. Robert was there, and Mary, and the young farmer to whom she was to be married to-morrow. The familiar words, "My heart is inditing a good matter," fell from the old man's lips, when a knock was heard at the open door, and a man entered the room. He was young, and tall, and dark, and on his sallow face were the marks of recent illness. Mr. Scott rose to receive him.

"Does Miss Scott live here—Miss Margaret Scott?" he said, not seeing Margaret, whose back was turned toward him.

Margaret rose when her name was mentioned, and confronted the stranger. That she knew him was evident, but her face was cold and stern. "Why have you come here, Mr. Vane?" she said. "You have no right to inflict this intrusion on my family."

"Miss Scott," said the man addressed, "I do not claim any right. I offer most humble apology to you and to your family for coming, but I have been very ill, and I have no hope in life but what you can give me. It is a matter of life or death to me, and so I thought you would pardon my intrusion."

All eyes were turned on Margaret's face as the stranger spoke, and her father, observing her reluctance, interposed. "You are a stranger to me, sir," he said, "but this is my daughter, and all that concerns her concerns me. While I trust I would never be rude or inhospitable, I cannot permit any one to inflict needless pain upon her. I must therefore ask you to state here what you have to say, and to do so briefly."

"I acknowledge the justice of what you say," the young man replied. "The fact is that I love your daughter, and a year ago I had reason to believe that she returned my regard. Unhappily I gave her cause to lose confidence in me, and, in justice, she rejected my suit. Since then I have had a serious illness, and have been near the grave. I have risen from my bed a changed man. God has pardoned my sins for Jesus' sake, and I longed to tell Margaret of my changed character, and ask her it she too could forgive me."

As Mr. Vane spoke the sternness melted from Margaret's eyes, and she sat down and covered her face with her hands.

"Sit down, sir," said Mr. Scott, "my daughter is agitated; she must answer for herself."

"Not now, father; let Mr. Vane go away to-night. He may come again to-morrow after the wedding, and then he can tell us all."

"You will hear my story, Margaret! God bless you for your sweet compassion," said the young man, and bowing a farewell to the little family he took his departure.

It was the old story of wrong-doing, of suffering, of repentance, and conversion that Mr. Vane told the following day. Father and daughter listened as the young man extolled the mercy of God in saving one so sinful as himself, and he spoke so earnestly and so humbly that Mr. Scott's heart was drawn toward him. He was satisfied that there was no hypocrisy in the statement, and when Margaret extended her hand to the repentant prodigal Mr. Scott also offered his hand and gave him welcome as a brother Christian.

A year later there was another wedding in the lowly home. Margaret had insisted on that interval, and Mr. Vane acknowledged that his past life justified that time of probation being demanded. As it was with Jacob, the year seemed to him but a few days because of his love. He begged that the saintly father of his bride would make his home with them, rightly thinking that the presence of the experienced Christian would bring a blessing to his home. Mr. Scott could not resist the pleadings of both the young people, and consented. In the comfort of the quiet happy family, ministered to by his beloved daughter, reverenced by her Christian husband, and loved by their children, he passed the declining years of his life, shedding upon them all the blessings that come from one who, during half a century, had walked humbly with his God.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A Fair Adviser.

CARL BRAMWELL was absent, but only in the sense of being absent in mind. He was seated on the low, broad window-sill, so absorbed in the study of a book which rested upon his knees, that he had not heard the tutor's knock nor the opening of the door. Miss Waldron had time to give him a lightning glance of criticism, and her heart leaped with joy, which sent the warm blood to her face. His features were of those which come from a long line of thoughtful and educated men; the fine thin spiritual face of a born scholar, scarcely concealing the ardor with which his mind was now busily at work over some favorite study. He was young, certainly not more than four-and-twenty, and his figure was slight and delicate. Just now the sun shone aslant upon his head, and displayed a profile of perfect regularity, with the lips upon the point of parting with a smile of keen intellectual delight. Miss Waldron had found the goodly pearl she had been seeking.

"Mr. Bramwell," said the doctor, laying his hand upon the shoulder of the student, who started from his abstraction with a fine glow upon his face, "I knocked, and as you gave no answer I thought your room was vacant, and I took the liberty of introducing some friends to it, as the best in the college. Miss Waldron and Mr. Waldron."

The well-known name carried no awe with it to the spirit of the young man, but he saluted the patron of the college and his daughter with an air of well-bred respect and welcome. He stepped aside for them to admire the view from his window; and when either of them addressed him, he answered freely but modestly.

"My time here is nearly finished," he said, in answer to a question of Miss Waldron's. "I shall have been in college three years, and shall have completed my course of study, so far. It has besn a happy time to me."

"Have you any church in prospect?" she inquired, with a palpitating heart.

"Not yet," he answered, smiling, "But I am not anxious about it. The doctor has promised to interest himself for me when my time is up."

"Would you be willing to give up the four or five months still belonging to you, and take a charge at once?" inquired Doctor Harvey; and Miss Waldron felt strangely disquieted as the student hesitated before replying.

"I would rather not," he said, "but I would be governed by your advice. My examination in the London University will come off in six months or so, but I am pretty well prepared for it already. If you bade me go, Doctor, I would go."

"Would you object to a small country church?" asked Miss Waldron, more anxious than ever to secure him.

"Not at all," he said, "especially for my first charge."

"Nor to a co-pastorate?" inquired Mr. Waldron.

"My colleague and I would both have to prove whether we suited one another," he answered.

"Have you any mother or sister who would wish to live with you?" asked Miss Waldron, afraid that she should not secure him free from female influence.

"I have one only sister," answered Carl, smiling again, "and she is about to be married soon to a young surgeon of the name of Grant, who is settled at Little Aston, near your residence."

"We know him well," she replied, graciously. "So your sister is going to be married to Mr. Grant. Father, I am sure we may open our proposal to Mr. Bramwell. His sister's residence at Little Aston would be an inducement to him to come to us."

Carl's face kindled and flushed as he instinctively caught at the meaning of Miss Waldron's words. To live for some years near to his sister and his friend appeared the height of human happiness to him, who had so often vainly longed for a home and domestic pleasures. With a small and pure church, into which no maxims or principles of the world could find an entry; with a pleasant home in his sister's house, and the companionship of the two relatives dearest to him upon earth—he could have no desire of his heart ungratified. He heard Mr. Waldron and Doctor Harvey discoursing, but he hardly understood them. All he was sure of at the close of the interview was that a co-pastorate at Little Aston had been offered to him, and that his almost monastic study had been visited by a being who had looked at him with a gracious and pleasant smile, and spoken to him in a voice set to a softer key than the rough, masculine tones of his fellow-students.

Carl Bramwell would have given his answer at once, but his cautious seniors insisted upon his taking a week to consider it. He received two letters of ecstasy from Grant and his sister. Their marriage was to take place in a few weeks, after which he was to have his home with them. Until that event he was invited to stay at Aston Court itself, to be introduced under Mr. Waldron's auspices to the church, and to be initiated by him and Miss Waldron in the onerous duties of a pastor.

It had occurred to Mr. Waldron, in connection with their choice of this young student, that nowhere could be found a more suitable match for his little favorite, Hester. The red-haired Scotchman he had rejected in his own mind the moment he saw him; but Carl Bramwell was certainly born for Hester, and she for him. He pleased himself with building a few castles in the air, for even elderly men will be guilty of this folly at times, and when Carl came he received him with an effusion of welcome.

Carl Bramwell quitted his calm student-life with a natural feeling of regret, but also with a glow of enthusiasm at the first view of the wide stream of human interests, with its restless tides, which was about to bear him he knew not whither. He went through all the usual emotions and sensations of one who is bidding adieu finally to the tranquillity of boyhood and study; but on the other hand he felt very intensely the fact that life was beginning for him in earnest, and he held his head erect with a new sense of dignity and responsibility. He was about to take upon his own soul the care of other souls. An unutterable and solemn tenderness filled his heart as he thought of these human spirits, frail, wavering between evil and good, tempted, sad, palpitating with the first germs of immortality planted in the midst of many thorns.

He prepared his heart beforehand for the love, half that of a mother, which a true pastor should feel for his church. How he would study his people! how he would watch over them! how quietly he would root up the choking thorns, and let the free air and sunshine play about the young buds of divine grace! This life, with its long hot days and weary weeks of labor, would be a hundredfold more worthy of a man than the serene egotism of a study.

There were other considerations which Carl's chivalrous ardor disdained to take account of. In the college he had been only one of seventy, each of whom had an equal claim to the attention bestowed upon them. He had had but the seventieth share of a pulpit. He had lived in a mass; been spoken to, looked at, fed, and generally cared for, as only an item in a large sum total. Now he was about to become the chief person in a circle, which, however small and contracted, would invest every word and action of his with importance and meaning. In a small church the pastor is even more an individual set apart than in the churches of great towns. Every one of his scanty congregation would have a lively and minute interest in him personally.

Of this future church of his, Carl knew two persons exceedingly well by report, and had for some months taken an almost extravagant concern in them. Grant had written often about John Morley and Hester, and Carl's interest had been keenly excited. Now that he was on the point of being brought into so intimate a relationship with them, he read over again the letters which had put him into possession of so much of their history; he found himself about to enter upon the stage of one of those romantic incidents which now and then are acted before us on our journey through life.

He met with a very cordial welcome at Aston Court, and was more impressed and affected than he was himself aware of by the suddenness of the change from the bareness and inelegance of his college to the wealthy luxury of Mr. Waldron's mansion. All about him suited his somewhat delicate temperament, and chimed in with a somewhat hereditary refinement of taste. Robert Waldron seemed to him a finished gentleman; and even Miss Waldron, to a young man who had known nothing of female society during many years, appeared pleasing and graceful. She had considerably modified her early rigor on the subject of dress, and assumed her dingy brown costume and unbecoming bonnet only when engaged in religious services. At home, and especially during the present epoch, she chose pretty colors and soft materials; and even condescended to employ a number of worldly artifices for disguising the ravages of time.

Yet toward Carl she adopted the tone of an elder sister, assuming a few years of seniority; in some degree the most flattering and most beguiling manner of administering to a young man's self-love. He was very soon persuaded that Miss Waldron was one of the most charming, as well as the most saintly, women of her times, only a grade or two below the perfection she sought to attain to. For she had confided to him, also, that the sole object of her life was her own sanctification and the welfare of her perishing fellow-creatures.

Robert Waldron was uneasy about this new protégé of his sister's, with a sharp jealousy of his ten years' juniority, and the freshness of his manhood, which still wore the glory and brightness of a morning without clouds. The first moment in which his eye fell upon the clear-cut features, and the scholarly refinement of the young pastor's face, and his ears heard the pleasant and pure utterance of his voice, he had instinctively, and with a tremor of dismay, pictured to himself Hester sitting in her seat at chapel, with her sweet pale face and her gray eyes, with the soul shining through them, lifted up in wrapt attention to the preacher's words. He hoped ardently that he was a fool, and he tested him. But Carl was no fool; his mind was vigorous and cultivated, and his tact wonderful for a mere student. It was true that upon many points he was ignorant of the world's customs and usages; but his very ignorance was a charm; it was the pure innocence of a soul which had never looked into the muddy depths of worldly ways. Robert could not help but like him; yet he would gladly have sacrificed half his fortune to prevent Carl Bramwell becoming the co-pastor of the insignificant church at Little Aston. But fate and Miss Waldron were too strong for him.

It was well for Robert's peace of mind that he did not happen to be present at a short conversation which had taken place a morning or two after Carl's arrival. The appointed time for introducing him to his future charge at a church-meeting was drawing near; but until then Miss Waldron had guarded her new acquisition from the intrusion of any unseasonable visitor. This evening he was to be received as co-partner with Mr. Watson in the presence of the assembled church; but early in the day a messenger arrived to say that the old minister was seized with an alarming access of his illness, and could not by any possibility leave his own chamber.

"The meeting must proceed as arranged," said Miss Waldron, decisively. "There will be the more necessity for it, as Mr. Bramwell must at once take upon himself the duties of the pastorate."

"And Hester Morley was to have been received into the church," observed Mr. Waldron.

"So she was!" exclaimed Miss Waldron, with a pause of deliberation; "what is to be done now, father?"

Carl had heard this name spoken for the first time with a quickened pulse and more attentive ear; but he waited a moment or two for Mr. Waldron's answer, which did not come.

"Who is Hester Morley?" he asked, with a slight hesitation in his manner, which escaped Miss Waldron's not very keen observation. It needed a very obvious emotion to be manifest to her rather dull sensibility.

"She is a young girl in my Bible-class," she replied, with an air of humility, "over whom I have watched most anxiously. She is little more than a child, and worse than motherless. But that is a painful topic to us all. Mr. Waldron was to have given her the right hand of fellowship to night, as next Sabbath is the ordinance."

"But cannot Mr. Bramwell receive her into the church?" suggested Mr. Waldron.

"I think not," she said, hastily. "Hester is very much attached to Mr. Watson, and he to her. It would be unkind to him. No, no. That will not do."

"I will see Mr. Watson and Hester in the course of the day," said Mr. Waldron.

"No, no," she urged, in a peremptory tone;

"it would divide the interest, and confuse Mr. Bramwell's thoughts, which should be centred on his own solemn obligations. Hester must wait."

"I have heard something of her and of her father from Grant," said Carl, still speaking shyly, and glancing about him to see if Robert was anywhere within hearing. "They must be among the most interesting people in our church."

"Well, I don't know," said Miss Waldron, rather sharply. "I think John Morley no more a Christian than any benighted heathen in foreign lands; indeed, in my opinion, he is worse. Hester is a white-faced, thin, overgrown girl, with very little to say for herself. We do not see very much of either of them; for, of course, they are in quite a different position from ours, and now that Hester is no longer a child I do not know that it would be well for her to visit here. I dare say you will see John Morley to-night, and if you can bring him to any better state of mind I shall rejoice greatly. You shall have my prayers in this, as in all your other important duties."

She looked up into his face with a smile of sympathy and sisterly interest; and the young man felt penetrated with a sense of gratitude to her. But it could not altogether blot out the thought of John Morley and his daughter, and the wonder whether Hester would not be admitted into the church that evening. As Miss Waldron had predicted, the mention of it only confused Mr. Bramwell's mind, which would otherwise have been centred upon his own solemn obligations. He remembered how Grant had once said of John Morley, "He would perhaps show his heart to you, Carl; but you will never come across him." Yet he was now about to enter upon a definite relationship with this very man, which would give him almost a right to seek his confidence. As for Hester, he felt a little disappointed at the portrait Miss Waldron had sketched of her, and he could not help smiling at the different colors in which Grant had painted it. No doubt Miss Waldron was more correct than Grant. She had seen Hester grow up under her eyes, and had known her face well. It provoked him greatly that amid all the solemn thoughts of this epoch in his life, a shade of vexation should come across him as often as the idea of Hester intruded itself upon his busy brain.

S. S. Lesson for June 29, Ps. 106 : 13. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Psalmist's Resolve—Misconceptions of God—Waiting for Feeling—God Holding out a Gift—The Question to the Blind Men—Confidence Demanded—Why Consecration is not Enjoyed—What God Offers—Promises are Possessed Inheritances—The Duty Receiving not Pleading—Joshua's Confidence.

"WHAT shall I render unto the Lord for all His benefits unto me? I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord." "I will take," I will show that I believe He means what He says, and that His promises are indeed "Yea and Amen;" indeed to be trusted (II Cor. 1 : 20). Such was the Psalmist's resolve. In every human heart by nature there is the desire to bring God to terms, and in some way to drive bargains with Him. Deep in our fallen nature Satan has sown seeds of distrust of God, which have only too surely sprung up and borne fruit. "Hath God said," first spoken in Eden, has been repeated by its first author again and again and again; and the most of God have been the result. A sinner becomes awakened to a sense of his danger; the Word of God is set before him, he sees there how Jesus has borne his sins in His own body on the tree (I Pet. 2 : 24), and reads the blessed words, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thine house" (Acts 16 : 31). But Satan comes and says, "But you don't feel you believe, you have got to get a strong feeling of your sins, and a strong feeling that you believe, and a feeling that you are quite changed, and a feeling of how happy you are; you haven't got any of these feelings." The sinner listens to his voice, begins to search his heart for something to bring to God, which will insure for him the sense of pardon which he craves, and meanwhile God is holding out His gift, and saying, "Take: 'whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely'" (Rev. 22 : 17). To believe and to receive is one and the same thing; "As many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God, even to them that believe on His name" (John 1 : 12). "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him [or receiveth Him] should not perish, but have everlasting life." When any one makes us a present, we must either take it or refuse it. The sign that we receive it is our giving thanks for it. Whenever a seeking soul is brought to see that God is offering salvation to him as a free gift, and that he has but to take the gift with joyful gratitude, he can say, "I will take the cup of salvation and call upon the name of the Lord."

In all His dealings with us God brings us to a point in which He calls us to in Him. When the two blind men came to Him, He said, "Believe ye that I am able to do this? They said unto Him, Yea, Lord. Then touched He their eyes, saying, According to your faith (or according as you receive) be it unto you. And their eyes were opened" (Matt. 9 : 28–30). Confidence is that which God desires at our hands. If we are in the habit of looking upon Him, when we are seeking blessing, as unwilling to bless us, as hard to persuade, we greatly wrong Him. And yet how often we hear it said, "I have consecrated myself again and again to the Lord; I have prayed Him to accept me and make me holy; I have tried my utmost to believe, but God does nothing for me." Were you counting on your consecration? was your mind dwelling on the value of what you were offering God? were you thinking of what all this cost you? Or were you occupied with Jesus, the sacred Altar of God, on which you laid your gift? "Whatsoever toucheth the altar shall be most holy" (Ex. 29 : 37); "the altar sanctifieth the gift" (Matt. 23 : 19). There is but one way in which sinner or saint is accepted of God, "He hath made us accepted in the Beloved (Eph. 1 : 6). If this is so, receive the fact that your consecration is accepted, begin to give thanks that it is so on the testimony of God's Word, take the cup of salvation in this respect, and call, not on your efforts at consecration, prayer, or aught else, but on the name of the Lord in whom you are accepted. You want to be sanctified, you offer yourself to God a living sacrifice. Well, you are accepted in the Beloved. Now, you? This is the will of God, even your sanctification (I Thess. 4 : 3). Will you take that will of God for you, and praise Him that it was His will before it was yours, and that it can never cease to be His will? Christ "of God is made unto us Sanctification" (I Cor. 1 : 30). Will you take this blessed truth to yourself and praise God? It is a grievous wrong to our God, if we are continuously pleading with Him to do that which He declares He does do, instead of praising Him with joyous hearts that He keeps His word. The lack of against feeling, against experience, against theology, against all else, has brought the Church of Christ to the low level at which she is.

WHAT DOES GOD OFFER

For this cause the Son of God was manifested that He might destroy the works of the devil (I John 3 : 8). The world and the Church are suffering physically and spiritually from the works of the devil. Why are they not destroyed in our experience? Only because we do not take what God has given us. God tells us that Satan's power is destroyed. As far as we take it by faith, we find it is so in our experience. God said to Joshua when He sent him to lead His people into the possession of the land of Canaan, "Every place where the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given you" (Josh. 1 : 3). The one condition was that they should themselves tread upon the soil, and thus take possession. Wherever we lean the weight of our soul's salvation on a promise of God, that promise is our possessed inheritance. God's divine power hath given to us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of Him that hath called us to glory and virtue" (II Pet. 1 : 3). How much of this glorious inheritance are we now standing upon, and claiming with joyous gratitude as ours?

Oh, how many we hear praying, and sometimes for years together, "O God, give me the Holy Ghost," or "Baptize me with the Holy Ghost," and very often in such a tone of voice as says, "I fear it is of no use." Has Jesus never said, the Holy Ghost?" Does the Word of God never command, "Be filled with the Spirit?" Why are not these petitioners over on the praising side saying, "I take the Holy Spirit of whom God has already given me the earnest in my heart (II Cor. 1 : 20; 5 : 5), and I praise the Lord that He does fill me, lead me, govern me." When God declared to Joshua, "I have given into thine hand Jericho, and the king thereof, and the mighty men of valor," and then directed him to set forward the priests to blow with rams' horns for seven days, and then on the seventh day to march seven times round the city, and then blow with the trumpets and shout—all in token of certain victory—Joshua saw nothing strange in the command. He took God at His Word, and saw Jericho as good as conquered already, and by their very shouts of thanksgiving, he and the people took the victory from the hand of the Lord. When Jesus said to the man with the withered hand, "Stretch forth thine hand," the man took the cup of salvation for his hand. He stretched it forth, not because he felt the power, but because he took the word of Jesus for true.

There are many sick ones who believe that Jesus has the power to heal them. They ask Him to do so, and then expect healing to drop from the skies. The same Jesus who bore our sins bore our sicknesses also. He has said, "I am the good Shepherd: the good Shepherd giveth His life for the sheep" (John 10 : 11). And from their hearts they have said, "Lord, I take Thee as my good Shepherd, Thou gavest Thy life for me," and they have really given over the shepherding of their souls into His hands. But the same Lord said, "I am the Lord that healeth thee" (Ex. 15 : 26); yet instead of beginning to praise Him that He does now undertake to heal, does now become responsible for their health and their healing, they wait for some sign, some feeling of healing. In their hearts they cannot really trust God. Had they been in the place of Joshua they would never have shouted until the walls had first fallen; they want to walk by sight and not by faith. Can God be untrue? If He says

"THE PRAYER OF FAITH

(i.e., the prayer which counts God faithful) shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up, and if he have committed sins they shall be forgiven him"—what are we to do if we put our case into His hands? Just what Joshua did when God said to him, "I have given Jericho into thine hand." Take the blessing, and praise God for it. But what if I don't get any better? In other words, what if God should break His word? The question shows you are not counting upon Him, not really letting the matter drop into His hands. Take the cup of salvation, and you will soon find to your great joy it is yours. "What things soever ye desire, when ye pray believe that ye receive, and ye shall have" (Mark 11 : 24).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Public Anxiety in England Respecting the conference on Egyptian affairs has been somewhat allayed, Mr. Gladstone having given an explicit pledge that no agreement binding the nation will be made until the House of Commons has had an opportunity for pronouncing judgment upon it. A statement has been published in a prominent English journal purporting to be the leading provisions of an arrangement with France on the subject. They are that England shall lend Egypt forty million dollars at four per cent interest; that the multiple control shall be re-established; that all the powers shall be represented in the new control, and that the president of the bank shall be an Englishman; the British garrison to remain in Egypt at least three and one-half years; the Sultan, at England's request, to send 15,000 troops to pacify the rebels in the Soudan and Upper Egypt. If those are really the terms of the treaty, the House of Commons is little likely to approve them. The joint control was productive of evil for Egypt and powerless for good.

The Fall of Berber in the Soudan is Reported. The British administration refuses to believe the report, but the press accepts it as genuine. It states that on May 23d the rebels made an attack at daybreak. There was a brave defence, lasting two hours, at the close of which the garrison's ammunition was exhausted. The rebels then made a rush, and captured the city and the garrison of fifteen hundred men, and the population, numbering two thousand, were slaughtered, the women alone being spared. If this report is true, the indignation against Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues will be general throughout Europe. Hussein Pacha Khalifa, the commander of Berber, was reputed to be the bravest and ablest pacha in the Soudan. He had 2000 women and children under his protection, whom General Gordon had sent down from Khartoum, believing that General Graham would open the road from Suakim. Hussein Pacha's last appeal has a pathetic significance. He recently telegraphed to Nubar Pacha, the Egyptian Prime Minister, as follows: "Are troops coming to my assistance? I can hold out a little longer." The serious nature of the news is increased by the fact that in attempting to rescue Gordon from Khartoum Berber would have to be made the base of operations.

Serious Riots Occurred in Belgium on June 10th. They were caused by the result of the elections, at which one half of the Chamber of Deputies were chosen. The Roman Catholic, or clerical party, was successful in electing its candidates. That party is unpopular with the workingmen, who, exasperated by its success, armed themselves, and did much damage in Brussels, Antwerp, and other cities. They attacked the Roman Catholic Library, destroyed the windows and shutters, and tore down the papal arms. The success of the clericals was achieved through the divisions in the ranks of the liberal party. The liberal Cabinet was anxious last session to pass its financial measures through the House, but the division of parties there is a close one. Twelve radical members held the balance of power, and would not support the Cabinet unless a concession was made to their demands in the shape of an extension of the suffrage. The Cabinet reluctantly promised the concession, but in fulfilling its pledge offended the more conservative of its own supporters, and a bolt resulted, which impaired the strength of the party at the polls.

Woman Suffrage in England has been Defeated by a decisive majority in Parliament. The bill extending the suffrage in rural districts being under consideration in the House of Commons, the advocates of woman suffrage proposed an amendment giving women the right to vote at elections of members of Parliament. Mr. Gladstone objected to the bill being burdened by a proposal certain to increase the opposition to it already existing in the House of Lords, and so rendering the rejection of the measure in that House inevitable. He announc that he would offer the strongest opposition to the proposal in his power, and would abandon the Franchise bill if the amendment were adopted. The women, however, insisted that their friends should go to a division. This was taken on Thursday, and resulted in a vote of 271 against the amendment and 135 for it, 31 Liberals only suporting the Tories, who expected to use the proposal as a means of embarrassing the government. Mr. Gladstone's speech indicated that he is opposed to woman suffrage on principle, though he argued against its insertion in the bill solely on the ground of expediency.

Organized Opposition to the Intolerable Conscription laws of France has been developed by the three years' Military Service bill, which is now before the Chamber of Deputies. Fifty-one chambers of commerce have addressed a memorial to Prime Minister Ferry against the bill. The petition urges that the productive forces of France in agriculture, manufactures, and commerce will be seriously checked by the time lost through the withdrawal of young men from trade. The petition also points out that this measure will increase the influx of foreigners, who come to France and gain employment to the detriment of Frenchmen. The expectation is general in Parliamentary circles that the bill will be withdrawn.

M. Bartholdi's Statue of Liberty Enlightening the World, which is to be erected in the harbor of New York, and is a gift from the French Republic to the United States, is now completed. The event was celebrated on June 11th by a banquet given by Mr. Morton, our minister in France, at which the French Prime Minister and other distinguished persons were present. M. Ferdinand de Lesseps made an eloquent speech, in which he said he hoped the statue would be a symbol of attachment between the two countries. M. Ferry said that the construction of the statue was due entirely to the initiative taken by Frenchmen who were friends of America. Vice-Admiral Peyron said that the Government would send a vessel to convey the statue to America. M. Bartholdi thanked the Frenchmen and the Americans who had assisted him in effecting his design.

The Discovery of Oil-Bearing Strata in India may have important results for that country if, as is supposed, the strata are extensive. The Government has decided to procure boring machinery to develop the resources of the region in which the oil has been found. The discovery took place at Sibi, near Quetta, in the extreme north-west of India. It will have an important bearing, it is thought, on the industrial development of India and in the solution of the Central Asian question. The discovery of a store of mineral wealth along the line of the railways which the Indian Government has decided to construct toward Candahar is also a significant fact. The plea raised for the continuation of the odious opium traffic has been that India had no other source of wealth. This discovery if it prove as valuable as is expected, will remove that plea.

An Account of a Diabolical Dynamite Plot is cabled by the German correspondent of the New York Sun. It was nothing less than a plot to assassinate the German Emperor, his eldest son, the Crown Prince, the Imperial Chancellor, and other royal and notable personages at the ceremony of inaugurating the colossal statue of Germania last September. Since the inauguration, information has been furnished to the German Government which indicated the existence of the plot. The commissioners caused excavations to be made in various places near the monument, and they have discovered a perfect mine of explosives under the very pathway over which the imperial procession passed on the occasion of the unveiling. The mine had been arranged with a degree of skill which indicated that its constructors had been well educated in military engineering, and only one accidental circumstance prevented the complete success of their diabolical plot. For some days previous to the unveiling ceremonies, heavy rains had prevailed over the Niederwald region, and the ground had become soaked to a degree which is very unusual, and was evidently far beyond the calculations of the conspirators. The water which had percolated through the soil had injured the dynamite with which the mine was charged, but it had operated more effectively still in thwarting the plot by utterly ruining the powder string or train by which it had been intended to explode the mine. Samples of the dynamite have been exploded since the discovery, and it was found that it had lost little, if any, of its power. The commissioners declare, therefore, that if the conspirators had been cunning enough to use a well-insulated wire and an electric battery to fire their mine, nothing could have prevented a most horrible slaughter, in which some of the mightiest of the earth would have been involved.

The Late Rev. ALFRED SAKER, the Heroic Missionary to the Cameroons, West Africa—Scenes in his Life.

THE LATE ALFRED SAKER,

ALFRED SAKER, whose portrait appears this week on the first page, with scenes in his heroic career, was born in the hamlet of Borough Green, Kent, England, on July 21st, 1814, and died on March 12th, 1880, in the sixty-sixth year of his age, after thirty-seven years of exhausting effort in the western regions of the Dark Continent, where he labored for Christ, and laid foundations for the uprearing of native Christian churches, comprised of those who, through his loving instrumentality, had been led to the Saviour.

Alfred's father was a millwright and engineer, and the parent of a large family of children, many of whom died in infancy. The subject of our memoir was a weakly babe, and, in the opinion of the old nurse, "was not worth rearing." He grew feeble in frame, and caring little for the boisterous games of the village children. He early showed a great love for books, and preferred their society to that of his playmates on the Green. At the age of ten he had mastered all the lessons of the National School, and soon afterward entered his father's workshop, carrying with him an eager thirst for knowledge, filling every leisure hour with study, and spending every spare penny he could get in acquiring books and mathematical instruments.

About the year 1830, the boy being then sixteen years of age, he was "lent" by his father to assist in a millwright's business at Sevenoaks. One Sunday evening he was strolling alone through the street, when the singing in a chapel that he passed drew his attention. He entered. The words to which he listened were blessed by the Holy Spirit, and the quiet hours of the night that followed witnessed and the consecration of his life to the service of his Saviour. The name of the preacher of that memorable sermon Alfred Saker never knew.

When he returned home to Borough Green he engaged in Christian work as he had opportunity, assisting in the Sunday-school, at the prayer-meetings, and in the choir. He also conducted services in cottages, and as his preaching gifts drew attention, he was invited to exercise them in the hamlets around. On January 4th, 1834, when nearly twenty years of age, he was baptized, on a profession of faith, by Mr. Fremling, of Foot's Cray, and became a member of the little Baptist Church in the village of his birth.

The death of his father, in 1838, led Mr. Saker to decide on seeking employment elsewhere. He accordingly applied at various dockyards, and, after passing his examination at Woolwich, he was appointed to

A SITUATION AT DEVONPORT.

His work here chiefly consisted in the preparations of drawings for the Admiralty. In October, 1839, he was sent for nine months to the dockyard at Deptford, to superintend the erection of machinery, and at the end of this period he returned to Devonport, accompanied by his wife, Helen Jessup, whom he married in February, 1840.

In the earliest days of his Christian life he had formed the desire to consecrate his powers to the service of Christ in Africa, but he was more especially stirred at this period to offer himself for this work by the striking narratives of the Rev. John Clarke and Dr. Prince, on their return from a visit of exploration to the West Coast in 1842. In this wish he was encouraged by his devoted wife, and eventually he was accepted by the committee of the Baptist Missionary Society.

On August 16th, 1843, Mr. and Mrs. Saker, with their little daughter Eliza, embarked on board the Chilmark, bound in the first instance to the West Indies. They arrived on the 14th of October, after a long and hazardous voyage, in the harbor of Port Royal, Jamaica. Mr. Saker spent seeking some negro converts to assist in founding a mission on the African coast. No fewer than forty-two persons entered on the generous enterprise of civilizing the savage tribes of that long-neglected land, and of taking to its benighted myriads the Light of life. On December 1st the ship sailed from the West Indies, and dropped anchor at Fernando Po, on February 15th, after a passage of eleven weeks.

Mr. Saker soon began to experience some of the trials of MISSIONARY LIFE IN AFRICA.

The wood-ants invaded and destroyed the contents of his clothes chest. A tornado tore off the thatch of his house, and deluged it and all its contents with rain. Four times he was prostrated by fever. But these and many other trials were cheerfully encountered. "Individually and in my family," he says, "numerous mercies are daily accorded to us by our heavenly Father—so numerous that I cannot attempt an enumeration."

In 1845 Mr. Saker was enabled to commence the achievement of a desire he had from the first entertained—that of opening a new mission station

ON THE CAMEROONS RIVER.

Assured of a welcome by the chiefs, preparations were at once made by him to occupy one of the native settlements as his permanent residence. On June 16th he took up his abode in a wooden house, containing only one room, twenty-one feet by fifteen, which he had hired of King A'kwa, and began his ministry as a messenger of Christ to the Duallas.

Mr. Saker was now fairly launched on his life's work. He was surrounded by a multitude of heathens, for the most part kindly disposed, but shockingly depraved, to whom he showed forth the love of God in sending Jesus to die for them. He named his station at King A'kwa's town, Bethel—the house of God. The people were in actual warfare with the neighboring tribes, utterly barbarous, practising the wildest and most debasing superstitions, and given up to the practice of every vice that degrades humanity. The work to be accomplished and the condition of these tribes, can only be understood by an illustration or two.

One day, on visiting a place called Beb Town, the missionary passed by the side of the river a corpse lying unburied, and mangled by dogs. It was the body of a man from Wuri, drowned by the upset of a canoe. No persuasion could induce the king and his chiefs to order its interment. "The man," they said, "is not a Dualla man." Another day the missionary was shocked to learn that their chief Dido had cruelly killed one of his wives and a slave. Another slave was thrown into the river, bound; but, getting loose, he swam ashore, and fled into the bush. Another is mentioned by Mr. Saker: "One of our converts, a woman named Anna, was on the way to chapel one Sunday morning. On passing the Egbo house (where the men practise their superstitious rites) she heard the cries of women. On pushing the door open, she saw two women hanging by their wrists from the roof of the house, and being rubbed all over with a kind of herb that produces an excruciating irritation. The cries of the poor creatures were most distressing. Anna begged they would untie them. They instantly seized her, and tied her in the same way, rubbing the same herb on her. Some of our young men immediately went to the rescue. They had to fight their way in, but at length succeeded in bringing Anna away. She had been one of our brightest women, but from that day she was an idiot."

Soon after Mr. Saker's arrival King A'kwa died. Mr. Saker was at the time busily employed in making the doors and shutters of his new apartments. With a few boards and joists, and a great deal of hard work, by the end of August the walls of the new structure were finished, and the two rooms floored. But on the death of A'kwa indescribable scenes of disorder, confusion, and conflict ensued. The two sons of the King quarrelled and intrigued for the succession. The houses of the dead chief were ransacked. Even the box containing his remains was broken open and rifled of everything of value. The town was given up to plunder. In October the knives, books, spoons, and, worst of all, the flour, on which life itself depended, together with the goats and fowls, were carried off. These disorders and plunderings continued till December, when the eldest son was declared king through the intervention of the British naval officers on the coast. A better state of things then began to prevail.

During the next two years Mr. Saker diligently and laboriously pursued his arduous labors among the ungoverned and ungovernable race around him. Sometimes not one individual would come to the worship, which was regularly maintained with the two or three assistants Mr. Saker had secured. Occasionally the king with a few of his chiefs and attendants, would be present, and give him a listless attention. Or he would meet them at their frequent palavers, and endeavor to awaken their minds to some desire at least for the comforts of civilized life.

His presence was unwelcome, especially to those who were interested in the maintenance of the horrid rites of heathenism. Superstitious practices were employed to procure his departure. Even poison was attempted. From robbery the mission goods were never safe. But, fired by zeal, and strengthened in his weakness by divine grace, Mr. Saker held his ground, cheered by the hope that erelong the light would dawn on the blinded eyes of the people around him. "Dualla is dark," he said, "grossly dark, dark as death; but, blessed be God, the Gospel which we bear is able to dispel it, dense as it may be."

Among other troubles that the missionary and his companions encountered, was the exhaustion of the stock of clothing brought from home, and the lack of the food necessary for Europeans. But while Mr. Saker was praying for these things, help was on the way. On December 8th, 1848, the Dove left Gravesend, having on board a number of fellow-helpers, which increased the missionary band to eleven European agents, and eight native preachers and teachers. The vessel arrived at Fernando Po on February 18th, 1849, where Mr. Saker was on a visit recruiting his health. As the ship neared the shore (see frontispiece picture, No. 2), canoes and boats filled with people crowded about the new-comers; the whole town was moved, and every one, young and old, came out to give them welcome. After a slight repast the bell sounded for worship, and Mr. Saker and his new colleagues united in fervent thanksgiving to God, while the natives listened.

THE FIRST NATIVE MARRIAGE.

Upon Mr. Saker's return from Fernando Po to the Cameroons, signs of blessing became apparent. The schools and meetings were well attended. The missionary had the pleasure of marrying the first of the Duallas who submitted to that sacred and social rite. Three months later, the marriage was followed by the husband's baptism. This was in November, 1849, and constituted the first-fruits of Christian labor at King A'kwa's town. Then a little Christian church was formed, consisting of Mr. and Mrs. Saker, Horton Johnson, a West India evange-ist, and his wife, and the convert just baptized. The services were closed by the celebration of he Lord's Supper.

"Thus," says Mr. Saker, "I have lived to witness what I have long desired intensely, the beginning of a good work at Cameroons, and he formation of a Christian church. Oh, that may see it increased to a thousand souls! And I do hope, for the Spirit of God is doing a arge work there. More than twenty inquirers ire hanging on my heart and lips, with marks of deepest solicitude. The ferocious demoniacal eatures are assuming the softness of children, nd those who a little time since sought my life ire saying to me, 'What shall I do to be aved?'"

A BRIEF REST.

The work went on, the Holy Spirit blessing it n the devoted missionary's hands. At length, nowever, the tropical heats and fevers were naking their mark on the iron frame of Mr. Saker, and he felt it his duty to avail himself of :he offer of a free passage, to make a brief visit :o England. After seven years of unceasing nd exhausting toil, and many attacks of illness, :his change of climate was as necessary as it was welcome. On March 12th, 1850, therefore, Mr. and Mrs. Saker embarked for Liverpool, which they reached on May 28th. They carried the glad and cheering tidings that one hundred souls had been hopefully converted to God, besides forty who had "fallen asleep in Jesus," as part of the result of less than ten years of prayer and toil.

A TUMULT.

After six months in England Mr. Saker returned to his much-loved, though perilous, work in Africa. What that work was may be inferred from an incident of savage life which confronted him, and the part which he played in it. One Saturday night, late, the principal chief of A'kwa town came home, and listened to an exparte statement of a dispute between some of the tribes. He became excited to madness. At four in the morning he beat his drum, calling out all to war. At five the yard and outbuildings of the missionary premises were filled with women and children of the weaker party, who fled there for refuge. An hour later and the small town was invaded by a hostile multitude. (See frontispiece picture, No. 3.) "We counselled quietness," says Mr. Saker, "and took the work of pacification into our own hands. By this means we prevented much bloodshed, and saved most of the property. By nine we had so far succeeded in quieting the rabble that we saw the last of them out of the town. Our Sabbath was broken up, but we had a good and quiet meeting in the afternoon and evening."

From the first Mr. Saker rejected the use of any weapon for self-defence. Amid all the perils he encountered in the wilderness from the rage of men, he never resorted to violence or retaliation for his protection. He was so strong in meekness, in patience, and in imperturbable quietness of spirit, and in his calm trust in God.

ESCAPE FROM DROWNING.

Mr. Saker made frequent journeys to Victoria, higher up the Cameroons River, where he had, after much risk and toil, planted a missionary station. During these trips he was exposed to great danger. On one occasion he had a narrow escape from being drowned. A sudden rush of wind swayed the boom of his little schooner, and he was swept into the sea. (See frontispiece picture, No. 4.) By the help of the boatmen he was quickly rescued, but had to sit for eight hours in his wet clothes.

Early in 1869 Mr. Saker again resolved to visit England. For twenty-five years he had now labored in the tropics, and although his indomitable spirit forbade him to relinquish the task, it was now doubtful whether his strength would permit or justify a prolongation of that intense devotion which had so wonderfully and so long characterized him. Leaving, therefore, colleagues, converts, and multiplying churches, he tore himself away, and in the month of May once more reached his native land, emaciated, pale, feeble, and deeply suffering, yet with a spirit still ready to risk all for Christ and for the souls of men.

He arrived in his native land for the last time in December, 1876, having previously, on February 23d, 1872, been able to announce the completion of the task he had set himself in the earliest days of his career—the translation and printing the whole of

THE BIBLE IN THE DUALLA TONGUE.

"The Shadow," as the natives of Cameroons had of late years been wont to designate him, as in weakness he moved about among them, appeared among his friends, who recognized in his emaciated figure the appropriateness of the epithet. It was evident to all that his work in Africa was done, and that his return thither, about which he constantly talked as of a near event, would never occur.

He lived on, his heart full of love for Africa, and occasionally engaging in deputation work to the churches of his denomination; but at the beginning of 1880 it was evident that his earthly warfare was nearly done. Day by day he gradually sank, until on March 12th he gently closed his eyes and crossed the river of death into the life beyond. A sweet smile passed over the pallid, worn face, as he breathed his last. Mrs. Saker tells us his last words were:

and surely these words tell out the whole story and explain the entire life. A "good soldier" of Jesus Christ, "faithful unto death." May those who remain to carry on the fight be enabled to follow him, who now, through faith and patience, inherits the promises! "Take it all in all," is the testimony of that great man, Dr. Livingstone—"take it all in all, the work of Alfred Saker at Cameroons and Victoria is, in my judgment, the most remarkable on the African Coast."

INCIDENTS OF GOSPEL WORK IN HEATHEN LANDS.

A Chinese Magistrate Converted.—The Rev. R. J. Landale, M.A., of the China Inland Mission, relates the following: "A godly man in China gave us $500, that we might offer it as prizes for essays to be written by Chinese graduates. We did so, taking care to prescribe subjects bearing upon the Christian religion. Many essays were sent in to us, and we gave three prizes, one of $250, a second of $150, and a third of $100, and God blessed our efforts to the salvation of the soul of one of these men. At the triennial examination, held about five years ago, when we first began this scheme, there came up for his degree a Chinese gentleman of independent means, and a magistrate in his own village. This man wrote an essay, and, in order to do so, he had to read some Christian books we supplied him with. He ultimately gained a prize, but he refused the money, and seemed to think we insulted him by offering it, he being a man of property. He told me himself that, when he wrote the essay, he did not care much about the subject, that he would just as soon write upon the subject we had selected as on any other; but, after a little while, God's truth began to work in his heart, and he was convinced of sin. A few months afterward he was converted to Christ, and now is doing as much as any European missionary, and entirely without pay from us. He has usually his house full of inquirers, who stay with him, and study the Christian religion."

Sounding the Gospel Gong.—"Sitting in my study one day I noticed the beating of a Chinese gong, and when I went to the window I saw two boys with a gong between them, and at the time the gong was being beaten one of the lads was crying out, 'Ahoi, Ahoi!' I asked my teacher what was the meaning of this, and he said the probability is that the first boy has lost his brother, and he has got this other boy to go with him, according to the usual custom, through the streets, sounding the gong in the hope that they may find the little one and bring him back again. I listened as the sound retreated as the boys went down the street, until the sound was lost, and I went back to my work again. But soon after I heard them returning, and now the little boy, who had been calling out 'Ahoi!' seemed to be trembling and quivering, and he seemed to think it was doubtful whether he would find his little brother or not. Still the gong was beating, and still he was calling out most pathetically, 'Ahoi, Ahoi!' Now, I think that here we have an exact illustration of what Jesus is doing. He is going in search of the lost. He goes through the streets, looking after them, and calling out their names, and He wants you and me to labor with Him in seeking that which is lost; and still we are going about beating the gong, and calling out the names of the perishing ones, and asking them now, ere they be lost, to return to Jesus again."

Death of Cannibalism in Fiji.—The Rev. J. Calvert, formerly a missionary at Fiji, says: "Shortly after my arrival I was horrified to see on several occasions no less than one hundred human bodies being cooked at the same time. One of these man-eaters gloried in his shame, for every time he ate of a human being he would set up a large stone, and when he died it was found that he had partaken of eight hundred and seventy-two such meals. But since our mission has been there, we have never had any doubt as regards the good that is being done among the people by the Gospel, for many of them have been led to the Saviour, and cannibalism is extinct. When first we began, there was no written language; but we took out a printing-press, and for a time used the English characters, and God was with us and confirmed His word with 'signs following.' As soon as any of the people were converted, we set them to work, and the truth has spread so remarkably that there are now among the Fijians on these eighty inhabited islands twelve hundred and forty churches and other preaching places."

"The Late King of the Fijians Led his People into a great deal of mischief and cruelty, and we were called to pray and labor with all earnestness for his salvation. For fifteen years we sought to bring him to a knowledge of the truth, and we thought we had made a great stride toward the desired end when we found a conscience in him—when we found that he did not like to kill people and eat them, or strangle those who were of no use, as was the custom. At last he submitted, and thankfully embraced the offer of God's mercy, and we were thankful to know that he had obtained forgiveness of all his sins through the precious blood of Christ, and had, in truth, a new heart and a right spirit. For twenty-nine years that wonderful man was a great credit to the Christian religion and a benefit to his country, and on February 1st, 1883, he passed away, trusting in Christ. If the glorious Gospel of the blessed God can save a man like that, it can save anybody in any part of the world."

Trusting in a Snake's Backbone.—The Rev. S. Griffiths, in the course of a recent address, said: "Along the western coast of Africa, and indeed in the interior as well, the people believe in what we call charms. I have one in my pocket. Here is a rome, or Fernandian charm. It has received the blessing of a heathen priest, and is therefore supposed to be effective in protecting the wearer from accident, from sudden death, from the devil, and I cannot tell what else. This is really the backbone of a snake, but it has been blessed by a priest and is therefore a rome, or charm. Now I want to remind you that while we are preceded by others—the Baptists, for example, at Santa Isabel—yet on the western part of that land there were people who, prior to our advent, were trusting in disgusting rubbish of this kind for temporal protection and for spiritual welfare. Now, discarding all rome, they trust in the Saviour that you love."

BOSSISM.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Preached Last Sunday Morning, June 22, 1884.

"Then the chief captain came, and said unto him, Tell me, art thou a Roman? He said, Yea. And the chief captain answered, With a great sum obtained I this freedom. And Paul said, But I was free born."—ACTS 22 : 27, 28.

So, seventeen hundred years before Thomas Jefferson wrote the Declaration of American Independence, Paul wrote his declaration of independence. An official egotist had been boasting that through large compensation, or eminent services, he had obtained this liberty, and Paul, bethinking himself of the fact that Tarsus, the city of his nativity, had been long ago manumitted by Antonius, replies to the braggadocio by practically saying, "My freedom dates further back than yours ; I am not a liberated slave ; my cradle had no shackle on the rocker ; my mother was not a serf ; I was free born."

That description is true of all those born in this country within the last twenty-one years, and is true of all the white population ever born here. And yet there are influences abroad that propose to manacle the people. There are those who would forge for us the chains of a slavery. I propose this morning to speak of the

and how that slavery is to be broken ; and as we are coming near the time when this nation will celebrate its birthday, and I shall not be present at that time to speak to you, I shall take this occasion in various ways to rally your Christian patriotism, and call your attention to some things which ought to attract your consideration, especially at this time.

We are midway between two great national nominating conventions. The hotels of Chicago are hardly yet ventilated from the recent convention, and there will be some time necessary for fumigation after the next convention shall assemble. The air is hot with political imprecation. We are gradually being whipped into line, so far as that is possible. We shall have to look through one of three or four pairs of spectacles, or suffer for it. The political guillotine is being rolled out, and the recalcitrants are shown the sharp knife for their necks, and the basket into which their heads will probably roll.

THE POLITICAL MACHINES

are having their screws tightened and the cranks made more firm, and the rope of "instructions" is put around the neck of the delegate, and he has to vote as his party declares he must vote, or have intimated to him that the rope will tighten and that the facilities for respiration will be seriously interfered with. Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego are to bow down before the idol set up, or be roasted in the furnace seven times heated. Each village and town has what is called in old-fashioned parlance its "boss," and every city has its "boss," and every State its "boss," and all these "bosses" will come together and elect a great national "boss." Against this slavery of American politics I protest, and demand that in convention and in ballot-box every man, without hindrance or malediction, vote as he thinks best, God his only judge.

DO NOT BE NERVOUS.

In the first place, if we would break this slavery of American politics, we must decline every four years to believe that everything is in peril. If our American institutions every four years are in danger of smash-up, the sooner they go to pieces the better, and we have substituted a government which shall have in it some style, some element of durability. I remember eleven Presidential elections, and in each one we were told that everything was in peril. As near as I could tell, we were within a quarter of an inch of the eternal precipice. Voters went to the ballot-box tremulous with omens. Wagons and carriages were sent for the aged and the invalid. At party expense these persons were brought forth, and patriots who by strange coincidence at the same time were candidates for office—these patriots lifted the invalids from the bed and the wagon, where there were pillows and mattresses, and the unfortunates were carefully supported on both sides to the polls, where they deposited for the very life of the country their precious votes.

Now, while there have been pivotal elections, in the majority of cases there is nothing at stake but official patronage. This magnifying of national peril and this working before the public mind, on wires, the every four years, halts business and demoralizes everything. What do Western merchants want to come here and buy goods for if next autumn everything is to be a howling wilderness? What do Eastern men want to buy Western lands for when everything is to be paralyzed? All business men will tell you that every four years is an idle year. Why? Because everything is stagnated by this cry of peril when there is no peril, there is no crisis.

The political orators are this moment getting out their orations which were delivered in the Fremont times and in the Lincoln campaign and in all the campaigns since, for the speeches are just as appropriate for one campaign as another ; for we are always on the edge of ruin and we are always going to pieces. I remember that at eight years of age I stood in the blistering sun and barefoot, at Somerville, New Jersey, hearing a Western orator, who persuaded me in that Presidential election that if William Henry Harrison was elected instead of Martin Van Buren, there would be no use of my growing up, because there would be no country to grow in ! Not long ago, in Music Hall, Boston, I was lecturing, and just before the lecture there I was told a Western orator would that night speak at Faneuil Hall ; so I hastened through my work and got down to the Cradle of Liberty, and found it that night rocked by the same Western orator and the same Western speech, and the only difference between the speech I heard forty years ago and that speech was, in one case it was William Henry Harrison, and in the other it was Benjamin F. Butler.

Many of us remember the Presidential election when Henry Clay and James K. Polk were the candidates for the Presidency. My father sat down pale and exhausted and sick at the defeat of Henry Clay, and said that all was lost. He had felt the magnetism of that splendid Kentuckian, whose name I cannot pronounce without feeling an enthusiasm tingling from scalp to heel. But was everything lost? Through that election we got the Texan domain, and door after door of annexation has been opened until when the wind blows from the west the national flag dips into the Atlantic, and when it blows from the east the national flag dips into the Pacific. We were positively told that the existence of this nation depended upon Mr. Lincoln's second election to the Presidency ; but immediately after his inauguration he died, and Andrew Johnson put the government in just the opposite direction, and

WE STILL LIVE.

During the sixteen years in which I have lived in the State of New York, at every gubernatorial election we have been told that everything was at stake. Officers have changed, but there has been no change in our prosperity except from good to better, and I have noticed that the sun rises at about the same time in the same month of the year, and the tides come in with about the same strength, and it is high time in this country we stop this crisis business and understand that the Lord God has capacity to keep this nation on in its high march of prosperity without the help of Chicago conventions.

At the present time it is ONLY A QUESTION OF OFFICES.

The Republican party, in power, with the offices, naturally wants to keep them. The Democratic party, out of power, naturally wants to get power and get the offices. The so-called Independents of the Republican party, dissatisfied because they have not received enough from the Republican crib, are hoping that the Democratic bowl will be so full that from the overflow they may catch something in their cup ; while I have to tell all such persons they had better not be disappointed, for they will never get so much as a spoonful of pap from the Democratic bowl. That party, after a privation of twenty-four years, cannot be blamed if they keep all they get. Absolutely nothing but a question of offices.

The old lion of national strength is covered all over with greenbottle flies sucking the life-blood from neck and flanks, and the first Tuesday in November the old lion of our national strength may shake itself terrifically, and another set of greenbottle flies, but more hungry, will take their place. Do not stand agape as to what will happen next. Go about your honest every-day business. Do not believe the political bureaus that declare that everything is in peril. There is no more danger that this government is going to pieces than that the moon is going to pieces.

Again, if we want to break this tyranny of American politics, we must understand that NEITHER PARTY IS IMMACULATE.

Do not vote for a man merely because your party nominates him. If you want to know how much better the one party is than the other, I put the Louisiana Returning Board of one party beside the gubernatorial conflict of 1879, in Maine, and I put the Belknap frauds of one party against the Tweed larcenies of the other. There is a difference in men, but the only difference between the parties as to moral character to-day, in my estimation, is the difference between fifty and half a hundred. Both parties are in need of radical reformation, and by the time they are reformed they may be reformed out of existence.

But is there no difference? are there no preferences? Ah ! so far from saying that, a man who does not intelligently and in the fear and love of God exercise the right of suffrage is not worthy of American citzenship. There are preferences, and while every intelligent man and woman in America is to-day asking the question, "Who shall be the next President of the United States?" I want to say two or three things. In the first place, the next President of the United States, and every President, ought to have an established moral character. There have been times when we have had candidates for governors and candidates for the Presidential chair who were libertines and gamblers and drunkards. In the House of Representatives and in the United States Senate we have had men who could not walk straight because of intoxication, representing Illinois and Pennsylvania and New York. I am glad to know that the question of good morals is coming into every political canvass. I do not care how talented a man is, if he is bad.

GENIUS IS WORSE THAN STUPIDITY

if it move in the wrong direction. In a nation where there are so many homes, we must have at the head of it a man who honors the sanctity of the domestic circle. In a nation where there are so many young men looking for an example of good character, we must have at the head only one characterized by integrity. A man who cannot govern himself cannot govern fifty millions of people. Our schools, our colleges, our universities, our churches, and our homesteads must fight for good morals.

But do not listen to the hue and cry of partisanship. You can get no idea from what newspapers have to say of men, what their real character is. The best man that God ever made, nominated on either side, must wade through obloquy chin-deep.

The first target to be shot at was set up about two weeks ago; the next target to be shot at will be set up at Chicago in about two weeks from now, and the target that has the most holes put through it

WILL BE THE PRESIDENT.

Defamation elected James A. Garfield. Defamation elected Abraham Lincoln. Defamation, I am told by one who remembers the time, elected Andrew Jackson, and that is the testimony of one who is far from liking Andrew Jackson. You have only to wait until the next candidate is nominated at Chicago, and he is fully launched upon the attention of the people, and I can tell you in August as certainly as in November who will be the President. You have to take the scales and put on one side all the scurrility about the Republican candidate, and put on the other side the scale all the scurrility about the Democratic candidate, weighing scurrility against scurrility, and the man who is most abused and has the most scurrility hurled upon him will be the President. There is a philosophy in it, my brethren. There are many bad things about human nature, but there are many good things about human nature, and one of the best things about human nature is that it sympathizes with one who is traduced.

Have nothing to do, by pen or type or voice, in the malediction of public men. In the characterization of men in private life we exercise Christian principle, and we are, if we are good men, disposed to put the best phase and the best interpretation on conduct, and it is only a bad man who chooses always to think bad of his fellows. Charity thinketh well, if it is possible to think well.

Now, my brethren, let us in public life do as well as we do in private life, and the same charity we extend toward those in private life extend toward those who are in public life. Remember, my friends, when you come to judge in regard to the character of the two men who shall be before this nation, you are Christian patriots and not scavengers. I abhor this defamation of public men. Just as soon as a man comes to the front and achieves anything by his eloquence, or by his brilliancy, or by his public services, all the hounds of earth and hell get after him. Calmly and deliberately judge of men in the fear and love of God, and as you yourself would like to be judged. You yourself perhaps may not come to highest political position, but your sons may be on the way to the honors of this government. Treat men now in public life with the same fairness and generosity that you would have your sons treated when they come to high position in life.

Then, in order to be qualified for the chief office of this nation, a man must also be

A RESPECTER OF THE CHRISTIAN RELIGION.

I apply no religious test. But this country, discovered by Christian men and settled by Hollanders and Huguenots and the descendants of men from other lands who were persecuted for their religious faith, and who took possession of this land in the name of God and heaven—such a country as this must have over it one who respects the Christian religion. Never, my Christian friends, under any circumstances vote for any man who does not believe in the existence of God and the divinity of the Bible. A man who does not believe in the existence of God and the divinity of the Bible I would not trust him with a ten-cent piece, much less elevate him to the Presidency. This is the only foundation of common honesty, the Bible. I often hear it said that the Constitution of the United States is the foundation of our institutions. It is not. The Bible is the foundation. Republican institutions are an everlasting impossibility without it. Our first President was a Christian. Let our next President be at any rate a respecter of the Christian religion.

A LARGE-HEARTED MAN.

Then he must have heart large enough to take in all the States and Territories. If a Western man, he must not despise the sea-coast or want an immediate change of the centre of commercial life. If an Eastern man, he must not despise the West. If a Southern man, he must not think all men of the North of ignoble generation. If a Northern man, he must not want to keep up the old grudge which we settled twenty-one years ago. He must have a heart large enough to take in all the nation. There can never be any more conflict in this country. The sword has given place to the wheat cradle. The time of darkness and contention has all gone by, and there is to be no more use in this country for the musket except for holiday turnout. Our navy-yards are going to become museums containing ships used in barbaric ages for settling by slaughter national differences. The eagle has got to get off our coin and the dove take its place, the bird of blood giving way for the bird of the olive branch. I prescribe for and I prescribe for a defence against all national peril the Christianization of the people. Let Christianity take possession of the ballot-box, there will be no illegal voting. Let Christianity take charge of the primaries and the caucuses, and we will have righteous nominees. Do not expect that the politicians of this country will ever save the land What have they ever done for this country but get office and make trouble? They got us into the four years' war. Did they get us out of it? No. The great masses of the people rose up, fought out the fight and then commanded peace. Politicians again and again have ruined American commerce. Did they restore it? No. The great masses of the people, with hard-fisted and besweated industry, conquered those financial calamities. So much depending upon the great masses of the people, let us have them evangelized.

We want the Gospel of Jesus Christ dominant—that Gospel which William E. Gladstone demonstrated when he sent an apology a few years ago to the Austrian Government. He found he was wrong, and apologized for it. Some said: "Oh, what imbecility!" I say it was the grandest specimen of Christian character possible. We settle individual differences by explanation and apology. Why not national differences? Why by the sword? "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will to men."

Oh, this is the brightest day in all our history. Our land is coming to greater and

GREATER PROSPERITY.

I stand here at that season of the year when you are accustomed to celebrate the national birth, to ask you to thank God for what He has done for this country. What is the heat of this morning? It means the ripening of the grandest harvest this country has ever seen. We can afford to sit with the thermometer amid the nineties, every minute of this heat adding millions to the national estate. Last week they said to me in Tennessee, "Never such harvests;" they said to me in Kentucky, "Never such harvests;" and they said to me in Alabama, and Mississippi, and Arkansas, and Ohio, "Never such harvests." A gentleman stood in his doorway and said, "Look at that harvest; we never had anything like it in this country." And this heat, uncomfortable for us, glorious for the national domain. It means blessing for all the people. Plenty to eat, plenty to eat! And agriculture is going to bring all its harvests, and manufacturing is going to bring all its adroit fabrics, and literature is going to bring all its printing-presses, and art is going to bring all its pencils and chisels, and commerce is going to bring all its masts, and religion is going to bring all its altars and towers, and put them down at the feet of Him on whose vesture and on whose thigh are written, "King of kings, Lord of lords." Italy for pictures, France for manners, Germany for scholarship,

THE UNITED STATES FOR GOD.

Oh, my friends, in the few remaining years of our life, let us be Christian patriots.

There are three great reasons why you and I should do our best for this country—three great reasons: our fathers' graves, our cradle, our children's birthright. When I say your fathers' graves, your pulses run quickly. Whether they sleep in city cemetery or country graveyard, their dust is very precious to you. They lived well, and they died right. Never submit to have any government over their tombs other than that government under which they lived and died. And then this country is our cradle. It may have rocked us very roughly, but it was a good cradle to be rocked in. Oh how much we owe to it Our boyhood and girlhood days spent in this blessed country. I never have any patience with a man who talks against this country. Glorious place to be born in, and a glorious place to live in. It has been our cradle. Ay, it is to be

OUR CHILDREN'S BIRTHRIGHT.

You and I soon will be through with it. We will see a few more of the spring blossoms, and we will see a few more of the summer harvests, and we will gather a few more of the autumnal fruits; but we are to hand this government to our children as it was handed to us—a free land, a happy land, a Christian land. They are not to be trampled by despotisms, they are not to be lacerated by cruelties, they are not to be affrighted by anarchies. We must hand this country to them over the ballot-box, over the school desk, over the church altar, as we have received it, and charge them solemnly to put their life between it and any keen stroke that would destroy it.

And Thou, Lord God Almighty, we put with a thousand armed prayers, we put into Thy protection this nation. Remember our fathers' bleeding feet at Valley Forge. Remember Marion and Kosciusco. Remember the cold and the hunger and the long march and the fever hospital. Remember the fearful charge at Bunker Hill. Remember Lexington and Yorktown and King's Mountain and Gettysburg. Remember Perry's battle on the lake, and Hampton Roads where the Cumberland went down. Remember Washington's prayer by the campfire. Remember Plymouth Rock and the landing amid the savages.

REMEMBER INDEPENDENCE HALL, and how much it cost our fathers to sign their names. Remember all the blood and tears of three wars—1776, 1812, 1864. And more than all, remember the groan that was mightier than all other groans, and the thirst that stung worse than all other thirst, and the death that was ghastlier than all other deaths—the mount on which Jesus died to make all men happy and free. For the sake of all this human and divine sacrifice, O God, protect this nation. And whosoever would blot it out, and whosoever would strike it down, and whosoever would turn it back, let him be accursed.

Go home to-day, in high hopes of the future. The eternal God is on the side of this nation. Our brightest days are yet to come.

"He hath sounded forth the trumpet that will never call retreat;
He is sifting out the hearts of men before the judgment seat;
Be swift, my soul, to answer Him; be jubilant, my feet!
Our God is marching on."

The Woman's Christian Temperance Home, about which inquiries are often made, is at 440 East Fifty-seventh Street. It is under the administration of Miss Tolman, who will cheerfully give information and receive applications for admission. Medical aid will be called in when needed. The President is Mrs. William E. Dodge, 225 Madison Avenue; Mrs. T. B. Meigs, 16 East Sixty-fifth Street, is Treasurer.

THE ANTICHRIST.

Notes of an Address by Dr. Harold Browne, Bishop of Winchester.

The Early Christian Belief in Antichrist's Coming—Conjectures on the Subject—No Doubt as to the Nature of the Antichrist—Ultra-Infidelity—Common Belief that the Pope is Antichrist—Coincident with a Great Apostasy—Its Full Manifestation Still Future—What the Hindrance is—Hidden Volcanic Fires—A Fierce Trial for the Church—The Boundary Line Obliterated—Patriots as well as Christians—The Prelude of Final Victory.

THE Bishop of Winchester based his remarks on II Thess 2 : 6 : "And now ye know what withholdeth that he might be revealed in his time." A belief in the coming of Antichrist, the Bishop remarked, had been entertained from the earliest times of Christianity. It might, perhaps, be hard to say, he observed, whether the Antichrist was to be a single person, as the Fathers mostly believed, or a succession of persons, like a regal, imperial, or Papal dynasty, as many later writers had thought, or a prevailing principle of sin and error, as had been the belief of not a few in our own days.

In any case it was not difficult to conclude what should be the nature of the error. St. John said that Antichrist should "deny both the Father and the Son," and specially should deny that "Jesus Christ had come in the flesh;" and also that whereas it was known that Antichrist should come, even then there were "many Antichrists." St. Paul added further that it should not be some external power breaking in upon the Church and desolating it, like a heathen or an imperial tyranny; but it should either follow or coincide with Passing in review the claims of Nero, the Gnostics, and Mohammed to be regarded as Antichrist, the preacher continued: There remains that great principle, called Romanism, that great succession of men known to us as the Papacy, which has not unnaturally been thought to have upon it many of the marks by which St. Paul has described the coming Antichrist. The power exerted by it over the consciences of men, the claims to infallibility and to universal dominion, attributes of none but God, the stifling of all attempts at reformation, the persecution and cruelty exercised on all that opposed themselves, the addition of unsound articles to the creeds of Christendom, and of superstitious practices to the worship of Christendom: these and the like naturally led men, in the life struggle of the sixteenth century, to identify the Pope with Antichrist, who, as Luther has said, was not to sit in low and vile places, "on dunghills or in pigstyes," but to be enthroned in "the Temple of God."

But will the teaching of the apostles, the word of Holy Scripture, lend itself to this belief? Can Romanism be properly called an apostasy from the Church? Was it not more truly a gradual corruption from within of the Church itself, of its doctrine, and its practices, rather than a falling away of any single portion of it? So far as we can read, the full manifestation of that fearful power is yet to be seen. Come when Antichrist may, if he fulfils the predictions of the apostles, his belief will be atheism, and his law license.

His Lordship then went on to remark that in the text St. Paul spoke of a letting or hindrance which restrained the coming of Antichrist. The question was, what was this hindrance? St. Chrysostom and others of the early Fathers thought that it was the Roman Empire. Its rule of iron law was a restraining influence over the "lawless one," which was what Antichrist was in one place said to be. This rule of iron law tempered by a religion had survived even to our own day, but it seemed now to be gradually passing away. The fabric is rapidly loosening. Constitutional is fast supplanting imperial government, for which we may be thankful; but, beneath all government, and waiting to subvert and submerge all, lie hidden or scarcely of communistic anarchy, joined in close affinity with agnosticism and atheism. Nearly every nation in Europe, even the least influenced by communistic principles, is threatening to throw off its national faith. It would be no great prodigy if those who witnessed the birth of the twentieth century saw it break with that social order and iron law tempered by the Christian faith which had come down to them through nineteen centuries from Augustus, and Constantine, and Justinian, and Charles the Great. This inheritance, this "letting," was apparently being taken away, and a spirit was growing up and gaining strength, which had all the characteristics of St. Paul's "Man of Sin" and St. John's "Antichrist." There had been many crises in history when men had looked for the development of Antichrist, and this might be but one more of them; but we certainly see the conflict between law and unlaw, between Christianity and irreligion, between theism and atheism, more manifest and undisguised on the Continent of Europe than it had been for centuries, perhaps than it has ever been before. While it would be unwise to exaggerate the danger, it would be folly to disguise it.

There is much on the other side which is hopeful, but to be forewarned is to be forearmed. There is, however, no reason to conclude from the writings of the Apostle Paul that if Antichrist should come the Church would not prevail before the great apostasy. But it would lose many of its less devoted members; its limits would be narrowed, and would be more sharply defined. The signs and wonders spoken of might be the miracles of science and art and learning carried on in an unbelieving spirit, and the result would be that many brought up in the Church would be led to fall away from it, "not having received the truth in the love of it." They would not be able to say with the early Christians that "the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our God and of His Christ," for the kingdom of Christ would probably again be isolated and contracted.

In the presence of such

the boundary line between the Church and the world would be more sharply cut. Men would have to choose sides and perhaps to suffer for the choosing. Apparently in our own and our children's days a great struggle is at hand; it might be only one of many great struggles; but whether Antichrist is really coming or only one other type of Antichrist, we cannot question that we are in a condition of society in which everything is already on its trial. The Church is on its trial, the faith is on its trial, but we can have no misgiving about that. The day would not be darker than when Judas sold his Master. But if we are looking for Antichrist, there are bright spots before us also, and we may hope that our own country is one of these. Under God's providence our country has been kept from many evils in the past, and may be so in the future. Is it nothing to us that if we are Christians we are also patriots? Is the home of our childhood and of our children no longer the home of our hearts, and should we not watch and pray that it might be kept from the evils which surround it? Politicians we ought not to be. Christian patriots we must be.

Abraham prayed for Sodom and Christ wept over Jerusalem. Perhaps we have sometimes thought that it matters not what comes to our land if the Church is sure, and we have let loose the floodgates of strife and discord, not regarding the offence done to Christ's little ones. We must see that the Church is firmly strengthened before the rain descends and the winds blow and beat upon it. Aliens from the bosom of the Church had confessed that she was fitted to take a foremost place in the battle, but they must strengthen their great root principles and then allow every possible latitude. They wanted breadth as well as unity, so that they might bring many souls to Christ, and receive those who would not be received to doubtful disputations. They must remember, too, that the coming of Antichrist would be the prelude of the final victory of the Church of Christ. Antichrist would be consumed by the word of His mouth, and destroyed by the breath of His presence. The question for us to ask is, "Are we to be sharers of the victory?"

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Worthlessness of Infidelity in Sorrow.—A gentleman recently related the following incident: "In the district where I used to reside, there was a man who professed to be an infidel. He was awakened to his danger, and for a long time was in great trouble about his soul. At length the Holy Spirit led him to decide for Christ. After he was settled, and full of peace, I asked him, 'When you were in a state of anxiety about your soul, what did you think of your infidel opinions?' A strange look went over his face, and after thinking a moment, he replied, 'I didn't think about them at all.' Why was this? It was clearly because, though pretentious, they were unreal, and were dispelled as soon as his mind and heart were filled by the realities of eternity. 'The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God.'"

A Medical Student's Career and Conversion.—Mr. Jack related: "Some years ago a young friend of mine was dying in Stirling. He often visited our Sabbath-school when he was a boy. After he went to study medicine at a Scotch University, he went far, far astray. Soon the direful results of his life manifested themselves upon his physical frame, and he went home to his mother's house, in Stirling, to die. His sister nursed him with all the loving devotion of her nature, although she, too, was unconverted. One day the dying man said to her, 'Now I am dying, and I am unsaved. I want salvation. Do you think we can find it?' She at once took the Bible, and began to read the 14th chapter of John—'Let not your heart be troubled,' etc.; but he interrupted her, saying, 'Ah! that is not for me; go further over.' The sister turned over to Romans, and there he found the way of peace, and soon showed the most lively hope and joy in the Lord. His disease was most painful, and on the day of his death, knowing that he had only a few hours to live, he asked his sister, 'What hour is it?' and she answered, 'It is so and so.' 'In two hours I shall be gone,' was the calm reply. Being desirous that his mother should be spared the pain of witnessing his last agony, he drew over his head the coverlet, and so passed away in perfect peace. His sister also was led to trust in Jesus through seeing the faith and hope of her dying brother."

Running Away from His Mother's Prayers.—The Rev. Dr. Morgan said: "There are numbers present who, just from want of thought, have been on Satan's side, and on the world's side, who can truly say of many things you have done in the past, that you never meant them. You are just like a young man of whom I once heard, who was often spoken to and often prayed for by his mother, until he said to her, 'Mother, if you don't give up that praying for me I will run away to sea.' He ran away. Before he went his mother packed his box. She put the writing paper at the top, and all she begged of him was, 'My boy, when you are far away from me, write to me. I will write to you; but send me an answer.' He went away; he stayed three years, and never sent a single syllable to that loving mother, who oftentimes was kneeling by her bedside praying for that runaway boy. At last he went back to the old village to see how she was. As he walked down the street his heart misgave him. He walked up the path to the house, he knocked at the door; it was opened by a person whom he did not know. He asked for Mrs. So-and-so. 'How is she?' The woman looked blankly at him. He said, 'Is not she here?' 'Oh,' said the woman, 'you mean the old woman who used to live here. She died eight months ago of a broken heart. She had a bad son, who went away to sea and left her, and she wrote to him, and he never wrote back again.' He turned away and went into the village churchyard. He looked at the graves, he found the one he sought, and threw himself down upon it, saying, 'Oh, mother, I never meant it, I never meant it!' But he did it. There is one Father who loves you as none other can love, and He has sent you a message, a letter; have you answered it yet? Sometimes you have forgotten God, and been carried along the stream of worldliness and gayety; you have not meant it. But when Satan and the world would have you do what you should not do, I implore you to think for one moment of Jesus, of heaven, and of home."

A Shilling Short of the Rent.—The Rev. Mr. Coutts said: "There is a little sheiling erected on the open moor, made for the most part of turf, and roofed with heather. In one gable is a small two-paned window, and in the other is a still smaller window of one pane. In this humble yet cosey one-roomed house I saw a daughter of the King go home at the ripe age of ninety years, leaving behind her daughter, a middle-aged woman. At one time they lived rent free, but some repairs were made upon the house, and the laird demanded a rent of one pound a year. This was a sum as great to this old Christian as one thousand pounds to some people. It took hard word at knitting to earn such a sum as ten shillings every half year. The first half-yearly term came round, and the day on which the laird was to call for the rent was come. The money had been gathered copper by copper, and as it came to one shilling it was changed into silver, and put into the toe of an old stocking. On this important morning the stocking was untied and the silver emptied out and counted. Alas! there was a shilling missing! What was to be done? There was no time to earn another; to borrow or beg one she could not condescend to. What did she do? Just what the woman in the parable did. Though it was broad daylight outside, it was dark inside. So she lighted a candle, moved everything in the house, and searched till she found it in a hole in the floor. With joy in her heart she ran out and told her neighbors, who rejoiced with her. You see our Lord used as illustrations events which occur in all countries and at all times to make His meaning clear to the dullest mind. 'The common people heard Him gladly.'"

A Woman's Death in a Chest.—The Rev. Dr. Wallace said: "Dr. Laidlaw, of the Glasgow Medical Mission, was sent for to attend a serious case. On going to the address given, he found that it was a house of one room, in which a whole family lived; the eldest child was nine years and the youngest six weeks old. He looked in the bed-place for the sick person, but there was nothing there, not even any boards. Turning to the group of children, he inquired, 'Who is ill?' The eldest girl replied, 'Ma mither, sir.' 'Where is she?' 'Here, sir,' pointing to a wooden chest, in a corner of which lay what looked like a heap of rags. There was not another article in the house, not even a stool. The girl, bending over the chest, said, 'Mither, wake up, here's the doctor.' Then she gently shook the form which so lately was an active woman, and repeated, 'Mither, mither, wake up, here's the doctor;' but still there was no movement. 'I think, doctor, mither is sleeping very sound,' was the girl's remark. Dr. Laidlaw examined the mother, whose deathly pale face, closed eyes, and hands stiffly crossed on her breast alarmed him. He put out his hand and felt for the pulse, but pulse there was none. Saddened, he paused a minute, but was at length forced to tell the girl her mother was dead. On inquiry, he found it was the old story: the father and husband was a drinking man. The next day the man called for the certificate as to the cause of death, to enable him to get the money from the Burial Society in which the woman was insured; part if not the most of the money would be spent in drink. The doctor most unwillingly gave it, because he could not legally withhold it. Dr. Laidlaw was asked, 'Are these cases common?' 'Yes, very.' Christian friends, let us be up and doing; fight against these drinking customs in the power of Christ, so that these cases instead of being common shall be uncommon."

A HEATHEN FESTIVAL.

IN The Indian Witness of April 26th there appears the following sketch from the pen of Rev. S. Knowles, of Gonda, Oudh. As our contemporary remarks, it is well fitted to give encouragement to the friends of the missionary cause.

"The harvest is all gathered and stacked on the threshing-floors under trees outside the villages, and the people have both time and money to enjoy a holiday, and take a trip to the Devi Pátan mela on the borders of the Nipal jungles. Hence the roads leading to the mela are covered with these holiday-making rustics, tradesmen, and officials. Here we see a crowd of pedestrians, men, women, and children, carrying their sleeping and cooking arrangements, and leading or dragging the doomed he-goats, forcing their onward, eager way. There stout self-satisfied officials on their well-fed, ambling ponies urging their not over-courteous way through the dusty groups of travellers. There, too, in the deep ruts, the rough, slow-going country carts, with their screeching wheels that set your teeth on edge, and each filled with a peasant family, including the devoted he-goat, the women singing a monotonous song in praise of Sita Ram that somehow makes the heart feel sad. It is through these motley crowds and clouds of ever-rising dust some eight of us are pressing on our way to the first camping place at Maháráj-Gunge, sixteen miles on the Balrampore Road.

"After a most trying march in the heat and blinding dust, we reached the refreshing banks of the beautiful Rapti River. Oh, how grateful we felt as we bathed our fevered limbs in its cool, clear waters, and drank in new life! After tiffin and a reviving siesta in the acceptable shade of a large pákar tree, we started again in the dusty track of the devotees for the mela. But just as we crossed the bridge of boats a number of people stopped us and requested us to preach to them. We were not slow in holding forth the Word of Life, and pressing our willing hearers to come to Jesus. One Brahman bairági's heart was touched, and he came forward confessing Christ to be the only Saviour of men. Thirsty, tired, and full of dust, we entered under the grand grove of tamarind trees that surround the gloomy temple of the blood-deluged idol goddess, and were soon enjoying an agreeable rest in the cool of the evening.

"The mela partook more of a migratory character this year than last; still there were never less than 22,000 people present as long as the mela lasted. The first impression you receive as you enter this fair, is that you are entering an immense slaughter house, for the odor and sight of blood are everywhere. We always wisely pitch our tents to the north of these shambles, and are thus saved from the horrible effluvium so fiercely carried to the east. But the temple of and its vicinity are only equalled in butchery and gore by the tomb of Mirza, a few yards off, daily washed with pig's blood. Both form a complete Aceldama. At the former relays of sanguinary priests keep severing with their sharp, heavy-bladed kukeries the heads from the quivering bodies of he-goats and male buffaloes from morning till evening.

"This sickening carnage takes place over a sand-pit, which is emptied and filled with fresh sand every morning. The devotee first takes the animal to be offered to an adjacent tank, and dips it three times in the foul water. The devotee pays two pice for dipping the doomed creature, and two pice for offering it. At the latter, or tomb of Mirza, another awful destruction of animals is witnessed. A number of blood-stained priests stand behind a stone in front of the temple, in readiness to relieve the one who takes the sucking-pig from the devotee, dashes its head upon the stone, and hands it back to the offerer, who rushes with the bleeding animal into the building to let the blood drop on the dishonored shrine. In the evening time, heaps of dead sucking-pigs of a thousand each may be seen, said pigs being sold off at a pice each to koris and other low caste Hindus. It was calculated that one animal a minute was sacrificed from sunrise to sunset of every day, for a week; thus not less than 5040 animals were cruelly and uselessly immolated during the time we were present at this great pandemonium.

was the same this year as last. We rose in the gray of the morning to our bugle call, and met for prayer and consultation and council; then, when our hearts were strong and our faith as one man's, we sallied forth with banner flying and music playing, assured of victory. We chose a shady convenient, place where we could operate without fear of being molested, and at the same time readily reach the great mass of the people. There we spread our carpet, conducted our services, and invited the worshippers of a gory deity to the loving arms of the Great Father. Sometimes we would march round and through the fair among the crowds, who had come with a view to the worshipping of mammon as well as to the worshipping of the particular deity at the mela; then we would be greeted with cries of 'Here come the padris that fascinate and then make the people Christians!'

"Enough if we say that we had never less than 500 people at any one of our services conducted in the open mela, and that perfect order reigned, and the greatest attention was given throughout. At one time the people were so moved that they shouted as one man, with all the enthusiasm of devotees, 'Isa panth ki jai!' (May the religion of Christ prosper!) and kept prolonging the shout for some time. The women, too, this year found their way into the listening crowds; and after the services would bring their children, place them at our feet, and ask for our blessing. At the close of every service one or two would respond to our call, come out, and be received before the whole assembly, either as disciples or inquirers. One noted faqir, a kabir panthi named Mangal Das, pressed out of the crowd, threw himself at our feet, and said that he surrendered body and soul to the Lord Jesus Christ. We baptized him and broke to him the bread of holy fellowship in the midst of the astonished people. Thus we received as disciples of Jesus Christ in this fair seven persons—one faqir, two Brahmans, and four koris—and took the names of over fifty inquirers.

"But the most encouraging thing we met with at this mela was the visit paid us of the two pandits whom we baptized last year. They came from their village, fourteen miles from the fair, specially to see us. We found that they had stood firm all through the year, though at times greatly persecuted; that they had intelligently read the books we had given them; and that they were more determined than ever to know the Lord more and more, and serve Him with all their physical and mental powers. They were greatly revived and refreshed by their timely visit, and went back to their village powerfully impressed. Nothing to me showed the power of the Gospel at this mela of blood, more than the words of the kabir panthi faqir whom we baptized and met at Balrampore on our way home from the fair. 'Sir,' he said, 'I went to the mela a Hindu, I have returned a Christian.'"

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Conference of the Independent Republicans of New York and Massachusetts was held in this city on June 17th. It was attended by many influential politicians, including the editors of several Republican daily journals. Mr. George William Curtis occupied the chair. The conference was practically unanimous in its opinion of the course to be pursued, which was to await the action of the Democratic Convention, and then, if the candidates of that convention were not satisfactory to the Independent Republicans, to place another ticket in the field. It appeared to be the sense of the entire meeting that the Independent Republicans could be depended on to support the Democratic nominations, provided they were of such men as Cleveland or Bayard. A prominent member of the party, referring to the principles of his associates, said: "They do not want much of a platform for their candidate. They say nothing about the tariff, or the currency, or the corporations. But they do insist that their candidate shall be privately honest and politically decent." Mr. William Hayes Ward, editor of The Independent, said that "the general impression of the religious press" on the subject of the nominations "was one of disgust." Several resolutions were passed at the conference, the most important of which was, "That a committee of twenty-five members be appointed, whose duty it shall be, in co-operation with similar committees to be appointed elsewhere, to take without delay suitable measures for rallying and organizing the Republicans and Independents dissatisfied with the nominations of Blaine and Logan, with a view to the holding, at as early a day as possible, of a general representative conference for the purpose of concerting such further steps as may be found advisable for the expression and effective enforcement of our views of public interest." A similar meeting was held June 23d at New Haven, Conn. The call for it was signed by 150 citizens who always vote the Republican ticket. Among them are the names of Professor William G. Sumner, Eli Whitney, Jr., Professor Henry W. Farnam, J. B. Sargent, the Rev. Dr. Edwin Harwood, the Rev. T. R. Bacon, the Rev. George P. Disher, the Rev. Stewart Means, and Professor James Dana. The movement is declared to have the countenance of President Noah Porter, of Yale College.

The Formal Notification of the Nomination of the Republican National Convention was conveyed to Mr. Blaine on Saturday, at his home in Augusta, Me. As usual, the duty was performed by a committee of one from each State and Territory of the Union. Chairman Henderson, of Missouri, read the address to the candidate. He gave prominence to the fact that the sure Republican States desired Mr. Blaine's nomination, and referring to the prevalent dissatisfaction in doubtful States, said that similar disappointment had been felt in 1860, 1872, and 1880, but "in each case the shock of disappointment was followed by 'sober second thought.' Individual preferences gradually yielded to conviction of public duty. Promptings of patriotism finally rose superior to the irritations and animosities of the hour." Mr. Blaine, in accepting the nomination, said: "A more formal acceptance will naturally be expected, and will in due season be communicated. It may, however, not be inappropriate at this time to say that I have already made a careful study of the principles announced by the National Convention, and that in whole and in detail they have my heartiest sympathy and meet my unqualified approval." That expression was to be expected on the part of the nominee, but there are some planks in the platform, suggestive of communism, that are offensive to many influental members of the party; these Mr. Blaine may deem it expedient to qualify or more clearly explain in his formal letter of acceptance.

The New York Democratic State Convention was in session last week at Saratoga. Its assembling had been anticipated with unusual interest and some little apprehension by Democrats all through the Union. An impression prevailed that success in the approaching Presidential election depended in no small degree on the conduct of the Democracy in New York. The opportunity afforded by the dissensions in the Republican camp might be thrown away if there should be corresponding dissension between the sections of the Democratic party here. That such an event might reasonably be apprehended was evident to all who are acquainted with recent political history, and with the attitude of Tammany Hall toward the other sections of the party. The convention was, however, practically harmonious, and a conciliatory attitude toward Tammany gave no excuse for a bolt. Seven seats were taken from the County Democracy and given to Tammany, thus placing both sections on an equality. The delegation to the National Convention was not instructed for Cleveland, but it was ordered to enter the convention as a unit and to act and vote as a unit according to a majority vote of the members. The adoption of this unit rule is considered a victory for Cleveland, though a canvass of the delegates shows he is not at present absolutely secure of the majority. There is an opposition to the Governor of a strong character among many of the influential members of his party in the State. Like that against President Arthur in his party, it is based on the fact that his administration has not been satisfactory to the bosses, and because "he has ruled without recognition of the party which elected him." The chief point in his favor is that he would probably carry the disaffected Republican vote.

Senator Hoar's Anti-Polygamy Bill was passed by the Senate on June 18th by a vote of 33 to 15. The bill, as finally passed, provides that the lawful husband or wife may be compelled to testify in prosecutions for bigamy or polygamy; that every marriage ceremony shall be registered with full particulars, under penalty of fine, or imprisonment, or both; that women shall not vote at elections; that the territorial laws of incorporation of the Mormon Church be repealed, and the affairs of the corporation be administered by a board of trustees appointed by the President of the United States; and that existing election districts in the Territory be abolished and the Territory redistricted by the Governor, the Territorial Secretary, and the United States judges. The office of Superintendent of District Schools is also declared vacant, and the appointment vested in the Supreme Court. It will be seen that the measure is a very radical one, which, if it becomes law, will curb the power of the Mormon Church and render the detection, conviction, and punishment of polygamists less difficult.

The Contract Labor Bill was Passed by the House on June 19th. It prohibits the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract to perform labor. It makes it unlawful to enter into an agreement with any foreigner to perform labor of any kind in the United States, or to prepay the transportation, or in any way assist or encourage the importation of any foreigner under contract. It declares all such contracts void and of no effect. It makes it a crime, punishable with fine and imprisonment, for any master of a ship to land such aliens in any United States port. Apparently the House has no objection to foreigners coming who will have to take their chance of obtaining employment, nor even to pauper immigrants coming; but it objects to immigration when the immigrant has been sufficiently prudent to secure an arrangement enabling him to live honestly here before leaving his native country.

The Governor of New York has Signed the bill requiring the telegraph companies to put their wires underground in New York City and Brooklyn. The constitutionality of the law will be tested in the courts, but it is expected that the companies will fail in their effort to defeat it. The bill gives them until November, 1885, to perform the work, when, if it is not done, the municipal authorities are authorized to do it at the expense of the companies. If this law should be enforced other cities will follow the example of New York, and the unsightly poles which now disfigure our cities and impede traffic will disappear. Officers of the companies admit that the scheme is feasible and the expense one that they can easily bear.

The Rev. Matthew Simpson, the Senior Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, died at his residence in Philadelphia on June 18th. He had been ill for several weeks, and since Sunday, June 15th, had lain speechless and unconscious. Bishop Simpson was in his seventy-third year, having been born in Cadiz, Ohio, June 20th, 1811. He adopted the medical profession, and studied at Madison (afterward Alleghany) College. After his conversion he became an active class leader and lay preacher. His talents attracted considerable attention, and he was urged to enter the ministry. He recognized the call, and received his first appointment from the Pittsburg Conference. In 1835 he was ordained by Bishop Roberts. In May, 1852, he was elected and ordained Bishop at Boston. In discharge of his official duties as bishop Dr. Simpson visited and held conferences in all the States and most of the Territories, and he became the best known of the bishops in this country. In 1857 he was sent by the General Conference as a delegate to the Irish and British Conference, and in the same year as a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance in Berlin. He extended his travels through Turkey, the Holy Land, Egypt, and Greece, returning home in 1858. He changed his residence in 1859 from Pittsburg to Evanston, Ill., becoming President of the Garrett Biblical Institute in that city. Bishop Simpson was the author of "A Hundred Years of Methodism," "Yale Lectures on Preaching," and was the editor of the "Cyclopædia of Methodism." He was the most noted orator in the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Mr. Ira D. Sankey Arrived in New York by the Britannic on Saturday, accompanied by Mrs. Sankey and their two children. In reply to inquiries about his health, he said that he had been much benefited by the voyage, the most enjoyable he had ever experienced. "I'm feeling a little worn out," he said to a reporter, "but pretty well. All I need is a few weeks' rest. We have had on an average three meetings a day for seven months. It was wearing on one. The houses were crowded and overflowing—there were from four thousand to six thousand people at every meeting. We did not go outside of London. Mr. Moody? Oh, he's well, but in need of rest. He will be here week after next, I think. We will begin work together here, but just where I cannot say. That will not be decided on until fall." Mr. Sankey proceeded after a brief rest to Newcastle, Pa., the residence of his late father, who died during the evangelist's absence in London.

The American Institute of Christian Philosophy, of which the Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., is president, will hold its summer school at Key East, one mile below Ocean Grove, N. J., from July 15th to 19th. The Rev. Dr. Jesse B. Thomas, Judge Noah K. Davis, Babu Ram Chandra Bose, of India, and President W. K. Pendleton, of Bethany College, Virginia, will read papers. Dr. Deems will deliver the annual address. The August Summer School of the Institute will be held at Richfield Springs from the 20th to the 28th. Information in regard to these meetings and other courses will be furnished by Mr. Charles M. Davis, 4 Winthrop Place, New York City.

Mrs. Pearson, of Nottingham, England, is holding temperance meetings at Newark, N. J., in connection with the National Women's Christian Temperance Union. She is one of the Vice-Presidents of the British Women's Temperance Association and President of the Nottingham branch, and has come to this country as a deputation from the English societies to learn something of the American methods of work and to assist in the movement here. She was formerly a preacher among the Society of Friends, and is an eloquent speaker. She has frequently addressed audiences of six thousand people in Manchester, Nottingham, Newcastle, York, and other places in England. She will speak during the summer at temperance conventions at Ocean Grove, Round Lake, Martha's Vineyard, and elsewhere, and will return to England in the fall.

The Training Class in Systematic Bible study held in the Bible Work Room, 150 Madison Street, Chicago, has just closed a successful six weeks' session. Miss E. Dryer, in the course of a letter describing the methods of work adopted, states that this training school for Christian workers will be reopened in the autumn. Professor W. G. Moorhead, D.D., of Xenia, Ohio, during the last session conducted the class, assisted by other pastors.

Ah Yung Wing, Chinese Consul in New York, and a disciple of Confucius, addressed the scholars of the Chinese Sunday-school Union last week in the Fourteenth Street Presbyterian Church, in New York. His bright-colored garments contrasted conspicuously with the clothes of the Christian ministers seated near him. His petticoat was of a vivid green, and his upper outer garment of a blue shade. He wore a skull cap, which he kept on during the service. The Rev. Frederick J. Masters, who is on his way to his home in England after a ten years' residence as a missionary in Canton, offered prayer in the Cantonese dialect. "Jesus Our King" was sung simultaneously in Chinese and English. The hymn was inscribed in Chinese in black letters on white canvas, which was hung on the pulpit where the scholars could see it. About three hundred and fifty scholars joined in the service. Dr. F. F. Ellenwood, of the Presbyterian Foreign Mission Board, described the work among the Chinese, and said that however the politicians might feel about them, the Church was resolved to show that it represented something other than the typical hoodlum, and that the American feeling toward them was not portrayed by the brickbats of the Irish Catholics of the Pacific coast. The Consul said that he was gratified at the interest evinced in the welfare of his countrymen in New York, and trusted that they would appreciate what was being done for them. Addressing them in their own language, he advised them to shun opium, and gambling, and bad associations, and to go to Sunday-school. He subscribed $40 to the union. There are now twenty-one Chinese Sunday-schools in the two cities.

Dr. Alexander J. Baird, of Nashville, Tenn., an indefatigable preacher and earnest Christian worker, died in New York on Sunday, June 15th. He was on his way to attend the meetings of the Presbyterian Alliance at Belfast, when he was seized with the illness which terminated fatally. Few men have achieved so much in a lifetime as Dr. Baird. His energy seemed inexhaustible and his zeal untiring. He was born in 1824 in Fayette Co., Pa., near the residence of his uncle, the late Dr. Robert Baird. Early in life he went South, and during the greater part of his life resided at Nashville, Tenn. He entered the ministry of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and from that time forward his life was one of ceaseless activity. The church at Nashville, which at the commencement of his ministry had but twenty-seven members, rapidly rose to seven hundred members, and beside the work of the pastorate he performed the duty of professor of theology at Cumberland University at Lebanon, and was a frequent conributor to the press. His influence in the church was most useful and benignant. After the war he labored unceasingly for the restoration of fraternal relations and the promotion of friendly feeling. He will be sorely missed by the church.

An Appeal on Behalf of the Women of Syria was made recently by a native Syrian lady, Mme. Layyah Barakat, in the Memorial Chapel, New York. She is a tall, well-proportioned woman, about thirty-five years of age, with a clear, light olive complexion, and a decidedly Oriental cast of features. She speaks English remarkably well for an Asiatic, only a slight foreign accent and some idiomatic imperfections betraying the fact that ours was not the language of her infancy. She gave a touching description of the condition of woman in those Eastern countries where Christanity does not yet prevail, and said that while it was a shame for an American man not to be a Christian, it would be a crying shame for an American woman, for whom the Gospel has done so much. She concluded by an eloquent appeal for aid to spread the light of Christianity in her native land.

A Saloon Keeper's Conversion through a transparency is related by the Evangelistic Record of Chicago. It appears that soon after the Adelphi Gospel Theatre was opened in that city a large transparency was placed over the door to the stairs leading to the Mission, and upon it was the motto, "The wages of sin is death." This motto faced the saloon door, so that no one could come out without reading the sign. This was the reverse of soothing to the consciences of the patrons of the saloon, and resulted in so much loss of custom that the saloon-keeper begged Mr. Kirkland to take the sign down. Mr. Kirkland, not wishing to stir up any ill-feeling, agreed to do so; but before he was ready the saloon-keeper sold out and gave up the business. Soon after he began attending the meetings, and has since been hopefully converted. In giving his testimony at a recent meeting, he said that whenever he looked up from his bar that sign, with its solemn warning, shone directly in his face. It haunted him; he could not shake off the impression it made. It seemed to be branded on his soul. At last he could stand it no longer, and gave up the business. Even this gave his guilty conscience no peace, and he only found comfort in the joy that comes through believing.

PENTECOST.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"The day of Pentecost."—ACTS 2 : 1.

Jewish Consistency an Example to Christians The Feasts and their Lessons—The Teaching of Pentecost — The First-fruits — The Consecrated Harvests—I. Of the Field—What the Offering Meant—That all Came from God—That it Needs His Blessing—Held as His Stewards—A Gift of Joy—II. Of Jesus Christ—The First Through the Spirit — The Inauguration of the Gospel—First-fruits of Jews and Gentiles—In What it Consisted—III. Of Each Person—The Ceremony—Its Significance.

LOOKING into a silversmith's window on Thursday last I observed a notice card, upon which was printed as follows—"This shop will be closed this evening, and will not be re-opened until Tuesday evening." I looked at the name over the window, and observed that it belonged to one of the house of Israel. I had forgotten till that moment that we have now reached the Levitical feast of Pentecost, which contains among its regulations that no servile work is to be done; and hence all business is laid aside by the faithful Jew. Surely, the Jews in their care to observe their law deserve much praise. At what an expense must large trading firms suspend their business! They read a lesson to many professed Christians who seem to have little regard for the Lord's day, break in upon its rest in a thousand frivolous ways, and half regret that they cannot pursue their earthly callings throughout the whole seven days of the week.

It is true that we consider these days, and weeks, and sacred festivals to have become obsolete by the fulfilment of the great truths which they typified; but as this is not the judgment of the Jew because he has not received Jesus as the Messiah, we may at least learn from his strict observance of the Sabbath, and the Passover, and the feast of Pentecost, that it becomes us to study the spiritual and to guard with care the one great festival which remains to the Church, namely, the Lord's-day. On our Sabbath let us do no needless work, but seek rest both for body and soul.

We are now at the season called Pentecost. In the reading of the Scriptures I showed you out of Leviticus 23, that the first feast was the Passover, and that there is no feasting, no satisfaction, no peace, no rest, no joy, to any heart till first of all we have seen the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus, who is our passover. When we have understood the great truth declared in Jehovah's Word, "When I see the blood, I will pass over you," then we know what it is to dwell in safety within the blood-besprinkled doors, while the destroying angel passes by. Through the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world, "we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement." Under the covering of the blood of the Lord's passover, we feast upon the Paschal Lamb, and thus our hunger is removed, our desires are satisfied, our strength is renewed, and our heart is made glad.

As the result and outcoming of that passover, we do in fact what the Jews did in emblem on the morrow after the Passover-Sabbath—we confess that we are not our own, but are bought with a price, and that all that we have belongs to our redeeming Lord. On the morrow after the Sabbath the Israelite brought the wave-sheaf of his barley-harvest, which was waved before the Lord in type that every product of the soil, and all the result of man's labor, was from God, and belonged to God. So soon as we have fed upon Christ, and have come out of the house of bondage, we begin to inquire, "What shall I render unto the Lord for all His benefits toward me?" It becomes an instinct with us to express our gratitude in one way or another. Without any deliberation or delay we conclude that if He has loved us, and given Himself for us, we ought to show our love to Him in some manifest form.

Seven clear weeks passed away from the waving of the sheaf of the barley harvest, and then came for all the crops, and principally for the wheat harvest, which was then in full operation: this was Pentecost. In fifty days Israel was fully clear of Egypt, far away in the desert, and quite delivered from all fear of pursuing armies. Pharaoh's hosts had been destroyed, and the Red Sea rolled between Israel and her former oppressors. Then it was that they held a holy convocation. They did not bring to God in the wilderness the loaves of bread of first-fruits, for they had not yet reached the land which would yield them a harvest, but they held their convocation, and were instructed as to what their duty would be when they came to the promised land. When they actually reached their possessions in Canaan, they kept the fiftieth day, and held a solemn feast in which they presented unto the Lord two loaves of bread, made of fine flour from the new wheat. This offering dedicated the harvest.

The teaching of this ceremony is just this: "When you are saved, when you have entered into rest, when you have considered and deliberated, then renew your vows unto the Lord, make your consecration more large, and full and deliberate, and dedicate yourself and all that you have unto the Lord who has given you all things richly to enjoy. You have already, in the short time since you have known the sprinkled blood, obtained a harvest of joy and peace; therefore delay not to bring a worthy portion unto the Lord, and say unto him, 'Thou hast set me free, and made me to be Thy servant, and now I offer to Thee all that I am and all that I have, for Thou hast bought me with Thy precious blood.'"

"Were the whole realm of nature mine,
That were a present far too small;
Love so amazing, so divine,
Demands my soul, my life, my all!"

ITS LESSONS.

Thus the three feasts can be understood by us in our own spiritual experience. We can keep them in spirit; let us do so at once. Let us again rehearse the passover by fresh faith in Jesus; let us renew our first dedication, which was like to the wave-sheaf; and then let us come with solemn resolve, and after many days of sweet experience, let us renew our covenant before the Lord, saying—

"High heaven, that heard the solemn vow,
That vow renew'd shall daily hear:
Till in life's latest hour I bow,
And bless in death a bond so dear."

We deliberately wish our loyalty to stand good to the end; we have no desire to draw back, but rather would we wish to be more completely the Lord's than ever we have been. We would bring "a new meat offering before the Lord," and keep the feast with great joy, ceasing from all servile work, but in the spirit of obedient children serving the Lord with gladness. Thus we read Pentecost by the light within.

THE CHRISTIAN PENTECOST.

On the larger platform of the Lord's doings for His Church, the passover stands for the sacrifice of our Lord Jesus upon the cross, when He poured out His soul unto death, that by His blood we might be saved from wrath. The waving of the barley sheaf was carried out by our Lord's rising from the dead on the morrow after the Sabbath, when He rose from the dead and became the first-fruits of them that slept. The feast of first-fruits fifty days after His death is fulfilled by the descent of the Holy Ghost, giving to the Church the first-fruits of the Spirit, and working the conversion of three thousand souls, who were thus the first-fruits from among the Jews.

This beginning of blessing was followed by a revival which continued with the Church at Jerusalem for a long time, and extended throughout all the world, till almost every nation had in a short time learned the doctrine of the cross, and multitudes had submitted unto Christ. Of this greater Pentecost we shall not fail to speak this morning: we shall dwell upon both the type and the antitype, and if I run them a little into one another, you must forgive me. The type is so admirable, and so many-sided, that it has its own actual lesson as well as its figurative lesson. I scarcely know where the type ends and where the antitype begins; but your meditations will easily set it right if I should make a muddle.

First, I shall speak upon the consecrated harvest of the field, which we shall illustrate by the passage out of Leviticus; then, secondly, upon the consecrated harvest of our Lord Jesus Christ; and, as a practical lesson, we shall close by considering the consecrated harvest which should come from each soul unto the redeeming Lord.

I. First, let us speak of the consecrated

HARVEST OF THE FIELD.

It may seem somewhat singular to you tnat we should be talking of harvest on this first day of June; but I beg you to remember that the Bible was written in Palestine; and in that country the harvest is much earlier than in this northerly latitude, where the climate is so much more severe. An early day in June would be the average time for the fruits of the field to be ripe. At the beginning of the barley harvest the first ripe ears were presented to the Lord in due order, but at the fuller festival they brought into God's house, not the ears of wheat, but two large loaves of bread taken from their habitations—the fruit of the earth actually prepared for human food. These loaves were offered unto the Lord with other sacrifices. What did that mean?

It meant, first that

ALL CAME FROM GOD.

"We know that," says one. Yes, we do know it, but we often talk as if it were not true. We regard our bread as the fruit of our own labor; which also is true, but it is only a small part of the truth; for who is He that gives us strength to labor, and gives the earth the power to bring forth her harvest from the seed which is sown in her furrows? It is not every man that accepts the mercies of daily providence as in very truth sent from God. I fear in many houses bread is eaten and the giver is forgotten. Oh, you Christian people, you are clothed by the charity of God, and fed by His bounty, and if you do not continually acknowledge that every good gift is from your heavenly Father, may the Lord have pity upon you, and bring you to your right minds! Poverty has been sometimes sent upon men because they were not grateful when they enjoyed abundance. Persons who can grumble when their board is loaded, must not wonder if one of these days they become so distressed as to pine for the crumbs which once fell from their table.

The waving of those loaves before the Lord signified, next, that all our possessions need God's blessing upon them. It would be a horrible thing to be rich with yet some are in that condition; and, consequently, the more they hoard, the more curse they lay up for themselves. Without a blessing from God His gifts become temptations, and bring with them care rather than refreshment. If thou hast an ample estate, yet if thou hast more blessing, thy riches shall not be a snare to thee; but thou shalt be able to endure prosperity, which to many is like the height of the craggy rock from which they are dashed down to destruction.

It meant, next, all that we have we hold under God as His stewards. These two loaves were a kind of "peppercorn rent" acknowledging the superior landlord who was the true owner of the Holy Land. Have we all done this with our substance? Do we continually dedicate all that we have unto our God, and stand to the dedication? Do we make a conscientious use of such temporal benefits as the Lord intrusts to us? Where is that one talent of thine, slothful servant? Where are those five talents, O thou man of influence and of wealth?

Let us learn one more lesson; all this was done as

AN ACT OF JOY.

Beloved, the Lord would not have any of you give of your substance to Him with rueful countenance, squeezing it out as though you were losing a drop of blood. Give nothing if you cannot give heartily, but do everything unto the Lord with all your heart, and soul, and strength. The Lord would not have the ark of the covenant dragged by unwilling beasts, but He ordained that it should be carried upon the willing shoulders of chosen men, to whom the service was an honor and a delight. He would have His servants sing in their joyous hymns, "God is the Lord, which hath showed us light; bind the sacrifice with cords, even unto the horns of the altar." He would have each one gladly say, "O Lord, truly I am thy servant; I am Thy servant, and the son of Thine handmaid; Thou hast loosed my bonds."

II. Thus far we have been considering part of the lesson of the original Jewish Pentecost. Now we must hasten on to consider, in the second place, the consecrated

HARVEST OF OUR LORD

Jesus Christ, as taught by the events of the great Christian Pentecost described in the Acts of the Apostles. Our Lord is the greatest of all sowers, for He sowed Himself. Did He not say, "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit?" Our Lord had been sown in His death and burial; and since such a corn of wheat as this is quick in growing, and soon yields a harvest, in fifty days there comes a time for the ingathering of the first-fruits. Had He not said, "Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they are white already to harvest?" and now, when the day of Pentecost was fully come, the fruit was seen of them, and joyfully gathered. Let us learn some lessons from the Christian Pentecost.

First, learn that the first harvest of our Lord Jesus Christ was through the Holy Ghost. There were no three thousand converts till first of all was heard the rushing of mighty wind. I know that I address a great many workers, and I therefore say to each one of them—pay great attention to your own spiritual state. If you desire to save your class you must yourself be endowed with the power of the Holy Ghost. You cannot burn a way for the truth into the heart of another unless the tongue of fire is given to you from on high. Mind this.

That day when the Spirit of God was given may be considered to be the ordering of the Christian dispensation. You may not have noticed it, but if you will count the days you will find that it was exactly fifty days after the original passover that the law was given on Mount Sinai. Now we assert that as the inauguration of the law was on Pentecost, so also was

THE INAUGURATION OF THE GOSPEL.

At the commencement of the Old Testament dispensation, what manifestation do we get? God gives His people a law. At the commencement of the New Testament dispensation, what do we get? A law? No, the Lord gives His people the Spirit. That is a very different matter. Under the old covenant the command was given; but under the new covenant the will and the power to obey are bestowed upon us by the Holy Ghost. Moses on the mount can only tell us what to do, but Jesus ascended on high pours out the power to do it. Now we are not under the law, but under grace, and the Spirit is our guiding force. In the Church of God our rule is not according to the letter of a law, but according to the Spirit of the Lord. Servants, you know, must be told to do this and that, at such an hour, and in such a way; but loving, obedient children may be left free to obey the dictates of their loving hearts. The Lord is in the midst of His people in love and fellowship, and by the indwelling Spirit whereby He leads the sacred marchings of His redeemed. Pentecost was thus the inauguration of the Gospel dispensation.

This Pentecost was also the beginning of a great harvest of Jews and Gentiles. Were there not two loaves? Nor only shall Israel be saved, but the multitude of the Gentiles shall be turned unto the Lord Jesus Christ, and He shall see of His soul's travail in those whom His Father gave Him from before the foundation of the world. If the first-fruits were so great, what will the ultimate harvest be? Let us look for whole kingdoms to submit themselves to Jesus.

That day of Pentecost, or feast of first-fruits, what was it? Did it consist in many conversions only? No. I believe that the filling of the apostles with the Holy Ghost was a part of the first-fruits of the day of Pentecost. We ourselves who are born to God, whenever the Holy Spirit visits us in His fulness, and sanctifies and elevates us, are a large part of our Lord's reward. A man full of the Holy Ghost rejoices the heart of Christ. Your who have a name to live and nothing more, who shiver over Christ's commands, and never plunge into His service to find waters to swim in, bring Him little honor and little pleasure; but when we are filled with the Holy Ghost we make men see the glory of His grace, and His name is magnified in the esteem of all onlookers. Still, the major part of the Pentecostal first-fruits will be found in the great number that were that day converted.

The Christian Pentecost is to us full of instruction. Learn you its lessons. First, the disciples had to wait for it. "The husbandman waiteth for the precious fruit of the earth." Sow on. If you have to wait a week of weeks or a week of years, wait with confidence, for Pentecost will yet yield its loaves unto the Lord. They obtained nothing until they began preaching the Gospel, and then in one day the Church was multiplied by twenty-five. O! when shall each member bring in five-and-twenty in a day by preaching the Word. Oh, for a great day of preaching, when all shall turn out and preach. If all the Lord's servants and handmaids began to publish His salvation, we should soon wake up these sleepy millions, and London would be all on the move toward better things. A great multitude must preach the Gospel if we are to have a great multitude converted by it.

IMPERFECT FIRST-FRUITS.

Yet if even we should see three thousand converted in a day we must not reckon that such first-fruits would be absolutely perfect. In the first Pentecost, as we have seen, leavened cakes were presented to God, so in all our successes and additions there will sure to be a leaven. Do not wonder if some converts go back; if others turn out to be hypocrites, or merely temporary converts. It will always be so, and we should not think it a new and strange trial; tares grow with the wheat, and bad fish are taken in the same net with the good. Therefore let the Church in her best success keep still to Christ and His precious blood, and daily turn to His finished sacrifice. Pray the Lord to send us day after day such additions to the Church that we shall be scarcely able to hear all the testimonies of what the Lord has done for them. Then let us sing, "'Hallelujah, Hallelujah," every day in the week and every hour of the day. Let us rejoice and be glad, and give a hearty welcome to those who come into the Church, and hearty praise to God who sends them.

III. The last thing was to be the consecrated

HARVEST FROM EACH PERSON.

What I have to say is not mine, but the Lord's. If you open your Bibles at Deuteronomy 26 you will find there a form of service which I pray may serve your turn to-day. After the first offering on behalf of the nation consecrating all the harvest, individuals began to bring their first-fruits personally, even to the very end of the year. Whenever the olives had been pressed, or the figs had been gathered, or the grapes had been trodden, or the wheat-fields had been reaped, the truly believing Israelite took a part of his crop to the house of God, and presented it as a love-token. "And it shall be, when thou art come in unto the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance, and possesseth it, and dwellest therein; that thou shall take of the first of all the fruit of the earth, which thou shalt bring of thy land that the Lord thy God giveth thee, and shalt put it in a basket, and shall go unto the place which the Lord thy God shall choose to place His name there. And thou shalt go unto the priest that shall be in those days, and say unto him, I profess this day unto the Lord thy God, that I am come unto the country which the Lord sware unto our fathers for to give us. And the priest shall take the basket out of thine hand, and set it down before the altar of the Lord thy God."

See how the offerer began—"I profess this day unto the Lord thy God, that I am come unto the country which the Lord sware unto our fathers for to give us." I wish to stand here this morning and to say for myself what I hope you can say each one for himself, "I am come to the land of peace and rest which the Lord promised to believers. I am become a possessor of all things in Christ." That is the reason why I would bring my offering. If the Lord has brought you into the goodly land of salvation you too should unto Him.

When he had made his offering spontaneously and freely because God had done so much for him, then he went home to enjoy all the good things which God had given him. He did not feel as if he were practising self-indulgence when he ate of his figs or partook of his pomegranates, for his fruits in the lump were sanctified by the first-fruits being made holy unto the Lord. He was not afraid to partake of the bounties of Providence, for he had received of the bounties of grace. He did not eat what had never been blessed of God, but he went his way and heard the priest say, as he left the sanctuary, "Thou shalt rejoice in every good thing which the Lord thy God hath given unto thee, and unto thine house, thou, and the Levite, and the stranger that is among you." Then he understood the language of Solomon, "Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepeth thy works." Thus may the true believer receive with gladness the supplies which his heavenly Father gives him, and if he, for Christ's sake, and the love of men, abstains from partaking of wine, he abstains with greater delight than he ever had in drinking it. Regarding nothing as common or unclean, let us in everything give thanks, and whether we eat or drink, or whatsoever we do, let us glorify God, and feel that he blesses us. This earth which once was accursed becomes to holy men a place of blessing, the vestibule of glory, none other than the house of God, and the very gate of heaven. Oh,

YOU THAT HAVE NEVER EATEN

of the Paschal Lamb, that have never been sprinkled with His blood, you cannot know anything about this; you cannot offer anything to God; you cannot receive His blessing upon your daily lives, because you have not first of all accepted salvation by the atoning blood. I wish you would now come to Jesus; I pray God you may. But, oh, if you have known the power of the death of Christ, and so are pardoned, do not miss the further joy of a consecrated life, the joy of spending and being spent for Him who redeemed you. The Lord your God is so blessed in Himself that when you give yourself to Him His blessedness overflows and fills you. Nothing is so much ours as what is wholly God's; and when we are not our own, then by some strange logic we are most our own. When we have most fully practised self-denial, then the best riches and the rarest wealth and the truest blessedness is ours. God help us to test this statement, and so to keep the feast. Amen.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

The Fall of a Tenement House in Grand Street, New York, on June 14th, placed several lives in jeopardy. The building was old and dilapidated. Several times since 1880 it has been reported as unsafe, but nevertheless thirty-nine persons continued to make it their home. On Saturday morning cracks were noticed in the walls, and an experienced fireman, who was passing, detected indications of a speedy collapse. He took the trouble to go to the agent of the owners, acquaint him with the condition of the house, and also to warn the tenants of their danger. Some of them heeded the warning, and promptly quitted the dwelling, but others remained; they had been warned before, and no evil had happened. About two o'clock the walls were seen to totter, and a general shout was raised to those inside to come out. There was a scene of excitement as the people rushed out of the doors, but three persons still remained, and were there when the house fell, a few minutes later. Happily they escaped with a broken limb or two, the beams having fallen slantwise, and so protecting them; but it was a narrow escape. The bystanders called them foolish for staying in the building after so many warnings, but their conduct was wisdom compared with that of men who neglect the warning which day by day is being given to unsaved men to fly to Christ while there is time (Ezek. 18 : 31).

The Alarm of a Conscience-Stricken Thief led to a reformation of character in a village in Connecticut. A farmer who suffered from petty pilfering suspected one of his neighbors. He watched his barn, and saw, one night, a man coming out with a large bundle of hay on his back. Instead of meeting the man face to face, and charging him with the crime, the farmer rushed into his house, where a wood-fire was still burning. Seizing a blazing brand, he noiselessly overtook the thief, thrust the brand into the hay and retired. In a minute or two the thief was suddenly startled by the crackling flames bursting over his head. Thinking the fire had been sent from heaven to consume him, he dropped the bundle and ran home almost paralyzed with fright. The next day he sought the farmer. With great distress of mind he confessed all his petty pilferings, and avowed his purpose to live an honest life. The farmer forgave him, and never told the story until after the death of the penitent thief—who faithfully adhered to his resolution. This is not the first time that an accusing conscience has caused a fright (Lev. 26 : 36).

Burglars were Astonished Recently at Finding, in a house they broke open at Corning, N. Y., a strong iron safe containing rare and valuable jewels wth the door unfastened. The burglars knew of the existence of the jewels, knew that they were put in the safe every night, and that the owner was on that particular night absent from home. They broke into the house, but found that there was no need of their safe-breaking implements, for the safe door was not even locked. They therefore secured the diamonds and other valuables, and departed without molesting any one. When the facts were disclosed some unfavorable comments were made by the neighbors on the carelessness of the family or servants of the owner, who in his absence neglected to lock the safe. They were promptly stopped, however, by the owner declaring that the safe was left unlocked by his express orders. He said that when he was at home he took particular care of his valuables, but when he went away he directed the safe to be left open, so that if burglars came they could obtain their booty without agitating his wife, or inflicting pain upon her to force her to tell them the combination. He thought the safety of his jewels would be dearly purchased at the expense of his wife's suffering. We can commend the affectionate thoughtfulness of the husband, and wish that other people, who appear to be ready to sacrifice home, affection, their children, and even their souls to get wealth, would similarly place a more correct estimate on its value (Mark 8 : 36).

THE DYNAMITE EXPLOSIONS IN LONDON ON MAY 30.

(See Illustrations.)

ON Friday night, May 30th, as stated in our issue of June 5th under the head of "Foreign Topics," a series of explosions, the work of Irish Fenian miscreants, took place in Scotland Yard, London, the chief office of the Metropolitan police, and in St. James's Square, Pall Mall, where great damage was wrought in the rear of the Clubs.

At the Junior Carlton Club the tradesmen's steps, which lead from the square to the kitchen, and were built of iron, were smashed for about half way up, and the kitchen is a wreck.

The infernal machine would appear to have been fired from the eastern end of the area, from whence its force travelled west, blowing in windows and tearing up a cellar-light in the pavement, afterward, in turn, striking upward and demolishing windows in all directions, those of the club of plate glass, and of the adjoining Adair House, which is the office of the Intelligence Department of the War Office, appearing to have been the worst sufferers.

THE SECOND EXPLOSION TOOK PLACE

outside Sir Watkin Williams Wynn's house, situate at an acute angle south-west. A portion of the stonework forming a ledge above the kitchen windows was where the explosive was placed, as the stone was torn away, and the house front bore distinct marks of its radiating influence. Nearly every window was wrecked, together with those of the two houses adjoining —Winchester House on the one side, and the Duke of Cleveland's on the other, at the corner of King Street. Sir Watkin Wynn and a large party of friends were seated in the room after dinner. The baronet, not having recovered from recent indisposition, suffered a severe shock to the nerves from the effects of the explosion, but his medical attendant happening to be among the company, Sir Watkin was promptly attended to, and removed to another part of the house.

A THIRD EXPLOSION FOLLOWED.

This was in the rear of the Detective Department in Scotland Yard, which the officer on duty there says occurred at twenty-two minutes past nine. Here the dynamite had been placed in a building used by the police, facing the Rising Sun Tavern, and when it exploded the iron framework of the erection was blown across the narrow roadway. The solid brickwork of the building, to the height of some eighteen or twenty feet, was also blown to pieces, wrecking the room behind, in which a number of books were stored. Windows and window-frames all round the yard were smashed, and a brougham and cab standing near the tavern were overthrown. A policeman was very seriously injured, and one of the horses was cruelly wounded.

The explosions were heard over a large area, and the police, of course, were soon called out from all the neighboring stations. Some who were early on the scene picked up as many as seventeen packets of dynamite which had not been exploded. They were thin slabs about six inches in length by three in width. It is stated that twelve of the slabs were found under in Trafalgar Square, about an hour after the explosion in Scotland Yard. A constable saw something burning, which, on examining closer he found to be a fuse. A very few more minutes and it is possible that the crowds of people who were flocking toward Whitehall would have been startled, and many of them killed, by the fall of the column, there being little doubt that the quantity of explosive material was sufficient to destroy the base of the monument.

PURSUIT OF A SUPPOSED DYNAMITARD

There is some reason to believe that the perpetrator of the explosions in St. James's Square narrowly escaped being caught in the act as he was observed to throw something down near the club, and in front of Sir Watkin Wynn's house, and make off in the direction of Regent Street. Thither he was pursued by a small crowd, when he hailed a cab, and, strange to say, was enabled to get away. The Hon. Rupert Carington, M. P., saw this part of the escape of the supposed criminal, and he noted down on his shirt-sleeve what he believed to be the number of the cab, and directed the attention of the policeman on the spot to the direction the vehicle was taking. Unfortunately, before further pursuit was possible, the cab was lost in the distance. The supposition is that it had been engaged, as in the case of the Phœnix Park tragedy in Dublin, to wait till the conspirators had done their work.

A large reward is to be offered for information which will convict the offenders. As in the previous dynamite explosions a reward of $10,000 had no satisfactory results, the Government are now being pressed to offer a reward of $25,000. But the wisdom of doing so is doubtful, as so large a sum may tempt some unprincipled fellows to swear falsely against some enemy, in order to get the money.

PROPHETIC STUDENTS BELIEVE that in the recurrence of these startling events, there is not only an unmistakable manifestation of the Frog Spirit (Rev. 16) of revolutionary socialism, but also what seems likely to be a potent factor in promoting the predestined legislative separation of Ireland from Britain. The same spirit has been energetically at work, in fact, ever since 1848, and produced the long-continued rebellion in China, the Sepoy Mutiny in India in 1857, the Druse massacres in Syria, the uprisings in Italy in 1858, the sanguinary Civil War in the United States, and other political convulsions in different parts of the world. All these things are only preparatory to the formation of the countries of Cæsar's Roman Empire into the predicted Ten-kingdomed Confederacy, which will precede the Coming of Christ, and the dawn of the Sun of Millennial Righteousness.

MY LANDLADY'S STORY.

A LONG period of severe application to the duties of my profession, during which I had undergone much worry and anxiety, left me in a state of mental and physical depression indescribably painful. The physician I consulted prescribed tonics and other remedies, but with no good effect, and finally he gave me the prescription so often given and so difficult to use, "Take perfect rest and quiet, and plenty of fresh air." That seemed to me, situated as I was, an impossibility, but at length, when utter collapse seemed imminent, I determined that the impossible must be achieved. I must go away and hide myself beyond reach of letters and telegrams, and amid scenes where there could be nothing to remind me of my ordinary occupations. Meditating on these necessary conditions, the thought of a certain fishing village which I had seen years ago occurred to me. No railroad went near it, no tourists ever visited it; the inhabitants did not care a straw about candidates, conventions, party platforms, or the tariff. That was the place for me, and there I went, after directing all communications to be left at my office in the city until my return. I arrived at my destination one lovely evening in the early summer, just in time to see the sun set beyond the watery horizon.

Early the next morning I was out on the sands drinking in the fresh sea breeze and watching the tide come in. As I sat there I noticed a woman approach the water. She gave an intense look out to sea, and then turned away and began to pace the level stretch of sand, at the farther extremity of which I had taken up my position. Somehow the figure and gait of the woman attracted my interest and I watched her closely. She was barefooted and bareheaded, but that was not unusual among the women of the village, yet there was a grace and dignity in her movements which was uncommon. She wore a loose cloak which the wind whirled about her shoulders, and in her hand was a long light stick. As she came nearer I noticed that she was beautiful, apparently about twenty-three years old, and in her eyes was a far-away, abstracted, vacant look save when she turned them seaward, when the keen, earnest, wistful look could be seen in them. She remained there until the tide turned, walking to and fro, and then as the waves receded she sighed wearily and walked back to the village.

The Forlorn Watcher by the Sea.

The next morning and the next she was there and still acted in the same way. In spite of myself I became interested in her and was curious to learn her story. I described her to the old lady with whom I boarded, and asked her if she knew her.

"Oh, yes," was the reply, "that is crazy Madge. She always goes to that part of the beach every morning. She is quite harmless, but her senses are gone. 'How did it happen?' Well it was three or four years ago. She and her father came to live here and they seemed real fond of each other. They did not seem to be rich but had about enough to keep them comfortably. They came here they said for quiet as the old gentleman was an invalid, and quiet it is here, as you may see, sir. They had been here about six months when they had a visitor, a young man about a year older than Madge. The old gentleman seemed very proud of him, taking him around among the cottages and telling us that he was his only son. He was going to be a lawyer and he looked a real handsome noble fellow. He joked and laughed with any one and seemed full of life and spirits. Madge and he were always together, and the old gentleman was with them whenever he could get out.

"One day the two gentlemen went out in a boat they had borrowed, and the owner of the boat went with them. They wanted to have a day's deep-sea fishing. They do say that Madge was to have gone with them but the night before there had been a quarrel. No one seemed to know what it was about, but it was serious. It was a very strange thing for they were the most loving family I ever saw. The hired girl who waited on them said she heard the father reproving Madge about something and she—she was very high-spirited then—spoke loud and angry-like, and seemed most angry at her brother. She said she would not go with them the next day, but the brother only laughed and said Madge would think better of it in the morning. But she did not go. The hired girl heard the brother go to her door and call her in the morning, and heard Madge say she should not go. He said, 'Don't bear malice, Madge. Come and kiss me and be a good girl." But Madge would not see him, and when he said 'Good-by' she did not answer.

"Well sir, they went out, and that day there was a sudden storm and it is supposed that the boat capsized and they were all drowned, for nothing was ever heard of them again. We saw Madge on the beach in the evening looking out for them and seemingly very anxious. When the night passed and the next day and they did not come, she grew ill and had a dreadful fever. We thought she would die, but she got over it. The first thing she did when she could walk was to go to the beach and walk up and down on the look-out as you saw her, and she has done it every day since.

"A lawyer came to see her after a time and brought a physician with him. He said he was her father's executor. They said it would make her worse to take her away so they arranged for her to stay here and hired a kind, motherly woman to take care of her.

She does not talk much, but is always expecting her father and brother to come back, and appears to have lost sight of the time since they left. If you speak to her she answers quite softly, and so pitifully, 'I am waiting for my father and brother. I am a good girl now. It was only a little silly quarrel we had. I want to tell them I am sorry. I am sure they'll forgive me. I wanted to be forgiven this morning, only I did not like to humble myself. But when they come I shall tell them. They are very late; I do so wish they would come.' It is very sad, sir. We are all sorry for her."

The old lady was right. It was a sad story. I saw Madge every morning during my stay, and she spoke to me on several occasions, asking me if I had seen a boat. By and by as she became accustomed to me she told me why she was there in almost the same words the old lady had given me. It was most painful to listen to her wistful words and to see the humility and pretty anxiety to be forgiven. As I listened and tried to comfort her, her thoughts were still dwelling on the forgiveness she craved, and I thought of the words so strangely pathetic, spoken of another: "He found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears" (Heb. 12 : 17).

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

At a Death-bed.

THE church at Little Aston was by no means Carl Bramwell's ideal church. With the exception of the Waldrons and Morleys, it consisted almost exclusively of very ordinary and vulgar persons, of little education and not enlightened religion. Carl's blue eyes grew dim as he sat at Mr. Waldron's right hand in a square pew under the pulpit, and he felt what an awful thing it is to take the care of souls.

He was so wrapt in this enthusiasm, that he neither heard Mr. Waldron speak, nor the congregation rise to their feet, until a voice close beside him, a voice soft, and sweet, and clear, suddenly rang through his trance, and startled him as with an electric shock. It was nothing more than a voice starting the tune for the hymn about to be sung, but Carl turned his head quickly to the spot whence it sounded. He could not be mistaken as to who were the white-haired and sorrow-stricken man and the young girl standing closely at his side; and his own face flushed and burned with an uncontrollable emotion as he caught the glance of their eyes.

His eyes were still dazzled, and his heart beating painfully, when, after Mr. Waldron had said what he had to say in introducing him to his church, he was obliged to stand up alone and face his people, to give utterance to some of the feelings of his heart toward them. He was speaking with a simple eloquence and earnestness, when the vestry-door near to him was opened softly, and his friend Grant stepped to Mr. Waldron's side, and whispered something in his ear. Carl paused, and Mr. Waldron addressed the meeting in a hurried and trembling voice.

"Brethren," he said, "our dear old pastor, who has been very ill, as you all know, is now on the point of death, and he desires to see his young colleague immediately, with Brother

Morley and myself. The necessity is urgent, and we must leave you at once. Let some among you engage in prayer.

A dead silence prevailed while Carl, with Mr. Waldron and John Morley, quitted the lighted chapel and plunged into the darkness of the streets. To Carl it seemed more like one of the many dreams of his student-life than the sober reality that it was. His ecstasy of emotion was not yet over; the voices which had welcomed him were still ringing in his ears. Yet he was here in the unlit street, following in silence as Mr. Waldron walked before him, and with a second companion known only to him by his melancholy history. He was going, too, to witness the death of an old man, his co-pastor, whom he had never seen. It could be only a dream. If there were anything real in this night's experience, it was that his ears had heard a voice which would make his heart restless till he could hear it again.

They soon reached the minister's little house, and saw one window brightly illuminated by the light which the dulled eyes of the dying often need as they go down into the valley of darkness. Carl shook off the enthralment and bewilderment of his fancies, and roused himself to realize the scene he was about to witness. Mr. Waldron knocked gently at the door, and it was opened in an instant by a woman who awaited their arrival. A line of light fell down the little garden they crossed; and for the first time Carl became aware that Grant was following them, and with him a slight girlish figure whose face was veiled.

He had not time to see more, for Mr. Waldron and John Morley had gone on, and were already ascending the staircase. The chamber into which they entered was barely and scantily furnished, except with books, for it had evidently been the study of the dying man, as well as his bedroom. Their footsteps sounded loudly as they strode across the bare and creaking boards. The curtains of faded chintz were drawn back from the bed, and the old minister's palsied head, propped up with pillows, was turned anxiously toward them.

He fastened his glazing eyes upon Carl; and the two other men also turned their gaze instinctively upon him. Mr. Waldron, in his hale and hearty old age, which as yet was only gray with the coming shadow; and John Morley with his air of a century of suffering, which caused him to equal the dying man in his burden of years. These three old men faced him, and looked upon his youth with profound interest. Again he felt himself in a dream, and the silence grew intolerable to him. It was broken by the old pastor stretching out his withered and shaking hand to him, and breathing the word, "Brother."

The single word spoken in the thin and labored voice of death, possessed a peculiar pathos, linking as it did the old man who was putting off his mortality, with his young successor rich in vigorous life. An eternal brotherhood linked all men together in an unbroken chain with the Divine Elder Brother, of whom they were both ambassadors. Carl's eyes grew clear, and shone with the kindling of a chivalrous enthusiasm upon the three aged men who confronted him.

"Yes," he said, grasping the chilly and wrinkled hand of the dying man in his own, "I am your brother; and I am ready to take up your work when you lay it down. What is it you will have me do? I have many years to live and work in yet."

"There is Hester standing behind you," answered Mr. Watson.

She had glided in with her noiseless step, and stood near to him, waiting to approach more closely the old minister. Mr. Waldron's features brightened for an instant, and Mr. Watson raised his head eagerly.

"Come near to me, Hester," he said. "There is nothing that you may not hear. Wait a moment, all of you; I have something to say to you."

He lay still for a few minutes, collecting his thoughts; and Carl looked round the bare room, whose emptiness and bareness made more chilly the atmosphere of death. Was this to be the end of the career upon which he had entered this evening? He did not dare to turn his eyes to the place where Hester sat, beside the pillow of her old friend; but he saw her, vaguely and indistinctly, bending over him and wiping the damp cold forehead with her handkerchief. There had been a thought of his own death all day in Carl's mind, as there is in every time of unusual agitation to a sensitive and visionary spirit; but it had not been a solitary and almost friendless death like this.

"I must speak," said the minister in a sad, and well-nigh querulous voice; "I have had very much to bear upon my soul because of my church. It has been a heavy charge; and there is a great deal to be done yet before it will be without spot or blemish. The task has been too hard for me. I pray God you may be stronger for His service than I have been."

"God looks upon your work with other eyes than yours," said Carl. "You will hear Him say, 'Well done, good and faithful servant: enter thou into the joy of thy Lord.'"

The dim eyes brightened a little as Carl's voice repeated the familiar words; but he shook his already trembling head despondingly.

"Nay, but I have not been faithful," he answered; "I have been afraid to speak, and kept silence often and often against my conscience. Brethren, bear with me this once. I am more afraid of God than of you at this moment. Your divisions and your want of brotherly love have been a heavy burden upon me. Brother Waldron, there has been a canker-worm of worldly pride and self-will in your heart, which must needs be cast away. You have made us all feel it—the church and me. You were too great a man for us; there was no one to stand against you; and I never dared to say it till now."

His voice fell into almost inarticulate whispers, and he paused for more strength. Perhaps never did a deacon feel more completely confounded and thunderstruck beside his pastor's death-bed than did Mr. Waldron; but it was not a time for him to protest against his judgment.

"As for you, dear brother Morley," continued the painful voice, "you have been a continual sorrow and heaviness of heart to me. Look at what you are doing. You are throwing away your life, which ought to have been a blessing to all about you. You have made Hester's life a grief to her."

"It is not I who have done it," replied John Morley, with a quivering face.

"Nay, but it is you," he urged; "surely the past should be forgotten. I am very sorrowful for Hester; she has had a sore burden to carry also. Will you not take it from her? Now you are all here, I commend her to you; for in me she will lose a friend, and she cannot afford to lose any. She has been a very dear daughter unto me. You will all take care of Hester."

He did not seem to expect any answer, but turned to Hester and smiled feebly upon her. A moment or two afterward he resumed his speech.

"My child," he said, "I was to have received you into my church to-day. Surely I may do it now in the presence of these witnesses. Hester, I give you the right hand of fellowship, in token that you are received into the Church of Christ."

He laid his right hand in hers, and closed his weary eyelids, sinking back, as if exhausted, upon his pillow. Grant, who had stolen unperceived to the other side of the bed, placed his fingers upon his pulse, and made a sign to them to take Hester away. Carl bent down and put his mouth near to the ear of his dying colleague.

"I will stay with you till the end," he said.

"Ay, stay," he whispered; "I have need of you. I am afraid, still."

It was a long night, and Carl passed it in scarcely interrupted reverie as he watched the last ebb of life receding slowly from the heart of this stranger to whom he found himself united by so strong a tie. It was a night full of checks and chills upon his young enthusiasm. The charge, even of this humble church, had been too burdensome for its pastor. Toward the end he spoke often and incoherently of Hester, and was troubled for her, repeatedly recommending her to Grant and Carl. Then his voice sank into whispered murmurings, and breathed its last word in a tone which no ear could catch. Carl had become the sole pastor of the church at Little Aston, for Mr. Waldron as the largest subscriber and the most influential officer of the church could practically control the choice of the church. Whom he approved would be accepted.

Breakfast was just finished, but the family had not yet dispersed, when Carl reached Aston Court next morning. There was a shade of embarrassment in Mr. Waldron's greeting, for he could not forget that this young man, who was under his patronage, had heard administered to him the sharpest rebuke it had ever been his lot to receive. Yet at bottom he was too true a man and too sincere a Christian to resent his dying pastor's reproach. He shook Carl's hand, therefore, with more warmth than usual, and looked cordially into his worn face, which was weary with the watching and the meditations of the night. Robert, who had been about to quit the table, lingered to listen to his report; with a secret impatience to hear what had occurred at the meeting the night before, and to ascertain whether Carl and Hester had yet seen one another. Miss Waldron was the first to inquire after the minister.

"He is dead," answered Carl, with the brevity of emotion.

"And what was the last utterance of our beloved pastor?" she asked. She had rather looked down upon the meek and timid old man during his lifetime; but she possessed the common and morbid curiosity for knowing the last words of the dying.

"It was inarticulate," replied Carl evasively; "his voice failed him an hour or two before he died."

"But," persisted Miss Waldron, "there must have been some last sayings which were articulate before he lost his voice. The last words of dying saints are very precious, and they should be made the property of the Church."

"He was speaking chiefly of two of the members of his church," said Carl, with reluctance; "it was his dying charge to me as his successor. He committed to my care those for whom he felt the greatest anxiety."

"And who might these be?" asked Miss Waldron; "two members of the Church! We can be of use to you here. You know nothing of your flock as yet; but we know them. Whom did our dear pastor so specially commend to your charge?"

Carl looked round at each face with doubt and irresolution. If Miss Waldron had been alone he would not have hesitated to tell her all; but how could he mention John Morley and Hester before Robert? Mr. Waldron guessed the reason of his reluctance, and would not yield to avoiding the utterance of John Morley's name.

"I can tell you, I believe," he said, addressing his daughter, "it would be Hester and her father."

A rapid tremor of agitation ran through Robert Waldron's frame, and he rose hurriedly from his chair as if to leave them altogether; but he only walked to the window and stood looking out upon the terrace before it.

"But Hester is no member of the Church," said Miss Waldron, almost peevishly; "and I want to know how ever she came to be present at the church-meeting last night."

"I gave her permission to be present," replied Mr. Waldron, in a mild, deprecating tone; "and, my dear, Mr. Watson received her into the Church last night before he died. It was no doubt informal; but I was present, and so were Mr. Bramwell, and her father. There was something very affecting in it, I assure you."

The tears stood in Mr. Waldron's eyes at the recollection. Everything which concerned Hester touched the softest part of his nature; and Miss Waldron would have been struck with utter amazement at her father's folly, if she could for a moment have seen into the close recesses of his heart.

"I never in all my life heard of such a thing!" she exclaimed, pronouncing the words slowly, and with marked emphasis; "what could you all have been thinking of? Hester Morley at the death-bed of Mr. Watson! That girl is the most singular person I ever met with. I do not consider her fit for church-membership as yet. She has the most independent notions, and no clear faith in one doctrine. Poor girl! She has grown up under great disadvantages."

She stopped abruptly, for it was impossible to enumerate Hester's disadvantages before her brother, who was chafing and fuming inwardly, but who did not care to leave the room as long as Hester was the topic of the conversation.

"What disadvantages?" asked Carl absently; speaking only because Miss Waldron paused.

She darted an apologetic and beseeching glance at Robert, who now turned round with a face dark with anger.

"Mr. Bramwell," he said, in a tone which startled Carl from his absence of mind, "I suppose it is your right to learn the domestic history of your people; and I will leave you to hear that of the Morleys from my sister."

DAVID KING OVER ALL ISRAEL.

S. S. Lesson for July 6, II Sam. 5 : 1–12. Golden Text, Ps. 78 : 70. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

David's Way to the Throne—God Guided it—Abner the Instrument—Casting the Burden on the Lord—Jesus the Leader out of Trouble—No Self-Extrication—His Kingship Unclaimed—The Christian's Hebron—The King's Own Terms—Supreme Rule—The Seat of Government Removed—Jebusites Remaining in the City—How Jesus Rules.

AFTER the death of Saul, "there was long war between the house of Saul and the house of David; but David waxed stronger and stronger, and the house of Saul waxed weaker and weaker" (II Sam. 3 : 1). It was God's purpose to make David king. Man might oppose the execution of His purpose, but this opposition must ultimately give way. When man fights against God, he fights "as one that beateth the air." God's ways are not as man's ways. Many might have thought that a decisive battle fought between David and Ishbosheth, Saul's son, would put David in possession of the throne of Israel. God, however, worked in quite, another way. A quarrel arose between Ishbosheth and Abner, his father's successful general; and Abner in his anger declared to Ishbosheth, "So do God to Abner, and more also, except, as the Lord hath sworn to David, even so I do to him; to translate the kingdom from the house of Saul, and to set up the throne of David over Israel and over Judah, from Dan even to Beersheba" (II Sam. 3 : 9, 10). This is just like

GOD'S WAY OF WORKING.

Had David won the kingdom by his military prowess, he might have been tempted to think that he owed everything to his own tact and energy. As matters stood, he could see only the Lord in it, overruling men and circumstances to bring about the fulfilment of His own promises. Thus David's trust in the Lord was strengthened, and he could say, "His right hand, and His holy arm hath gotten Him the victory" (Ps. 98 : 1). David would learn also how completely the wrath of the wicked is permitted to work out the purposes of God, how entirely subject to His sway are the thoughts of all men, and how precious it is to have to do only with God.

Abner sent to David to make a league with him, to bring about the land to him, but David consented only on condition that his wife, Saul's daughter Michal, should be restored to him. Ishbosheth, who was but a tool in Abner's hands, could do nothing to prevent Abner carrying out his purpose. Then Abner called the elders of Israel and said, "Ye sought for David in times past to be king over you:

NOW THEN DO IT:

for the Lord hath spoken of David, saying, By the hand of My servant David, I will save My people Israel out of the hand of the Philistines, and out of the hand of all their enemies" (II Sam. 3 : 17, 18). What a marvellous change! Abner, David's greatest enemy, influencing Israel in his favor; Abner, the worldly soldier, preaching the Word of God! Yet so it was. God's messages reach us sometimes in strange ways; but let us heed them howsoever they may come.

Jesus is our David, God's chosen king over us. How often have we spoken in time past of making Him King! How often have we prayed that every thought may be brought into the obedience of Christ! Here comes a piece of blunt advice, "Now then do it;" Let the transaction take place, let the government be upon His shoulder, let it be off from yours. Pass over to Him the entire management, so that the imitation of everything may be from Him, the conduct of everything by Him; in your heart, in your family, in your business, in all things. A woman, speaking in a meeting recently, said, "When I was converted, I longed that the members of my family should be brought to Jesus. I was very anxious. I did all I could, and I kept continually praying for them, and bearing the burden on my heart. But Mr. Boardman showed me that I was taking the government and the responsibility upon me: and that I was to pass it over to the Lord and to trust Him, and praise Him that He undertook it: because He said so. Since then have been converted." She had placed the government on His shoulder, and had made Jesus King.

David had yet some years to wait before the kingdom was fully his. "Then came all the tribes of Israel to David unto Hebron, and spake, saying, Behold we are thy bone and thy flesh. Also in time past, when Saul was king over us, thou wast he that leddest out and broughtest in Israel; and the Lord said to thee, Thou shalt feed my people Israel, and thou shalt be a captain over Israel." Oh, how true this is; under the dominion of Saul (ourself) though he may be, it is only Jesus who leads out of trouble and brings into blessing. Is there a difficulty from which we have ever extricated ourselves? Must we not indeed confess "The Lord hath done it?" Did we ever conquer a temptation? No, it was the Lord who did it. Did we ever cleanse ourselves from a sin? Never; the Lord hath done it. Every leading out of bondage, sin, evil, suffering, has been the work of Jesus, our David. And who has brought us in? Who brought us into the fold? None but the good Shepherd. Who has brought us into joy, peace, love, power, victory? Only, and always Jesus. Now, are we at this moment claiming Him King? Are we saying to Him, "Lord, on the testimony of Thy Word, I am Thy bone and Thy flesh (Eph. 5 : 30). Thou art appointed of God to rule me and be my Captain; I own Thee now my King. Rule Thou, rule absolutely over me, over all I am and have, all I ever shall be or shall have." But will He care for such a little kingdom? Yes, He has given His life blood to possess it. He who is not ashamed to call us brethren, loves us with more than a brother's love; for He calls us to be His bride, and has predestinated us to be conformed to His image.

It was in Hebron, where the tribes of Israel came to make David King. Hebron means fellowship. "God is faithful, by whom ye were called unto the fellowship of His Son Jesus Christ" (I Cor. 1 : 9).

GOD IS FAITHFUL,

if we let Him have the control, to bring about real fellowship with Him. But we may deceive ourselves: "If we say we have fellowship with Him and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth. But if we walk in the light as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another (God with us, and we with Him), and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." In Hebron, i. e. in fellowship with God, Jesus must be King, He must reign. There is no fellowship with God but upon His own terms—Jesus Lord, Jesus reigning supreme and reigning always.

Many a soul says, "Oh, how I long to serve God faithfully! I do want Him to have full control of me, I dedicate myself to Him, I pray, and praise Him, and yet I am always doing things which grieve Him; how is this?" In all this you are holding the reins of your spiritual life in your own hands; you dedicate yourself, but you say nothing as to whether He has accepted you; you offer Him the control, but you do not say whether He has taken it. You pray, but you do not say whether the prayer is answered; you praise, but the very fact that there is anarchy in your soul proves that the kingdom of Jesus is not yet set up in your heart. You are holding on to yourself, managing yourself still, instead of letting Him have the full control, the full responsibility; you being only a willing instrument in His hands, to co-operate with Him in full subjection. You are offering to Him a service which you give to Him as being outside of you, up in heaven, instead of letting Him come into to live and reign in your spirit, soul and body "with you alway even unto the end of the world."

When David's reign commenced in Jerusalem, and the seat of government was moved from Hebron to Jerusalem (city of peace) there were inhabitants of the land which yet remained, and disturbed the peace by disputing David's possession. These Jebusites said unto David, "Except thou take the blind and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither." According to man's reason, according to natural feelings of compassion, it would seem a brutal thing to destroy those who could not help themselves. But David saw things in the light of God. God had called him to reign in Jerusalem. The Jebusites, in common with the other Canaanites, practised the grossest idolatry, and also witchcraft; immorality, and all manner of evil, and in order to hold their own, and continue their wickedness, they had made the stronghold of Zion the refuge of the blind and the lame, "thinking David cannot come in hither." And David saw that in such a case it was to the honor of God, and for the good of the whole country, that these sinful people should be conquered and destroyed, and he commanded their destruction. When the blind and the lame came unto Jesus in the temple, He healed them (Matt. 21 : 14), but the blind and lame Jebusites made use of their infirmity to rebel against God. In our hearts and lives there are Jebusites to be destroyed. All which cannot accord with the reign of Jesus must go, whatever it may cost. As soon as this conviction is a settled one, and our will is given up, it costs nothing at all. When Jesus really reigns, all struggle ceases, all disappointment ceases, all suffering, which is not fellowship with His sufferings, ceases. Anxiety is impossible, burden, care, fear, remorse cease to be, because Jesus has His own way. He takes the burdens and the cares, He provides, He plans, He has the responsibility, and He is the Prince of peace; in His presence is fulness of joy, not only in heaven but also here on earth. Dear reader, make Him King, let Him have His way, let Him rule alone.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Approaching Conference on the Egyptian question continues to be the chief topic of public concern in Europe. The date fixed for its assembling is June 28th, but it is doubtful if that date can be adhered to, for diplomats are of the opinion that the notices of acceptance of the Anglo-French agreement regarding Egyptian affairs on the part of the various Powers will not arrive in time. The Pall Mall Gazette says: "If the conference shall refuse the English proposal to lower the rate of interest on the debt the advance of £8,000,00 and the Anglo-French agreement will lapse, and matters will revert to the present situation. The British Government, however, has given the liberal members of Parliament a private assurance that the Anglo-French agreement with reference to Egyptian affairs leaves the question of the ultimate position of England in Egypt still open. A vote of censure will be moved June 26th. The liberals calculate that they still retain a majority of thirty, and confidently expect to defeat the motion of censure.

General Gordon is Still Cut Off at Khartoum from communication with his government, and the hostile troops surrounding him appear to be growing bolder and more vindictive. The British Cabinet is frequently interrogated as to his condition, and the replies given prove that the officials are in ignorance respecting him. On June 20th the Secretary of State, replying to questions, said that the last news received from General Gordon was of the date of April 12th. He said that twenty messengers had been sent to General Gordon by different routes. One messenger, who went up the Nile by boat, succeeded in entering Khartoum. On his return, bearing General Gordon's answer to the government messages, he was pursued by the rebels and killed. Twenty-one pilgrims have arrived at Suakim from Khartoum. They left that city on May 25th, and they say that Khartoum at that time was safe and had a full supply of provisions.

The Disaffection of the Irish People has been manifested during the past week in their reception of the Lord-Lieutenant, who went to Belfast to lay the foundation-stone of a public library and unveil a portrait of Queen Victoria. The absence of decorations was a matter of general remark. On one building the union jack hung at half mast. Another union jack was suspended across one of the streets through which Earl Spencer passed. The following words, in black letters, were placed upon it: "Remember Newry and Rossmore." Four hundred extra police and a troop of lancers were present to maintain order. Silence was preserved along the whole route of the procession. On reaching the Town Hall the Lord Lieutenant was greeted with mingled cheers and groans. In his speech Earl Spencer referred to the troubles of Ireland, and dwelt upon the reviving prospects of the country. He congratulated the citizens of Belfast upon their peaceful character and their adherence to law and order. But while the Lord Lieutenant was thus flattering Belfast an artillery regiment going to Tarbert for training mutinied at Glin, a market town a few miles from Limerick. The soldiers attacked the townspeople and injured several of them. Great excitement resulted, and several arrests were made.

Uneasiness in European Cabinets is Manifested on the subject of the French intrigues in Morocco. In Italy, especially, they cause distrust. The papers declare that, notwithstanding Premier Ferry's protestations, the object of France in encouraging the pretensions of the Sherif of Wazan, and in making a naval demonstration off the coast of Morocco, is obviously to overthrow the Sultan and dynasty of that country in favor of the Sherif of Wazan, who is now their accomplice, and would then be their tool in effecting a French protectorate over Morocco. The ultimate design of France, these papers say, is to secure control of the entrance to the Mediterranean, of which Tangier is as much the key as the rock of Gibraltar itself. Italy, as well as every power bordering on the Mediterranean, is vitally interested in preventing this control, and the papers demand a reprisal in the shape of an Italian occupation of Tripoli. That country, they say, belongs to Italy by geographical position quite as much as Algiers belongs to France, and they believe that Italy should have a firm foothold on the south Mediterranean coast to watch and foil the colonizing, or, rather, buccaneering, schemes of France.

A Raid on Socialists in Austria has Resulted in numerous arrests. The European correspondent of the New York Sun cables that, after the murders of Herr Eisert, Inspector Klubeck, and Detective Block last year, hundreds of suspected conspirators were arrested, and many of them were released only after they had been escorted to the frontier and left there, with an injunction never to return to Austrian soil. Most of these exiles have gradually returned, however, and have become more and more bold in showing themselves, although aware that they were known to the authorities. A few days ago the chief of the imperial secret police issued an order that every one of these returned suspects should be arrested. A wholesale raid resulted, and scores of men and women were captured in Vienna and elsewhere. The prisoners were not taken before the magistrates in the localities where they were arrested, but were conveyed under guard to various remote portions of the empire, and the fate of some of them is a matter of mysterious conjecture. These proceedings have caused much excitement at Vienna, and the Socialists there are openly menacing the Government with sanguinary reprisals.

Volunteer Subjects for Medical Experiment are offering themselves to M. Pasteur, who, as recently announced, believes he has discovered a method of preventing hydrophobia by inoculation. The European correspondent of the New York Times cables that M. Pasteur is overwhelmed with letters from persons offering their services as subjects for his experiments in inoculating human beings against rabies. The experiments are to be made before a Government Commission, and among those who offer to submit their persons to the tests in the interests of science are no less than fourteen medical students, who beg to be given the preference, as they are willing, if need be, to die in what they all pronounce the cause of humanity.

Mr. C. H. Spurgeon's Fiftieth Birthday has evoked an expression of popular esteem, to which there is no parallel in modern religious history. He attained the age of fifty years last Thursday. A great meeting was held in the Tabernacle, when that vast edifice was filled to overflowing. Mr. Spurgeon was tendered an ovation. Dr. Parker and Mr. Newman Hall were among the distinguished persons present. The Earl of Shaftesbury presided. Mr. Gladstone sent a letter of congratulation. Lord Shaftesbury made a speech, in which he spoke of Mr. Spurgeon in a eulogistic manner. He referred to his powerful administrative mind. The various societies and associations under Mr. Spurgeon's charge required sufficient care to occupy the minds of fifty men. The Earl dwelt on the fact that his preaching specially reached the hearts as well as the intellects of those who listened to him. He said that one of Mr. Spurgeon's chief merits was that he was not afraid to mention hell to ears polite. Mr. Spurgeon was one of the most admirable, amiable, loving fellows he had ever met. As a preacher he was exactly the reverse of the preacher of whom it was once said, "He preached so finely and lived so badly that it was a pity when he entered the pulpit that he ever came out. When out, it was a pity that he ever entered it again." Canon Wilberforce, of Southampton, said the meeting had assembled to glorify not Spurgeon, but the living God. The best testimonial of Mr. Spurgeon was the fact that his weekly sermon was translated into seven modern languages, traversing the world, and solacing the hearts of men. An address of fraternal greeting was next read from 153 Baptist churches, representing 420,000 souls. The Rev. S. P. Gifford, of America, narrated the story of an American school-boy who, when asked who the Prime Minister of England was, replied "Charles Spurgeon." [Laughter.] That was an expression of the influence of Mr. Spurgeon on the minds of the religious public of America. The people of America thanked God for raising such a man, and trusted that his years would be doubled. Mr. Spurgeon jocularly replied, referring to the many laudatory letters he was continually receiving from America. He said his library contained two companion volumes—namely, "Jonathan on Brag" and "John Bull on Boasting." He was afraid the new world had learned a bad habit from the old. A cheque for $22,500 was then handed Mr. Spurgeon. The latter, rising, received an ovation. He said the kindness he had received during the last two days would melt the hardest heart. He did not expect a cheque, but did wish something raised with which to extend and improve the Tabernacle and for other religious and charitable purposes. On the previous evening meetings were held in anticipation of the event, when Mr. Moody spoke. He said he would never have come to England if it had not been for Mr. Spurgeon. Twenty-five years ago, when he was converted, he read everything obtainable that Mr. Spurgeon said or wrote. He came across the Atlantic in 1867, and took a seat in the gallery of the Tabernacle. He would like to take that seat back to America. When he returned to America he tried to preach himself, but in 1872 returned to England to try to learn a little more from Mr. Spurgeon, and he never entered the Tabernacle without obtaining a blessing.

A Formal Invitation has been Sent Both by the Missionary Conference and the Evangelical Ministers of Calcutta to Messrs. Moody and Sankey, asking them to visit India at the earliest practicable date. The Indian Witness says: "We are not aware that any information has been received which makes it probable that the invitation will be accepted, but we notice that very many earnest Christians seem strong in the faith and hope that the great evangelists can be persuaded to devote at least one season to India, and we are assured that no effort will be spared to induce them to do so. That they would stir our great cities as they have never been stirred before is more than probable, and even if they should not succeed in breaking the ranks of the non-Christian population, they would make a deep impression upon a very important class of young men, while the awakening and conversion of worldly and irreligious Europeans would make a profound impression upon all classes."

"Thy Healer." A New Magazine Devoted to the subject of faith-healing, may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price five cents, including postage. It is issued in London on the first and fifteenth of each month, and will be sent to subscribers promptly on its receipt in New York. The annual subscription is one dollar. It is *edited by Mrs. M. Matthew Simpson—His Early Training—Reads Through the German Bible — Enters School—Joins the Church—Practises Medicine—Received into Conference—President of Indiana Asbury University—Editor of the "Western Christian Advocate"—Elected Delegate to General Conference of 1844—His Character as Writer and Preacher—Mistaken for a Farmer—Astonishes a Pastor—Elected Bishop in 1852—Visits Europe and the Holy Land—Twice Again Visits Europe—His Literary Works—Mrs. Simpson—Her Death on June 18.

THE Methodist Episcopal Church was wisely directed when it chose Dr. Simpson as one of its bishops. He was a man of wonderful physical power—capable of performing unlimited labors—full of energy and resource, original in mind, and always pressing forward to new ground. Withal his gifts as a preacher were remarkable. Eloquent and logical, he was able to place before the congregations he addressed the truth which God had put in his heart, and which he uttered earnestly and fearlessly whether men would hear or whether they would forbear. When, two weeks ago, he breathed his last, it was amid the testimonies of the servants of God in his own and other churches that his life and labor had been a benediction to the Word.

Matthew Simpson, D.D., LL.D., was born in Cadiz, Ohio, on the 20th June, 1811, of Methodist parents. His father was one of the class who remember the injunction to "use hospitality one to another without grudging" (1 Pet. 4 : 9), and throw their houses open to ministers and other disciples of Christ. Many a travelling preacher, therefore, Elisha like, came and went in that house, always sure of "a bed, and a table, and a stool, and a candlestick" (II Kings 4 : 10). But the old gentleman died the year after Matthew's birth, and the chief responsibility for the child's care and education devolved upon the widowed mother, who, in the kind providence of God, was rewarded for her labor and anxiety with the joy of living to see her son raised to the episcopacy of her Church.

The fatherless boy had also an uncle, the

a scholarly man, who was for years in public life, either on the judicial bench or in the State Senate of Ohio, and who was also an active member and a devoted friend of the Methodist Church. That good man closely superintended his nephew's education, and was spared to watch his career till only a few years ago, when he died at an advanced age.

Unlike some distinguished men, Matthew Simpson was precocious as a boy, and it is said that he began to study German when only eight years old, and that he read the German Bible through in the following year. We strongly recommend this example with regard to the English Bible to our juvenile readers, and, unhappily, older readers need the same advice.

But the studious youth was not allowed to let his health suffer by neglecting out-of-door exercise while he applied himself to his books. Plenty of fresh air and much active exercise gave him a constitution which stood more than seventy years' tough work, and a frame which a rough life and hard knocks made neither tender nor fragile.

At the age of twelve or thirteen years the future bishop entered an academy in his native town, and was instructed in Latin, Greek, French, and mathematics, besides the ordinary branches of a school education. After some years he attended Madison College, Pa., which was subsequently merged into Alleghany College, and there he was elected to the office of tutor in his eighteenth year. In that institution he pursued the study of Hebrew, and he graduated with credit under the superintendency of Dr. Charles Elliott.

He did not become a member of the Church till 1829, but having done that, he engaged actively as a Sunday-school teacher and, some time afterward, as a class-leader. He fixed his choice upon medicine for a profession, and having studied it and received a license, he began to practise in 1833. About the same time, being impelled in his spirit to preach the Gospel, he was licensed a local preacher and received on trial in the Pittsburg Conference, with about thirty others, including the Rev. Wesley Smith, author of several well-known works, and the Rev. Dr. William Hunter, twice editor of the Pittsburg Christian Advocate and writer of several popular hymns.

Bishop Simpson's first circuit was West Wheeling. The second year he was stationed in the city of Pittsburg, under the charge of the Rev. T. N. Hudson. The third year, that station being divided, he was placed in charge of Liberty Street church in the same city. The fourth year he was appointed to Monongahela City. It is said that he began to attract attention as a preacher during his second charge in Pittsburg. He was ordained deacon there by Bishop Roberts in 1835, and elder in Steubenville, Ohio, by the same bishop in 1837.

In that year he was elected Vice-President and Professor of Natural Science in Alleghany College, and in 1839 was elected President of Indiana Asbury University, where he remained nearly ten years, making the University one of the strongest literary institutions of American Methodism. Says a writer in the Daily Christian Advocate of 1876: "This young institution soon felt the pulsations of his vigorous mind, indefatigable labors, and superior executive abilities. The University rose rapidly to eminence, and the work so well begun by him has since been carried forward by his successors." Bishop Simpson remained at the head of the University till 1848, when he was elected editor of the Western Christian Advocate at Cincinnati. Before that happened he had received the degrees of A.M. and D.D., the one from Dr. Ruter at the Alleghany College in 1835, and the other from the Weslyan University (Middletown, Conn.), in 1843. The degree of Doctor of Laws was conferred upon him in a later year. He had been a delegate to the in 1844, and he was again elected in 1848. During the four years of his editorship, from 1848 to 1852, he was tendered the Presidentship first of the Dickinson College and afterward of the Wesleyan University.

We will, at this point, make an extract from an appreciative article on the subject of this sketch published in the National Magazine in 1855, when the bishop was forty-four years old: "The Western Christian Advocate quickly showed his vigorous hand. It took a decided stand on some of the most important public questions of the day. It incurred the animadversion of the secular press for its attention to the moral bearings of political movements and measures. . . . The action of Congress on slavery received special attention from Dr. Simpson, and his articles on that vexed subject did much to produce the state of opinion respecting it which now prevails throughout the West. . . . There was as much courage as ability displayed in his discussions of the subject.

". . . He was very popular, it is said, among the farmers in the Far West, during his presidential days, nearly as much for his coarse or uncouth clothes, as for his powerful talents. In his peregrinations through the country they flocked to hear him with enthusiasm, and delighted to recognize him as one of themselves. He is generally very effective in the pulpit, sometimes transcendently so; and he is so in spite of some very obvious defects. His voice is not good, and it usually assumes a shrill monotone (the result, apparently, of too high a pitch), which would be pronounced by any critic in oratory utterly incompatible with true eloquence; yet is he eloquent in defiance of the critics. . . . In spite, we repeat, of his peculiar defect of voice, Bishop Simpson is one of the most powerful preachers now extant among us. He follows the old plan of homiletically dividing and subdividing his subjects; his skeletons, or plans, are usually very thoroughly defined, and the parts taken up seriatim with nice precision. His verbal style is clear, direct, and rather plain; he throws abundance of apt and brilliant illustrations over his subject; this is, in fact, one of his most striking excellencies."

The same journal relates

which occurred soon after he was elected bishop, when he was travelling in an Eastern State where he was little known. He arrived at a small town one Saturday evening, and, being determined not to travel on the Sabbath, he remained there till Monday. On the Sunday morning he set out from his hotel in search of the Methodist church, and having found it, and let out that he was a preacher, he was introduced to the pastor, Mr. B., who took him, from his rough dress, to be a country farmer holding a local preacher's license. Hesitating whether to ask him to preach, lest he should be ashamed of it afterward, Mr. B. at length gave the invitation, and the bishop entered the pulpit. Of course he conducted the service and preached like a master, and Mr. B. was perfectly astonished.

"Are you a travelling preacher, brother?" the latter asked curiously. "Yes," answered the stranger, "I have been an itinerant for several years, and now travel a very large circuit." "What did you say your name was?" the pastor asked next. "Simpson," replied the other. "Simpson!" exclaimed Mr. B. in alarm, "not Bishop Simpson?" "Yes, they call me Bishop sometimes," was the reply. What followed cannot be described in words as well as our readers will imagine it for themselves.

The promotion to the episcopacy, which is anticipated in the foregoing story, took place in 1852, and was a fitting recognition of the wisdom and conscientiousness which Dr. Simpson had exhibited for four years in the editorial chair. After that time his career was marked by arduous travels in all the States and in most of the Territories, and by a strange variety of experience, and he used his influential position and solid abilities especially to promote the cause of missions and the cause of education.

Soon after his election he was laid low by a severe and protracted illness, after his recovery from which he was sent by the General Conference of 1856 as delegate to the Irish and in 1857; and he was also a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance in Berlin in the same year. He extended his travels at that time to Turkey, the Holy Land, Egypt, and Greece, returning home in 1858.

In 1859 Bishop Simpson changed his residence from Pittsburg to Evanston, where he accepted the position of President of the Garrett Biblical Institute. During the Civil War he labored with extraordinary energy and delivered a number of addresses in behalf of the Union. He was urged by the Secretary of War to undertake the organization of the freedmen at the establishment of the bureau, but he deemed it wise to decline this flattering invitation, and he also declined when he was afterward invited by President Grant to go as a commissioner to San Domingo.

In 1870, at the death of Bishop Kingsley, he visited Europe to complete the work which had been assigned to the deceased bishop at the Methodist Mission stations on the Continent, and also as a delegate to the English Conference. In 1874 he visited Mexico, and in 1875 made his third visit to Europe, to attend the Conference of Germany and Switzerland, and also to meet the missionaries in different parts of the Continent. On that occasion his progress was almost triumphal, so great was the enthusiasm of the churches to welcome him and do him honor.

He gained considerable distinction by his literary efforts, especially as editor of the "Cyclopædia of Methodism," a book which is a model of perspicuous condensation, and which is noteworthy for the absence of fulsome flattery of living characters. It is already in its second and revised edition. The bishop was also the author of "A Hundred Years of Methodism," and in 1878 he delivered before the Theological Department of Yale College his now celebrated "Lectures on Preaching," which have since been published and form a very important addition to the literature of a subject on which many men have written and written well.

Bishop Simpson, although great as a scholar and an administrator, was principally distinguished for his pulpit eloquence, and principally esteemed for his lovableness of disposition. An announcement that he was to preach in any church invariably drew a crowd from among all denominations, and those who flocked to hear him were certain to have the Gospel purely and simply declared to them. He preached Jesus. Then by his spirit of peace and love he achieved the great lack of the day in Christian America, viz., the confidence and affection of all the Southern churches.

MRS. SIMPSON

was Miss Ellen H. Verner. She is a native of Pittsburg, Pa. The following brief account of her appears in the "Cyclopædia of Methodism:" "She was educated by parents deeply devoted to the Methodist Episcopal Church, and at an early age united with it. After her marriage she shared without complaint the privations of an itinerant life, aiding her husband in his work. In later years she accompanied him on many of his journeys, and visited Mexico and the chief points in Europe.

"She has been active in benevolent work, in visiting the sick and poor, and in securing help for their relief. In the erection of the Home for the Aged of Philadelphia she was specially interested, and was from its commencement President of the Ladies' United Aid Society, which secured a property now valued at $200,000, and in behalf of which she superintended the management of several large fairs, which yielded an average of $20,000 each. She also helped to organize and was first President of the Philadelphia Bible-Readers' Society.

"In the Centennial Exhibition, she was a member of the Ladies' Executive Committee, and devised the plan for obtaining sketches and engravings of all the public charities originated and supported by women."

Bishop Simpson, in spite of his seventy-three years of life, fifty-one years of ministerial labor, thirty-two of which were in the episcopate, maintained his manly vigor until a few months ago. He attended the General Conference, but returned weak and weary. Soon afterward he was confined to his bed, and though at intervals he rallied, and hopes were entertained that he would be spared for further labors, he gradually sank. On June 15th he became unconscious, and continued so until June 18th, when, surrounded by his sorrowing family and friends, he peacefully breathed his last.

IN THE WRONG BOX.

By the Rev. Charles Courtenay.

A MISTAKE.

JACOB SPRUCE'S plan was this—first, he would visit the Barleycorn and drink his pint, paying down his money like a man. Then he would strike off to the Half Moon and taste that famous brew. Then, turning off at right angles, for he could find his way to saloons blindfold, he would drop in at the Old House at Home, a very favorite resort of Jacob's fellow-workmen, and stow away some more beer.

Now surely he will go home. He has taken much more than is good for him already.

Not a bit of it Jacob Spruce doesn't give in so early as this. He is a thorough man, who never does things by halves. No, now he turns in at the Odd Fellows' Arms, and with his hat slightly tilted, and a wink in his eye, orders his fourth pint. The more he drinks, the more he wants, for this pint disappears even more quickly, if possible, than the others. By this time he is in such a state that the fresh air is too much for him, for no sooner does he emerge from the Odd Fellows' Arms than he is done for. The fresh air has made him drunk. See him standing, or rather leaning, against the wall, with all the strength gone out of his legs, and as weak as a feather. He seems as if he were not quite clear as to his geography. He wants to find another favorite rumshop, if he can only hit upon its whereabouts. But for the life of him he doesn't know what direction to take. He would give anything to be able to find that house. The next best thing to being sure is to have an idea. This idea Jacob has got, and for want of a better, acts upon it. So he rambles on in corkscrew fashion, talking to himself all the while.

Ha! There it is at last, bright light and all. Hurrah! How full it was packed! Jacob had never seen that particular bar so full before.

Now if Jacob had had ever so small a portion of his wits about him he must have soon discovered that he was in the wrong box altogether; in fact, that he was not in a rumshop at all. But he was all in a mist, and was too far gone in drink to put the necessary two and two together. Still, for all that, he was a little surprised, and once at least a little flash of wonder crossed his poor muddled brain, for he was heard to say—

"Say, ole feller, wha's up?"

"Hush-h-h."

A few hours ago Jacob would have insisted on being answered, for he was an obstinate sort of fellow, and his temper was easily roused by opposition. The effect upon him now was rather a soothing one, for it actually helped to send him to sleep. I say "helped" because he was in such a condition that very little would have induced sleep.

Perhaps it is as well to say here that the particular place in which Jacob Spruce found himself was a Temperance Hall; and that he had actually made his way into a temperance meeting.

AN OPPORTUNITY.

They took twenty pledges at that meeting, twenty real, good, sterling ones of the right sort. There had been a consultation over Jacob's intoxicated body. They were determined to do their best with him then. They would try, at any rate, to work a cure. They were ready to do what they could to win him back to the paths of sobriety. One result of their whispered debate was a little prayer-meeting in an adjoining room. These men had faith in God. They were sure that effectual fervent prayer would avail much. And so they prayed.

The first thing Jacob did when he came to himself was to feel in his pockets for some pence. The next thing he did, having satisfied himself that some pence were there, was to demand a schooner of beer.

'Why, Jacob, old fellow, how are you getting on?" said one of the teetotalers, accompanying the words with a hearty, brotherly shake of the hand.

Jacob heartily responded, saying, "You shall have a drink directly, when I get it."

"They're a long time getting it," he said presently.

Then for the first time he looked around him, and took in something of his surroundings.

"Where on earth have I got to?"

"Why, you're in the Temperance Hall!"

This was enough. Jacob started as if he had been shot, gave a frightened look at the circle of teetotalers, and prepared to fly without a moment's notice.

But this wouldn't do. They mustn't let their man slip through their fingers like that. And so they used a little gentle, quiet pressure, and detained him.

Then they opened their broadsides on him. One pointed out how foolish he was to spend his money in beer, and to ruin his health as he was doing. Another showed how cruel he was to treat his wife and children so shamefully. A third pressed him with the sufferings he was inflicting on himself, and showed him how his health was being undermined. A fourth spoke of the spiritual ruin he was bringing on himself, and how no drunkard could inherit the kingdom of heaven,

How much of all this Jacob took in it would be hard to say, but he understood some of it, at any rate, for after a time he said—

"You're right, lads; I'll sign the pledge. Hand us the pen and ink."

"Now, Jacob," said one of them, "how much money have you got in your pockets?"

Jacob turned out his pockets, and displayed his money.

"You must let one of us keep that," was said decidedly. "It'll never do for you to have to pass so many saloons with money in your pockets."

To this Jacob strongly demurred. But after a time he yielded this point too, and gave it all up, receiving in return a memorandum of the amount, the said memorandum being written on the back of the pledge paper.

After Jacob left the hall that night, that enthusiastic band of teetotalers knelt down and commended him to the care of the Lord, who alone could keep him from falling.

THE MYSTERY CLEARED UP.

A mystery it undoubtedly was, for that he hadn't spent all his money the evening before he was perfectly convinced. But not a penny had he now to his name. Two or three times had he searched his pockets. Yes, and turned them inside out. But all to no purpose.

It was a fact that he had utterly forgotten the adventure in the Temperance Hall. It had gone clean from his memory. He had forgotten his mistake. He had forgotten the pledge he had signed, and he had forgotten too the money he had given into safer keeping than his own.

This was how the mystery was cleared up.

He was walking along the street with his hands in his pockets, whistling away his melancholy, or trying to, when he found himself hailed by a friend—

"Well, and how d'ye feel after last night's bit of business?"

"Just as a chap feels after eating werry salt red herrings three meals running," was his somewhat grumpy reply.

"Ah! but ye've done with the drink now, and ye've put your hand to it, ye know."

Jacob's eyes opened wide at this statement.

"Why, ye 'ain't forgotten last night's affair at the Temperance Hall, have ye? Don't 'ee know ye signed the pledge?"

The faintest glimmer of light began now to dawn upon Jacob's mind. He was beginning to recall the scene, though it was very cloudy as yet. But now it suddenly flashed across him that there was a chance of the mystery being cleared up.

"You ain't heerd tell of a chap as has got some money as don't belong to him, have ye?" he asked.

"Why, yes, ye handed it over to us, ye know. Ye've got the account of it in your pocket. Ye put it in the left-hand trousers' pocket."

There it was, sure enough, and his signature was on it too, while on the back was the memorandum of the money appropriated for his benefit.

Jacob's face was a study. Surprise and pleasure were mixed up in an odd sort of way. When he recovered himself he said slowly—

"If I'd gone to sleep in a saloon, I should never have seen my money again, that's plain."

Then after a little pondering, he said—

"I signed the pledge, did I?"

"Yes, there's yer name plain enough."

"Well, then, I'm blest if I don't keep it, and there's my hand on it."

(To be concluded next week.)

THE MODEL.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, June 29, 1884.

"Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his."—Rom. 8 : 9.

A Common Frailty of Disposition—The Irascible Temperament—Can a Man's Disposition be Changed?—Not by Resolution—God Can Reconstruct—By Implanting Christ's Spirit.—I. That was a Spirit of Gentleness—Not of Weakness—Attracted Children and Invalids—An Arm Out of Joint—The Rule of Retort—A Church Split.—II. A Spirit of Self-Sacrifice—What It Is—A Marseilles Surgeon's Self-Sacrifice.—III. A Spirit of Humility.—IV. A Spirit of Prayer—Luther and the Council of Nuremberg—The Direct Line of Communication—V. A Spirit of Hard Work—Busy for Others—The Character Essential—The Seeds of it Given.

THERE is nothing more desirable than a pleasant disposition. Without it we cannot be happy ourselves, or make others happy. When we have lost our temper or become impatient under some light cross, we suddenly awaken to new appreciation of proper

EQUIPOISE OF NATURE.

We wish we had been born with self-balance. We envy those people who bear themselves through life without any perturbation, and we flatter ourselves that however little self-control we may now have, the time will come, under the process of years, when we will be mellowed and softened, and the things which are in us wrong now will then be all right, forgetful of the fact that an evil habit in our nature will grow into larger proportions, and that an iniquity not corrected will become the grandfather of a whole generation of iniquities. So that people without the grace of God in the struggle and amid the annoyances and exasperations of life are apt to become worse instead of better.

Now, the trouble is that we have a theory abroad in the world that a man's disposition cannot be changed. A man says, "I am irascible in temper, and I can't help it." Another man says, "I am revengeful naturally, and I can't help it." A man says, "I am impulsive, and I can't help it." And he tells the truth. No man can correct his disposition. I never knew a man by force of resolution to change his temperament, but by His grace

GOD CAN RECONSTRUCT US.

He can take away that which is wrong and put in that which is right; and I know and you know people who, since their conversion are just the opposite of what they used to be. In other words, we may, by the Spirit of God, have the disposition of Jesus Christ implanted in our disposition, and we must have it done or we will never see heaven. "If any man have not the disposition of Jesus Christ he is none of His."

I. In the first place, the Spirit of Christ was

A SPIRIT OF GENTLENESS.

Sometimes He made wrathful utterance against Pharisees and hypocrites, but the most of His words were kind, and gentle, and loving, and inoffensive, and attractive. When we consider the fact that He was omnipotent, and could have torn to pieces His assailants, the wonder is greater. We often bear the persecution and abuse of the world because we cannot help it. Christ endured it when He could have helped it.

Little children who always shy off at a rough man rushed into His presence and clambered on Him, until the people begged the mothers to take them away. Invalids so sore with wounds that they could not bear to have any one come near them, begged Christ just to put His hand upon the wound and soothe it. The mother with the sickest child was willing to put the little one in Christ's arms. Self-righteous people rushed into His presence with a woman of debased character, and said, "Now annihilate her, blast her, kill her." Jesus looked at her, and saw she was sorry and repentant; and He looked at them, and He saw they were proud and arrogant and infernal, and He said, "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone at her." A blind man sat by the wayside making a great ado about his lack of vision. They told him to hush up and not bother the Master. Christ stooped to him and said, "What wilt thou that I do unto thee?" Gentleness of voice, gentleness of manner, gentleness of life.

We all admire it, whether we have any of it or not. Just as the rough mountain bluff and the scarred crag love to look down into the calm lake at their feet, and as the stormiest winter loves to merge into the sunshiny spring, so the most precipitate, and impulsive, and irascible nature loves to think of the gentleness of Christ. How little we have of it! How little of patience in treating with enemies! We have so little of the gentleness of Christ we are not fit for Christian work half the time. We do not know how to comfort the bereft, or to encourage the disheartened, or to take care of the poor. Even our voice of sympathy is on the wrong pitch.

My sister had her arm put out of joint, and we were in the country, and the neighbors came in, and they were all sympathetic, and they laid hold the arm, and pulled and pulled mightly until the anguish was intolerable; but the arm did not go to its place. Then the old country doctor was sent for, and he came in, and with one touch it was all right. He knew just where to put his finger, and just how to touch the bone. We go out to our Christian work with too rough a hand and too unsympathetic a manner, and we fail in our work, while some Christian, in the gentleness of Christ, comes along, puts his hand of sympathy on the sore spot—the torn ligaments are healed and the disturbed bones are rejoined. Oh, for this gentleness of Christ!

The dew of one summer night will accomplish more good than fifty Caribbean whirlwinds. Oh, how important it is that in going forth to serve Christ we have something of His gentleness! Is that the way we bear ourselves when we are assaulted? The rule is an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, sarcasm for sarcasm. Give him as much as he sends! After a while you look up into the face of Christ and you see His gentleness, and you say, "Well now, I must do differently." Then your proud heart says, "Now you have him in a corner, you will never get him in a corner again; chastise him, and then let him go." So we postpone the gentleness of Christ.

RETORT FOR RETORT,

Did you ever know any difficulty to be healed by acerbity or hypercriticism? About forty-five years ago the Presbyterian Church was split into the new school and the old school. The chasm got wider and wider. The most outrageous personalities were indulged in. Good men on one side anathematized good men on the other side. Wider and wider the chasm got, until after a while some good people tried another tack, and they began to explain away the difficulties, and soon all the differences were healed, and at Pittsburgh they shook hands, and are one now to be one forever.

You say to a man with whom you have had a falling out. "I despise you." He says, "I can't bear the sight of you." You say to him, "I never want you to come to my house again." He says, "If you come to my house again I'll kick you out." You say, "I'll put you down." "Oh no," he says, "I'll put you down." But some day the spirit of Christ comes into you, and you go over and say, "My brother, give me your hand; time is short and eternity is near, and we can't afford to quarrel. Now let bygones be bygones, and let us act like Christians." It is all settled. How? By the gentleness of Christ.

Did you ever know

by mimicry of his staggering step, his thick tongue, or his hiccough? No. You only madden his brain. But you go to him and you let him know you appreciate what an awful grapple he has with the evil habit, and you let him know that you have been acquainted with people who were down in the same depths and who, by the grace of God, have been rescued. He hears your voice, he responds to that sympathy, and he is saved.

You cannot scold the world into anything better. You may attract it into something better. The stormiest wind comes out from its hiding-place and says, "I'll arouse this sea," and it blows upon the sea. Half of the sea is aroused, or a fourth of the sea is aroused, but not the entire Atlantic. But after a while the moon comes out, calm and placid is it. It shines upon the sea, and the ocean begins to lift. It embraces all the highlands, the beach is all covered. The heart-throb of one world beating against the heat-throb of another world. The storm could not rouse the whole Atlantic; the moon lifted it. "And I," said Christ, "if I be lifted up will draw all men unto me."

II. Christ's disposition was also one of SELF-SACRIFICE.

No young man ever started out with so bright a prospect as Christ started out with if He had been willing to follow a worldly ambition. In the time that He gave to the sick He might have gathered the vastest fortune of His time. With His power to popularize Himself and magnetize the people He could have gained any official position. No orator ever won such applaudits as He might have won from sanhedrim and synagogue and vast audiences by the seaside. No physician ever got such a reputation for healing power as He might have obtained if He had performed his wonderful cures before the Roman aristocracy. I say these things to let you know what Paul meant when he said, "He pleased not Himself," and to show something of the wonders of His self-sacrifice.

All human power together could not have thrown Christ into the manger if He had not chosen to go there. All Satanic strength could not have lifted Christ upon the cross if He had not elected Himself to the torture. To save our race from sin and death and hell He faced all the sorrows of this world and the sorrows of eternity. How much of that self-sacrifice have we?

WHAT IS SELF-SACRIFICE?

It is my walking a long journey to save you from fatigue. It is my lifting a great number of pounds to save you from the awful strain. It is a subtraction from my comfort and prosperity so that there may be an addition to your comfort and prosperity. How much of that have we? Might not I rather say, "How little have we?" Two children were passing down the road. They were both very destitute. They were brother and sister. The lad had hardly any garments at all. His sister had a coat that she had outgrown. It was a very cold day. She said, "Johnnie, come under this coat." "Oh," he said, "no, the coat isn't large enough." "Oh," she said, "it will stretch." He coming under the coat, but the coat would not stretch. So she took off the coat and put it on him. Self-sacrifice pure and simple. Christ taking off His robe to clothe our nakedness. Self-sacrifice. I have not any of it, nor have you, compared with that. The sacrifice of the Son of God. There was

A PLAGUE IN MARSEILLES.

The college of surgeons met and said, "We must have a dissection, we must have a post-mortem examination, or we will never know how to arrest this disease." But it was certain death to attempt it. There was a pause for a few moments, when Dr. Guion said, "Gentlemen, we must have a post-mortem examination; some one must undertake it; of course it is certain death to any one who attempts it, but in the name of God and humanity I will do it." He went home, made his will, bade his family good-by, went to the dissecting-room, succeeded in his undertaking, wrote out his observations, and in twelve hours was dead. Self-sacrifice pure and simple and Christ-like.

And there are just as good specimens of it in Greenwood and in the cemeteries at Savannah and Charleston and Memphis. Doctors dying that others may live. How much have I of it? How much have you of it? Not much. Christ walked to Emmaus, Christ walked from Capernaum to Bethany, Christ walked from Jerusalem to Golgotha. How far have you and I walked for Christ? His head ached, His heart ached, His back ached. How much have we ached for Christ?

III. The disposition of Jesus was also a disposition of HUMILITY.

The Lord of earth and heaven in the garb of a rustic. He who poured all the waters of the earth out of His right hand—the Amazon, and the Euphrates, and the Oregon, and the Ohio, and the Mississippi—bending over a well to ask a Samaritan woman for a drink. He who spread the canopy of the heavens and set the earth for a footstool, lodging with one Simon, a tanner. He whose chariots the clouds are, walking with sore feet. Hushing the tempest on Genessaret and wiping the spray of the storm from His beard, then sitting down in the cabin beside His disciples, as though he had done no more than wipe the sweat from His brow in His father's carpenter shop. Taking the foot of death off the heart of Lazarus and breaking the chain of the grave against the marble of the tomb, and then walking out with Mary and Martha without any more pretension than a plain citizen going out in the suburban village to spend the evening. Jostled as though He were a nobody. Pursued as though He were an outlaw. Nicknamed, spit on. Seated with publicans and with sinners. King of heaven and earth trailing His robes in the dust.

How much of that humility have we? If we get a few more dollars than other people, or gain a little higher position, oh, how we strut! We go around wanting everybody to know their place, and say, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the honor of my kingdom and for the might of my strength?" Who has anything of the humility of Christ?

IV. The disposition of Christ was also

THE SPIRIT OF PRAYER.

Prayer on the mountains, prayer on the sea, prayer among the sick, prayer everywhere. Prayer for little children: 'Father, I thank Thee that Thou hast hidden these things from the wise and the prudent and revealed them unto babes." Prayer for His friends: "Father, I will that they be with me where I am." Prayer for His enemies: "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do." Prayer for all nations: "Thy kingdom come." How little of that spirit you and I have. How soon our knees get tired. Where is the vial full of odors which are the prayers of all the saints? Which of us can keep our mind ten minutes on a prayer without wandering. Not you, not I. Oh, that we might have the spirit of prayer which was the Spirit of Christ. We want more prayer in the family, more prayer in the Church, more prayer in the legislative hall, more prayer among the sick, more prayer among the aged, more prayer among the young. The great advancement of the Church is to be in that direction yet.

While the Council of Nuremburg was signing the edict that gave the Protestants their freedom, Martin Luther was away off in a room by himself praying for that accomplishment. Though there was no between the place where the Council was assembled and the room where Martin Luther was praying, Martin Luther suddenly rose from his knees and said, "It is accomplished, the Protestants are free. Victory, victory!" Oh, for this direct line of communication with the throne of God, so that it may be said of us as it was said of Luther, "He got what he asked for!" We want, like Daniel, to pray with our face toward the holy city. We want, like Stephen, to pray gazing into heaven. We want, like the publican, to pray smiting on the heart of conviction. We want, like Christ, to pray, the Christ who emptied His heart of all its life blood and then filled it with the sorrows, the woes, the agonies of all nations.

Cold mountains and the midnight air
Witnessed the fervor of His prayer.

V. The Spirit of Christ, I remark lastly, was a SPIRIT OF HARD WORK.

Not one lazy moment in all His life. Whether He was talking to the fishermen on the beach, or preaching to the sailors on the dock, or administering to the rustics amid the mountains, or spending an evening in Bethany, always busy for others. With hands, heart, head busy for others. Hewing in his father's carpenter shop, teaching the lame how to walk without crutches, curing the child's fits, providing rations for the hungry host. Busy, busy, busy! The hardy men who pulled the net out of the sea filled with floundering treasures, the shepherds who hunted up grassy plots for their flocks to nibble at, the shipwrights pounding away in the dockyards, the wine-makers of Engedi dipping the juices from the vat and pouring them into the goatskins were not more busy than Christ. Busy,

BUSY FOR OTHERS.

From the moment He went out of the caravansery of Bethlehem to the moment when the cross plunged into the socket on the bloody mount, busy for others. Does that remind you of yourself? It does not remind me of myself. Oh, if we lift a burden it must be light. If we do work it must be popular. If we sit in the pew it must be soft. If we move in a sphere of usefulness it must be brilliant. If we have to take hold of a load, give us the light end of the log. In this way to heaven fan us, rock us, sing us to sleep. Lift us up toward heaven on the tips of your fingers under a silken sunshade. Stand out of the way all you martyrs who breasted the fire; stand out of the way and let this colony of tender-footed modern Christians come up and get their crowns.

What has your Lord done to you, O Christian, that you should betray Him? Who gave you so much riches that you can afford to despise the awards of the faithful? At this moment, when all the armies of heaven and earth and hell are plunging into the conflict, how can you desert the standard? Oh backslidden Christian, is it not time for you to start anew for God and anew for heaven?

Now, I have shown you that the disposition of Christ was a spirit of gentleness, a spirit of self-sacrifice, a spirit of humility, a spirit of prayer, a spirit of hard work—five points. Will you remember them? Are you ready now for the tremendous announcement of the text? "If any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of His." Are you ready for that statement? Can we stand up and say, "Yes, we have the spirit of Christ?" Not one of us can make that answer to the full question, yet I am to declare to you there is no discouragement in this subject for Christian people. You have planted in your soul. "It doth not yet appear what we shall be." You might as well blame an acorn for not being an oak of a thousand years as to blame yourself if you are not equal to Christ. You have the implantation within you which will enlarge and develop into the grandest Christian character, and there is no discouragement in this text for you to try and love and serve the Lord. Aim high. Sheathe not your sword until you have gained the last victory. Climb higher and higher until you reach the celestial hills. Crowns bright and radiant for all the victors, but death to every deserter. Let us pray.

After the Evening Service at the Brooklyn Tabernacle, Dr. Talmage bade good-by to his congregation, who filed past the platform to shake him by the hand. The Tabernacle will be closed for renovation and repair during the months of July and August. Dr. Talmage hopes to resume his labors the first Sunday in September. In the interval THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will contain each week, as usual, a sermon by Dr. Talmage, never before published in these columns. During his vacation Dr. Talmage will preach occasionally, in fulfilment of engagements of long standing. The following are the places and dates fixed: Framlingham, Mass., July 21st; Island Park, Ind., July 25th; Lakeside, Ohio, July 26th; Chatauqua, July 29th; Great Grimsby Camp Meeting, August 24th; Ripley, Ohio, August 27th.

A Young Lady's Refusal to Dance is Said to have led to a large gift to a Christian mission. The Christian Weekly thus relates the incident: "At a large evening party in Coahuila, Mexico, the Governor of the State invited an American young lady to dance. She declined, as her religious convictions did not permit her, as she was connected with the mission there of the Southern Baptist Board. It led to the Governor's acquaintance with the mission, and since to a gift to it from him of property valued at $140,000."

The Increase of Baseball Playing on Sundays is becoming a matter of general concern. In many States there may now be seen on the outskirts of the chief cities groups of young men on all the vacant lots playing baseball, from morning until sunset, not only breaking the Sabbath themselves, but disturbing others by their shouts and noisy mirth. A manufacturer in Columbus, Ohio, has adopted a practical method for discouraging it among his own employés. Noticing that his men and boys, of whom he employs a large number, were becoming more and more engaged in Sunday baseball playing, he called them together, and announced to them that the factory would shut down at three o'clock on Saturday afternoons, without reduction of wages, if they would agree not to attend baseball games on Sunday. The proposition was heartily accepted by the workmen.

The Gospel Tent "Glad Tidings," of which a picture appeared in a former number of this journal, has been pitched for the season of 1884 at the north-west corner of Broadway and Fifty-fifth Street, New York City. It was formally opened on Sunday, June 22d. About one thousand people, filling the seating capacity of the ring, passed in to the evening Gospel meeting, when the Rev. Dr. MacArthur, of Calvary Baptist Church, preached the opening sermon. The meetings are under the direction of the Rev. S. Hartwell Pratt. During the past three seasons the tent has been at Twentieth Street and Second Avenue. Meetings will be held every evening during the summer except Saturday. Monday nights will be devoted to a service of song, Tuesdays there will be preaching, Bible readings on Wednesdays, and preaching on Thursdays. Questions pertaining to Christian life and experience will be answered on Friday nights. The meetings are free to all.

Pastor Chiniquy has again been Mobbed by Roman Catholics. The Montreal Witness publishes the following narrative from its Quebec correspondent: "Pastor Chiniquy arrived in Quebec on June 17th, and in the evening preached in the French Protestant chapel on St. John Street, when he was insulted and assailed with stones by a crowd of people who had congregated in the street, and even penetrated into the sacred edifice. The preacher had no sooner announced his text than a shower of stones was hurled through the windows, breaking a few lamps in the chapel, but doing no further damage. Meanwhile the crowd hung around the doors and constantly increased, until the service was concluded, and Mr. Chiniquy, with another French gentleman, was about to take his departure, a carter's hack awaiting him a short distance from the door. At sight of him the crowd pressed forward, yelling and imprecating. Mr. Chiniquy and his companion at length succeeded in reaching the hack, which was driven off as rapidly as possible in the direction of the city, the yelling crowd following it for some distance. Mr. Chiniquy, however, made good his escape, but the carriage-windows were broken, and his companion, it is said, was badly cut about the face.

ACCORDING TO YOUR FAITH.

THE following narrative is published with other interesting cases in Thy Healer, a magazine edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, and issued on the first and fifteenth of each month. This case is described by the sufferer's pastor, the Rev. R. H. Bleby, of Bridgend, Glamorganshire, Wales.

"Thomas Wilson is an employé of the Great Western Railway Company, living at the Fountain Village, near Bridgend. While at work upon the line, on Saturday, February 2d, of this present year, he was thrown down and run over by two laden trolly trucks, weighing about a ton each. The four wheels passed down his body just inside of the right shoulder, crushing and mangling him terribly. He was a member of my charge, and hearing of the accident on the Sabbath, I went to see him on Monday morning.

"As I entered his room, the unmistakable odor intimated to me that mortification had set in. In answer to my inquiry, he told me that he had been in fearful suffering, but that it had all gone, and he felt quite easy. This seemed to me an assurance that death was near at hand. When I questioned him as to his state of mind in view of his condition, he said that he was not afraid to die, for he had a consciousness of acceptance through Christ, but he was exceedingly anxious to live, both for the sake of his wife, and also because he wished to be better fitted to enter into the presence of his God.

"I told him that the Lord Jesus was infinitely powerful and gracious; and that if he set before Him his desire, I believed He would listen to him, and raise him up. I offered prayer on his behalf, and then told him to put his own desire before the Lord. This he did in simple, earnest words; and while he was doing so, I could feel that his prayer prevailed with God. I went away conscious that only the sacred power that raised Lazarus could raise this doomed man, but with the conviction that the Lord the Healer had taken the case in hand.

"As I left the house, three doctors were approaching it. One of them, Dr. Thomas, of Maesteg, Glamorganshire, I saw and conversed with on April 2d, and I cannot better state the issue of the case than by giving the substance of this conversation:

"I told the doctor that I had heard of a remark that had fallen from his lips in regard to the case of Thomas Wilson, and had come to ask what he, as a doctor, thought of the recovery of that man. His answer was that he had never heard of a case like it. When he and the other doctors examined the man, they at once pronounced his condition hopeless, and thought that even the removal of the mortified arm would only hasten the end. They gave him and his wife to understand that he had but a few hours to live; and with only such instructions as would tend to lessen suffering, they left him.

"Said Dr. Thomas to me, 'Had the mortification even set in below the shoulder joint, it would have been a more hopeful case, but commencing as it did from above the shoulder, and the wound in the side having also mortified, there seemed no possibility of the man's recovery.' About a week after his first visit the doctor happened to ask after Wilson; and hearing to his surprise that he was still alive, went to see him a second time. He had not, as I understood, had any medical attention in the interim. Dr. Thomas found the mortified arm and the wound in the side 'sloughing away,' to use his own expression. He took out his penknife and easily removed the arm with it, and found that 'the artery had already plugged itself up.'

"I told him that the reason I had come to question him about it was that I had been present when the man's believing prayer took hold upon God, and that I could understand his recovery in the light of that. The doctor seemed slightly confused at this view of the subject; but answered, 'Well, the only thing I can say is that the man has a remarkably fine constitution; but it was no medical law that saved his life; it was a higher law.' Indeed it was; a law far higher than the physical laws, by the application to which, with so much difficulty, and suffering, and expense, so little is accomplished; and yet a law that a child may learn and apply. Shall I add, only a child can learn and apply it? It is this: 'All power is given unto Me in heaven and on earth.' 'And whatsoever ye shall ask in My name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son.' 'If ye shall ask anything in My name, I will do it.'

"I have seen Wilson several times since. Within six or seven weeks of his accident he was about, and is at his work, though crippled by the loss of his arm. Why is this? Could not He who raised the dying body have just as easily restored the dead arm? I have thought much of this while writing this record. It may be that the missing arm is a standing memorial of the Lord's goodness to the man. This has been suggested to me; but I rather see in it a standing memorial of my weak faith, which could not accept, or lead this member of my charge to accept in Jesus, the healing of the arm, as well as the salvation of the life.

THE SPIRIT OF THE AGE.

By James Stephens, M.A.

Boastings of Progress—The Scriptural Warning—The Future Gloomy not Bright—The Days of Scoffers — Licentious Men — False Security—Apostasy Inevitable—Awful Ending of the Age—Antediluvian Scepticism—Present Indifference—The Practical Issue.

OUR subject is the character and end of the age—this age in which we live. We are, I dare say, familiar with the statements made by those who write the history or chronicle the events of modern times, to the effect that we live in the age of progress. Comparisons are often made between the present time and times that are passed, greatly to the advantage of the former. It is pointed out how, by means of education and the development of commerce and art and science, we are in far better circumstances than our forefathers were. And this is made a ground of expectation for the future.

Many of these statements, having regard as they have to secular things, we in no way wish to deny or call in question. But secular progress is in nowise identical with spiritual progress; and when Christian men speak as if the progress of this age were an upward progress, culminating in a world-wide triumph of Christianity and the establishment of universal peace and brotherhood, we are obliged to demur and to point out how contrary is the teaching of God's Word.

First in II Tim. 3 we read words pointing out what shall be in the last days, clearly setting before us what our age is developing into. Its development is not in an upward direction, or toward universal conversion, but on the contrary toward the practice of daring sins. These daring sins will be associated with a form of godliness. There will be profession of God, but practical denial. And the consequent character of the last days will be that they will be perilous. God, whose eye surveys all the future, sees and tells us what our age is advancing to.

But further we find Peter in his Second Epistle writing that there shall come in the last days scoffers; unto this, then, our age is going on. We are not advancing to days of universal conversion, but to

for the Word of God. The scoffing will be on the part of those who have heard and who know that Word, and who are acquainted with its teaching on the subject of the second coming of Christ. Such scoffing is quite compatible with great advances in science. Indeed, in these days, science is not infrequently marked by disregard, even daring disregard, for what God has said. Theories are started and maintained as if they were proved facts—theories which treat with disdain the historic authority of God's Word. Whatever attempts are made to show the reconciliation between revealed religion and science (and let us not undervalue these), yet, none the less really, will the last days be days of scoffing.

Men will walk after their own lusts, saying, Where is the promise of His coming? They will walk in wilfulness. They will be a law to themselves, and will put aside the will of God. Liberty will become lawlessness; and scepticism as to the most definitely foretold fact of the coming of Christ flaunt itself.

Nor will the scornful scepticism of the Coming be without some little show of reasonableness. Century after century passes, and all things continue as they were. There is no appearance or likelihood, they say, of anything supernatural. But they "wilfully forget" (II Pet. 3 : 5, R. V.) that by the Word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth. They ignore the creative fiat of the Almighty, and they deny the very possibility of creation.

Our day, with its teaching of evolution, has connected itself with "the last days,"

THE DAYS OF SCOFFING.

That God made everything, "after its kind," as His Word affirms, has been denied, and even professing Christian teachers have been carried away in numbers by the evil current. It would almost seem as if in certain cases one would be esteemed to have forfeited his scientific, if not even his intellectual, reputation if he upheld the scriptural doctrine.

But we take a further step. Paul, when writing to the Thessalonians in his Second Epistle, tells us that before the day of the Lord comes the great apostasy will take place. Our age, then, is going on to apostasy, excelling all apostasy that has been known. There have been departures from Christ in different ages, but here we have the grand departure, a departure culminating in the manifestation of him who is called the man of sin.

Notwithstanding all progress in secular things, in science, and in art, there remains and grows rebellion against God. The days before the Flood were days of progress in arts (Gen. 4 : 21, 22), and days of renown (Gen. 6 : 4), but with this secular progress the imagination of men's hearts was evil continually, and the race became spiritually and morally utterly corrupt. And the present days have a likeness to the days before the Flood. With all the glorious increase to the number of Christ's disciples through times of refreshing, yet so far from the world getting converted the world is in many cases converting and corrupting the Church. And we are going on to days when multitudes will depart from the profession of Christ to the denial of Him. The apostasy will take place.

What a fearful issue this is! What a solemn and with all its boasted civilization, and refinement, and culture, and science, and liberty! As we have seen, the age is advancing to the denial of godliness (though the form of godliness be held), to the scoffing at or denial of the Word, and finally to the denial of God Himself and His only begotten Son. Then shall come to pass what Isaiah foretold would come to pass previous to the glory of the Lord rising on Jerusalem—"Darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people" (Isa. 60 : 1, 2). When God and His Son are denied, it is as if the sun of the firmament were blotted out and the true light gone. How very different this from the thoughts of many that commerce, education, and art, united with the preaching of the Gospel, will usher in the Millennium!

When our age reaches the fearful crisis that is foretold, then the Lord Jesus Christ must interpose in administrative and punitive power. When man became wholly corrupt before the Flood the Lord interposed in righteous judgment, and when the world becomes again mature in corruption, again there will be interposition in righteous judgment. The revelation of the Lord Jesus, to which His own people expectantly look, will be to others as was the Flood, or as the fire and brimstone which came on Sodom.

In the days of Noah men were living in scepticism of the fact of coming judgment. This is what is suggested by "eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage." Notwithstanding the warnings given by Noah during one hundred and twenty years there was utter unconcern and universal unbelief. Many may have said then, "Where is the threatened flood? all things continue as they were." In any case their manner of life expressed profound indifference to what was foretold. The Flood was at hand, and the world was "wilfully ignorant;" they knew not till it came.

As it was then, so shall it be in the last days. The Lord Jesus has indeed given the plainest warnings, and "He that shall come will come, and will not tarry." With all the warnings, however, men will go on in their wilful course, and in lawlessness, and in mockery. And "when they shall say, Peace and safety, then sudden destruction." When the Lord Jesus comes down upon this earth in judgment, His own will be like Noah in the ark. They will be gathered to Himself, before the breaking forth of wrath, and after He shall thus have come forth in righteous and administrative power, executing judgment, and have bound Satan and set up His rule, millennial blessings shall crown this earth. What is of all this? The prospect of this age is indeed a dark one; and those who set forth God's Word as to the end of the age may be regarded as gloomy foreboders, men incapable of rightly appreciating the so-called good features of the times, and on these grounds have scant welcome, or even quarter. Such teaching is exceedingly opposed to the views of even Christian men. Still, if God condescends to make known the evil to come, we shall do well to lay it to heart.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Saved by her Husband's Blood.—Mr. Campbell related at a recent meeting: "In one of our infirmaries a poor woman lay very ill. The doctors said she was dying from want of blood, and that if she had more healthy blood she would live. Her husband, a big brawny man, was standing by when this was said. Baring his arm, he said, 'Take mine!' With the proper instruments the doctors transfused the husband's blood into the veins of the wife, and she got better. Thus it is with unforgiven sinners; they are dying daily—they are nearing death, but Christ offers to transfuse His life into them and to renew their hearts. He has given His blood for them, and is now living to intercede for those who repent and turn from sin."

Saved Out of Smoking-Money.—Mr. Wilson said: "I was speaking to one of our recent converts lately, when he handed me five shillings, and requested me to use the amount to further our evangelistic work. I said, 'I cannot take all that money from a poor man like you; half of that sum is quite sufficient for you to give.' 'You must take it,' he replied, with a smile; 'I can easily afford it now, for I have saved it for the purpose by stopping smoking.' There is more spent on strong drink and tobacco than would suffice for all the demands of the most enterprising Christianity; but many people give only a miserable penny per week to the Lord's cause who never scruple about drinking or smoking away four or five shillings a week!"

The Account Chalked on the Door.—"An Old woman kept a shop in a small village. She was not a good scholar, and therefore kept her accounts against her customers chalked up on the back of her door. One of her customers was deeply convicted of sin, and sought light, but could not find it. In her trouble she spoke to a Christian friend, who found great difficulty in making the way of salvation plain to her; but at last he succeeded in the following way: 'Mrs.—— has an account against you chalked up on the back of her door?' 'Yes, sir,' she answered. 'If I go up and pay it, what does she do?' 'Wipes it all out.' 'What have you to do then?' 'Nothing, if you pay it.' 'I will go and pay it now.' The friend went and paid the amount, which was accordingly rubbed off the door. He then returned to the anxious woman, and said, 'I have paid your account, and it is wiped off the door; have you anything more to do?' 'No, sir,' she said. Her friend continued: 'Jesus has paid the debt you owed to God's justice, and all you have to do is to trust His word as you did mine just now, and you are saved.' 'I will!' she exclaimed. She did so, and has trusted Christ ever since."

A Dispute About a Corpse.—Mr. McMicking remarked: "In Spain the laws protecting the rights of Protestants are over-ridden by those who should administer them. The child of a Protestant died in the month of January last. The father desired to bury it in the civil cemetery, but under the influence of the parish priest the Mayor went to the man's house and ordered the body to be buried in the Roman Catholic cemetery with Popish rites. The father protested against this order, claimed his rights, and appealed to the Governor, who sent an order to the Mayor to leave the man in peace. The Mayor coolly ignored this, and going to the Bishop, got authority to take possession of the body. Taking a surgeon and a helper, he went to the Protestant's house, on the 27th of January last, and took the body and buried it in the Roman Catholic cemetery. We ought to give our prayers and money to help on the evangelization of benighted and bigoted Spain."

God's Word among French Mountaineers.—Pasteur Vernier related: "A man returning from Africa, where he had failed as a colonist, passed through Marseilles, where he met an old woman who offered to sell him a New Testament for a penny, but he refused it, saying, 'A New Testament is of no use to me; I don't want it.' 'Take it for nothing, and read it, for you do want it, if you only knew it,' said the woman. He took the book, and went to his own home in the mountains, where a proprietor heard that the man had a Testament. The proprietor borrowed the book, and read it, but no immediate spiritual result followed, unless a strange yearning after a better life might be called the beginning of a new life. One day he went to the Roman Catholic church and as he left he cried to God, 'Surely, O God, there is a better religion than this for the people?' Immediately he felt in his spirit that there was a better faith, and then he began to understand the teaching of the New Testament, and commenced to speak to other people about Jesus. When I visited the place four years after the man passed through Marseilles, I found a company of over twenty persons waiting for me at the station. They had never seen a missionary, or a Bible-reader, nor a colporteur, yet they had studied the whole Bible, and knew it better than I did. God works in strange ways, and they are not as our ways."

Two Typical Ocean-Going Ships.—"A Vessel left a British port, and sailed across the Atlantic, down the Pacific, called at many ports, and finished her voyage for the time being in an East India bay. Great things had happened during that long voyage to the ship—she had passed through many a storm, her decks had been swept by great billows of salt water, her mast had been lost, and two men were carried overboard and drowned. I was on board, and passed an awful time till she reached her destination, no longer looking the fine ship she really was to those who saw the outside so rough and uncomfortable; but those who sailed her knew her qualities, and loved that discolored, storm-tossed hulk. A year afterward a splendidly fitted-up steamer sailed from the same quay, and in eight weeks reached the same spot, in the same bay, without losing a spar, and hardly wet her decks with salt water. These two ships are true types of the lives of Christians. Some have to fight through storm, and lose many a precious thing, and after a long voyage reach the longed-for harbor, to all appearance a wreck, but their Captain, the Lord of Glory, knows their qualities, and has a use for their tried fidelity. Other Christians, again, sail on smooth water all through life. The Lord also knows them, and has a use for their calm, unruffled natures. Do not look with envy on others, but let each put their bodies and spirits into the hands of the divine Disposer of all events, and He will use us for His glory."

A LIFE WASTED.

(From the Youth's Companion.)

ABOUT thirty years ago, a gentleman from New York, who was travelling in the South, met a young girl of great beauty and wealth, and married her. They returned to New York and plunged into a mad whirl of gayety. The young wife had been a gentle, thoughtful girl, anxious to help all suffering and want, and to serve her God faithfully. But as Mrs. L—— she had troops of flatterers; her beauty and dresses were described in the society journals; her bon-mots flew from mouth to mouth; her equipage was one of the most attractive in the Park. In a few months she was intoxicated with admiration.

She and her husband flitted from New York to Newport, from London to Paris, with no object but enjoyment. There were other men and women of their class who had some worthier pursuit—literature, or art, or the elevation of the poorer classes—but L—— and his wife lived solely for amusement. They dressed, danced, flirted, hurried from ball to reception, and from opera to dinner. Young girls looked at Mrs. L—— with fervent admiration, perhaps with envy, as the foremost leader of society.

About ten years ago, she was returning alone from California, when an accident occurred to the railroad train in which she was a passenger, and she received a fatal internal injury. She was carried into a wayside station, and there, attended only by a physician from the neighboring village, she died.

Dr. Blank has said that it was one of the most painful experiences of his life. "I had to tell her that she had but an hour to live. She was not suffering any pain. Her only consciousness of hurt was that she was unable to move, so that it was no wonder she could not believe me.

"'I must go home,' she said, imperatively, 'to New York.'

"'Madame, it is impossible. If you are moved, it will shorten the time you have to live.

"She was lying on the floor. The brakemen had rolled their coats to make her a pillow. She looked about her at the little dingy station, with the stove stained with tobacco in the midst.

"'I have but an hour, you tell me?'

"'Not more.'

"'And this is all that is left me of the world. It is not much, doctor,' with a half smile.

"The men left the room and I locked the door, that she might not be disturbed. She threw her arm over her face and lay quiet a long time; then she turned on me in a frenzy. 'To think of all that I might have done, with my money and my time! God wanted me to help the poor and the sick! It's too late now! I've only an hour!' She struggled up wildly. 'Why, doctor, I did nothing, nothing, but lead the fashion! Great God! The fashion! Now I've only an hour! An hour!'

"But she had not even that, for the exertion proved fatal, and in a moment she lay dead at my feet.

"No sermon that I ever heard was like that woman's despairing cry, 'It's too late!'"

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Reduction in the Public Debt During last month was, according to a statement issued, $4,763,241. That brings the total reduction for the eleven months of the current fiscal year to $91,823,714. This amount is smaller than in recent years, and was less than that of the corresponding period of 1883 by nearly forty millions. It is, however, nearly double the reduction required by law, which was estimated for this year at $45,816,741.

An Offset to the Resolutions of the Independent Republicans is sent us by a friend of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD residing at Augusta, Me. He writes: "I have no doubt but that some conscientiously believe Mr. Blaine to be morally bad. Even at home he has a few enemies; but the very large majority of those who know him, irrespective of party, know him only to admire, honor, and respect him. . . . If he is elected to the high office of President, he will prove to be a worthy successor to any who have preceded him in the office." We cheerfully print this communication, having already published the resolutions to which it refers. The object of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in both cases, is to supply such information as will assist its readers to act intelligently in the election. It is necessary to do this, because many of them who take an interest in politics—as every good citizen should do—have not access to a secular, metropolitan journal, and are disinclined to rely exclusively on the guidance of local organs. But the work of supplying information is the sole capacity in which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD can consistently act in this matter. Those friends who have written urging it to enter the political arena as a partisan, overlook the fact that its mission is not that of a political or party organ. Its sphere is a higher and more important one, in which its power of usefulness would be impaired if it devoted its space to advocating or antagonizing the interests of any candidate. News of the progress of the campaign its readers will find here, but not advice as to how they should vote. We hope that they will seek divine guidance in this critical juncture, and He who has the destinies of this great nation in His hand will take care of the issue.

A Declaration has been Issued by the Independent Republicans, and is being circulated for signatures. It states that those signing it desire to join their fellow-Republicans and the Independent voters in sending representatives to "a general conference to be held immediately after the Democratic National Convention, which shall consider, in case the Democratic nominations do not justify the support of the protesting Republicans, what further action may be necessary to secure candidates who will appeal, in the interest of clean and honest politics, to the sober, moral sense of the American people. Persons wishing to sign are requested to send their names to Mr. George W. Green, No. 11 Pine Street, New York. The large number of names already sent indicates that the disaffected members of the party are more numerous and more influential than was at first believed. Many business men have joined their ranks who were at first friendly to the nomination. They have been driven into opposition by the promises made to the Irish voters by the Tribune and other Blaine organs that Mr. Blaine will, if elected, antagonize English interests. Merchants and importers dread any international complication that will disturb commerce.

The Prohibition Convention to be Held at Pittsburg, Pa., on July 23d, is anticipated with unusual interest. During the past four years the prohibition sentiment has made more progress than during any preceding period. It is expected that the convention will be the largest temperance assembly ever held in this country. There will be nearly one thousand delegates alone. The convention will be held in Lafayette Hall, where the first National Republican Convention was held. Arrangements are being made by a committee of two hundred local Prohibitionists. The expenses will be met by private subscriptions. The question of the nominations is being carefully considered in advance. As General Neal Dow is said to have declared his intention of taking the stump for Mr. Blaine, there is less fear of his name being forced on the convention this time for the first place on the ticket. Among those mentioned as probable candidates for the Presidential nomination are Clinton B. Fisk, of New Jersey, Gideon T. Stewart, of Ohio, and R. H. McDonald, of California. The name of ex-Governor St. John, of Kansas, however, appears at present to find most favor in the Eastern States, and his strength in the West is declared to be increasing. He will have the support of the entire Kansas delegation.

The Railroad Companies of Iowa have Given notice of their intention to respect the Prohibition law which goes into operation on July 5th. All their agents are prohibited from receiving any intoxicating liquors for transportation from any point, either within or without the State, to any point within its limits, unless there is delivered to such agent a certificate, signed by the auditor of the county in which the point of destination is situated, showing that the consignee has authority by order of the Board of Supervisors to sell liquors in such county.

The Design for the Garfield Monument at Cleveland, Ohio, has been selected by the Board of Trustees. Its prominent feature is a tower, which rises from broad terraces which are reached by spreading stairs. The vestibule leads into a round, vaulted chamber, the stone domelike roof of which is carried on eight granite columns, arranged in a circle around the sculptured tomb, which occupies the centre of the chamber. The capitals of columns and moulded arches between are richly carved, the pavement is tiled in harmonious colors and designs, and the whole is lighted by richly mullioned windows, which throw a softened light on the tomb. A spiral staircase of stone leads to the top of the tower, and opens on a gallery from which the surrounding country can be viewed. On the outside of the monument, above the portal, is a frieze of sculpture six feet in height, extending entirely around the base of the tower and within easy view from the ground. It is divided into panels containing bas-reliefs which represent in a graphic manner the career of Garfield as an educator, a soldier, and statesman; the watching of the world at his death-bed, and the remarkable funeral procession from Elberon to Cleveland. The remains of the President are inclosed in a crypt below the level of the chamber and immediately under the carved tomb. As a suggestion, the sculptor advised Ohio stone for the structural part of the design in connection with buff-colored terra-cotta for the frieze of sculpture which runs around the base of the tower. The chamber containing the tomb will be executed of the richest materials for artistic architectural effect, and the statue of Garfield will be either of bronze or marble.

A Cargo of Mormon Immigrants Numbering five hundred and thirty-one arrived in New York on June 23d by the Arizona. Of these, twenty-six were returning elders, who have been abroad as missionaries, some of them having been absent from home two years, while others have not been in Europe more than six months. Of the converts who came in the steerage four hundred and six are Scandinavians, and the remainder are from Great Britain, and principally English. The immigrants were nearly all in families, but there were a few single persons of both sexes, and a large number of children. The majority of the immigrants are farm laborers, but there is a sprinkling of mechanics among them. It is sad to think of the fate of these deluded Europeans. The power of the Mormon Church for mischief in this direction will be curtailed if the bill recently passed by the Senate becomes law. The fund now used for missionary and emigration purposes will, under the provisions of the new law, be applied to the support of the common schools.

Divorce Reform was Earnestly Recommended by the general assembly of the United Presbyterian Church at its recent session. It adopted resolutions to the effect that, in the judgment of this Assembly, no minister should join in marriage any person who is known to have been divorced on other than scriptural grounds, and that this assembly earnestly invokes State governments to take measures to secure such legislation.

The Commencement Exercises at Mr. Moody's seminary, Northfield, Mass., were held on June 19th, when twelve young ladies received their graduation diplomas. On the platform were 169 other lady-students clad in simple dresses and looking happy and intelligent. Mr. Moody's mother was present at all the exercises and at the collation and reception. No one there enjoyed the celebration more than the hale old lady, whose quaint remarks and genial welcomes were the delight of all the guests. Mr. Moore, one of the trustees, in his address to the first graduating class, said: "Some six years ago Mr. Moody said to me, with tearful earnestness, 'All over these hills of New England and down these valleys are a host of girls longing for education that they may be fitted for usefulness, but unable by poverty to carry out their desires.' For him to feel the need was to execute; and to-day, you, a band of twelve, go out into the world as the first class to graduate from a seminary built up by our beloved friend, the President of our Board. When the seminary building became too strait, there was added Bonar Hall. Then Mr. Moody's own home was thrown open; and now Marquand Hall, costing $66,000, will be opened in November. The new Recitation Hall is started, and still the cry is for more buildings. A library, a chapel, cabinets, philosophical appliances, scholarships, are greatly wanted, and the trustees are anxiously asking, Who will aid us in our need? The Boys' School at Gill is also crippled by poverty.

The Curtis Home for Orphans and Aged Ladies at Meriden, Conn., was dedicated on June 28th. The Home is a three-story brick structure situated in the southern part of the city, and cost $40,000. It was built by Lemuel J. Curtis, a prominent citizen and one of the leading members of St. Andrew's Episcopal Church. Mr. Curtis has also set aside a fund of $250,000, the income from which will be used for the support of the home. The dedication exercises were very simple in character, in accordance with the donor's wishes. Bishop Williams, of the Diocese of Connecticut, officiated, and a large number of Episcopal and other clergymen of Meriden and neighboring cities were present. The home will not be confined to members of any religious denomination, but any Protestant poor will be admitted. It will accommodate from forty to fifty children, and from twelve to twenty old ladies.

A Remarkable Religious Revival in Kansas is reported. It has been gradually extending since the opening of the year. Early in January Rev. T. L. Leonard, of Marshfield, Mass., commenced services at Leavenworth, in which five churches united. The result of those services was the conversion of over three hundred persons. Mr. Leonard was invited to Emporia and subsequently to Ottawa, where he remained seven weeks with increasing success. He has recently gone to Beloit, and there the blessing of God is being poured out with extraordinary results. The interest has extended to the country around, and crowds come into the city nightly to listen to Mr. Leonard's appeals. There are already two hundred converts and inquirers, including some who were notorious through the State as infidels and gamblers. Our friends in Kansas ask the prayers of God's people in other States for a continuance of the blessing.

The Morning Star has been Wrecked at Kusaie in Micronesia. She was the children's missionary ship. She was becoming dilapidated, and, as already mentioned, the building of a new vessel had been commenced before the wreck was reported. The telegram announcing the wreck was dated Hong Kong, June 21st. It gives few particulars, but states that all on board were saved. This ship was the third of her name, and it is a singular coincidence that the second one was wrecked on the same island as the third. The new ship now being built at Bath, Me., will be a steamer, and therefore less liable to such accidents as have befallen her predecessors. It is expected that by the end of this month her hull will be ready for launching.

Successful Gospel Work is being Done in Cincinnati by Mr. Ferdinand Schiverea, of Brooklyn, N. Y. He commenced a mission in a tent on the Circus Grounds, Lincoln Park, and has now large congregations whenever it is opened. They are composed chiefly of loafers and people who attend no place of worship. A jubilee meeting was recently held in the Baptist Church near the tent to welcome one hundred converts who made a profession of faith through God's blessing on the tent services. Mr. Schiverea was converted under the preaching of Mr. Moody, whom he much resembles in manner and method of work.

A Pathetic Reason for Total Abstinence was given by a commercial traveller in Chicago recently. Being invited to drink, he declared, to the surprise of his friends, that he had "sworn off." This was the reason he gave: "I called yesterday on a customer who keeps a pawn shop in connection with his other business. While I was there a young man, wearing threadbare clothes, and looking as hard as if he hadn't seen a sober day for a month, came in with a little package in his hand. He unwrapped it, and handed the article to the pawnbroker, saying, 'Give me ten cents.' And, boys, what do you suppose it was? A pair of baby shoes, little things, with the buttons only a trifle soiled, as if they had been worn only once or twice. 'Where did you get these?' asked the pawnbroker. 'Got 'em at home,' replied the man, who had an intelligent face and the manner of a gentleman, despite his sad condition. 'My wife bought them for our baby. Give me ten cents for 'em—I want a drink.' 'You had better take the shoes back to your wife; the baby will need them,' said the pawnbroker. 'No; s-she won't, because she's dead. She's lying at home now—died last night.' As he said this the poor fellow broke down, bowed his head on the show-case, and cried like a child. Boys," said the drummer, "you can laugh if you please, but I—I have a baby at home, and I swear I'll never drink another drop."

The Bethany Institute for Woman's Christian Work, at 69 Second Avenue, New York, has issued its twelfth annual statement. Its record is an interesting one, not only in the number of tested and trained workers sent forth, but in the actual work accomplished by those under training, in the needy districts of the city and its surroundings. Of the two hundred and twenty-five who have received training during these years, twenty-five have gone to the foreign field, from whom encouraging accounts have been received. The sessions of the institute begin in September, and any who desire to enter the work should apply to Rev. and Mrs. A. G. Ruliffson as above for the annual statement giving full particulars.

A New Fashion in Photography has Come into vogue. A photographer last week described it to a visitor. In his show-case were three white watch faces, on each of which was a tiny but very distinct photograph of a beautiful lady. Being asked about the novelty, he said: "It is becoming quite the thing for the society young man to carry the photograph of his lady-love on his watch dial. She seems to smile on him whenever he looks at the time." "Did you ever photograph a man's wife on his watch?" the photographer was asked. "More times than you would think. There are plenty of men who think more of their wives than they did of their sweethearts. The finest watch face you ever saw had a handsome matron under the noon hour, and two pretty babies—one on each side." Men who have the pictures of their loved ones in their watches are probably those who have least need to be reminded of them. There are others, however, so lazy and so fond of pleasure that even that device would not prove a sufficient incentive to industry and frugality. The best incentive is love in the heart. Christian workers in whose hearts the Holy Spirit reigns supreme learn that there is no need of outward and visible symbols to remind them of their Saviour and their duty; God is "in all their thoughts" (1 Cor. 10 : 31).

Forbidden Kisses Formed the Principal Part of a physician's injunctions to his wife on his leaving home recently. "Remember," he said, "and do not let the children kiss any one." "Is it possible," asked a surprised third party who was present, "that you consider it necessary to give such instructions as that? Where is the danger?" "The danger is complicated and certain," said the doctor. "In my case, all kinds of people come to my house to consult me, and they often wait hours. If one of my children happens to come in they are almost certain to talk to it, and you know almost the first impulse with people who notice children is to kiss them. Bah! it makes me shudder—tainted and diseased breaths, lips blue with cancer, foul and decayed teeth. You would kill a stranger who would waylay your young lady daughter and kiss her by force, but the helpless innocent, six-year-old child, susceptible as a flower to every breath that blows, can be saluted by every one who chances to think of it. Hundreds of lovely children are kissed into their graves every year." The physician did not dread his children coming to harm through violence or hatred, but through a token of affection thoughtlessly given. Moral and spiritual evil is often similarly communicated. Young people are allured from the paths of religion and virtue, not by the hatred, but by the pretended love of the world (II Peter 2 : 18).

UNBELIEF CONDEMNED AND FAITH COMMENDED.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"They are a very froward generation, children in whom is no faith."—Deuteronomy xxxii. 20.

"Blessed is that man that maketh the LORD his trust."—Psalm xl. 4.

A Great Evil and a Great Grace—Disguised Unbelievers—Confidence in a Bridge—I. Unbelief is Frowardness—False Humility—Pride not Timidity—Gives God the Lie—Rejects His Way of Salvation—Makes Unreasonable Demands—Disparages Jesus—Impugns the Power of the Spirit—II. Faith has the Divine Approval—In the Forefront of the Plan—Confidence in a Bank Bill—A Child's Confidence—III. Faith is Blessedness—A Heavenly Surgery—A Quietus to Care.

THESE two texts will serve to show the different estimate which God has of unbelief and of faith. He says of unbelievers, in my text taken from Deuteronomy, "They are a very froward generation, children in whom is no faith;" as much as to say, that the absence of faith proves them to be froward, presumptuous, wilful, disobedient; a people at cross purposes with God. He says not only that they are perverse and froward, but He adds an emphatic word—"they are a very froward generation, children in whom is no faith." The second text most clearly shows us that God has a high approbation for faith; for He Himself by the Holy Ghost says, "Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust." Here, then, we have set before us to which we are sadly inclined, and a great grace which we greatly need.

I will tell you what I shall be driving at this morning; I have a special character in view, and I long to be made useful to persons of that sort. There are those here who do not doubt for a moment the existence or goodness of God, neither have they any question about the inspiration and infallible truth of Holy Scripture; and yet they are entertaining within their hearts an unbelief which doth eat as doth a canker. A deadening unbelief is upon them, so that they abide in darkness, and take no pains to come into the light. Yet they do not condemn themselves, but rather look for pity as though it were their infirmity and not their fault.

Dear friend, you tell me that you are by no means an infidel or a sceptic, and yet so as to find peace with God. You tell me that you cannot believe, which is a confession that you are so false at heart that you cannot believe the truth. It is well that you should own to this gross depravity; but I have reason to fear that you are hardly conscious of the horrible nature of the crime which you acknowledge. I beg you to lay to heart this fact, that unless you have faith in Jesus you will perish just as surely as if you were an open denier of the Word of God and a reviler of His Son

We read of Israel in the wilderness that "they could not enter in because of unbelief;" yet they were not atheists. A passive unbelief will ruin a man as surely as an active infidelity. Suppose that an enemy is on this side of a river destroying everybody. To find safety the river has to be crossed, and there is but one bridge. Yonder man declares that he will never go over such a bridge; he does not believe in it; he asserts that it is a rotten old thing, which would break down under his weight. He hates the structure; he will not call it a bridge at all; he ridicules all who venture upon it. It is clear that he will stay on this side the river, and die by the pursuer's sword. He is the type of the avowed sceptic. But where are you? You say with unfeigned distress, "I am horrified to hear that man talk so of

THAT EXCELLENT BRIDGE;

I believe that it is well constructed, and that it has carried hundreds of thousands over. I cannot bear to heard a word said against it, for my dear father and mother found refuge by crossing it, and they are now in the land of peace." Yet you do not escape by that bridge yourself, though well aware of your danger! Do you answer, "Well, I do not feel worthy to go over it." Why, that is nonsense; it is as if you should say, I cannot swim, and therefore will not cross over the river by means of the bridge. Your unworthiness cannot be a reason for refusing to accept a free salvation; on the contrary, it is a reason why you should accept it at once. However, it matters little what your excuse may be; you will perish forever if you do not believe in Jesus.

I want to talk with those unbelieving people who are not avowedly sceptical. Some of these I have seen, and I know that they are a numerous class. They are very sincere, and are really seeking after salvation; but the one thing which they refuse to do is to believe in the Lord Jesus.

THEY WILL NOT TRUST

their God, they will not believe in the promise which He has made to us in Christ Jesus. They would suffer any penance, they would give anything they possess, they would cut off their right arm, they would consent to lose their eyes, if they might but be saved; but this one matter of trust in God and accepting His way of salvation is the point in which they quarrel with the Most High. Upon this matter, in which the Lord will assuredly never yield to them, they stand out very obstinately, and so prove that they are "a very froward generation, children in whom is no faith." If they would obtain the Lord's blessing, the only way to it is faith. Oh, that they would hold out no longer, for "Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust."

I. To begin, then: our first statement is, unbelief is frowardness—"They are a very froward generation, children in whom is no faith." One very frequent disguise of unbelief is that of humility. "I feel myself such a great sinner; I feel so much evil to be in my heart; I dare not believe in Jesus!" If you judged by appearances you might think this unbelief very modest; but, indeed, it is not so. It imitates the tone of humility, but it cannot catch the accent. This deceptive vice dares to hint that the sinner's unworthiness is a reason why Jesus should not be trusted. What, would any man tell me that his own wickedness is a reason why he should distrust me? That would be too absurd. Because you are such a sinner, is God therefore a deceiver, and not to be trusted? This is not humility, but audacity. Our fearing to trust the promise of God because we are evil is a most perverse piece of wickedness.

Unbelief claims to be so timid. It cries, "I am afraid to come to Christ, with my soul." This is not true fear, but an evil pride. The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau. The sound is that of an amiable timorousness, but the spirit is that of frowardness. Friends, if you truly feared God you would tremble at the idea of distrusting Him. Dread doubting; but fear not to trust your God.

AFRAID TO TRUST HIM

Unbelief is a very froward thing; we repeat the statement, and go on to prove it, because, in the first place, it gives God the lie. Can anything be worse than this? God saith, "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," and the unbeliever replies, "I cannot believe that Jesus will save me." Oh, you poor, timorous soul, as some would call you, I may not flatter you, or excuse you, for I am afraid you must be very proud or you would not look the great Father in the face, and say, "Thou wilt not receive me if I come back to Thee like the prodigal child;" when again and again He invites you to return, and promises to receive you. Oh that this miserable slander of God and of His Christ might be stopped!

Again, unbelief is great frowardness because it refuses God's way of salvation. No man can read the Scriptures without seeing that God's way of salvation is not by works nor by feelings but by trusting in the Son of God, who has offered a full atonement for sin. If thou wilt make the Lord thy trust thou shalt be blessed; but if thou wilt not thou art assuredly accursed, seeing thou hast rejected the blood of the Eternal Sacrifice, refused the way of mercy which infinite love has appointed, and done despite to the Spirit of God. To what a pitch of madness has thou reached! Thou wilt sooner destroy thine own soul than treat thy God as thou wouldst treat an honest man!

Unbelief is a very froward thing, again, because it very often makes unreasonable demands of God. When Thomas said, "Except I put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into His side, I will not believe," he was speaking very frowardly. I have heard the sinner say, "Oh, sir, if I could be broken down with anguish, or if I could enjoy some remarkable revelation, then I would believe God;" this also is frowardness. And so thou darest look the Eternal in the face and say, "Thou shalt be a liar to me unless Thou wilt gratify my whims and wishes, and do this or that to prove what I admit to be true." Will you say to your fellow-man, "Sir, you have offered to help me in this time of need; I am quite willing to depend upon you for that help, provided you will do it in my way; but the way which you propose for my assistance I utterly reject?" You will probably turn your friend against you if you talk so. Beggars must not be choosers—certainly not with God. Shame on unbelief, that it should be so insulting to the God of heaven, before whom angels bow with veiled countenances! Surely, the devil himself cannot go further than unbelief; nor so far; for he believes, and trembles.

IF I COULD HAVE A DREAM,

Unbelief is very froward, next, because it indulges hard thoughts of God. Why do you not trust your God to save you by the blood of Jesus? Do you say that "Salvation by faith is too good to be true?" Is anything too good to come from God, who is infinitely good? Is He not love? Do you say, "If I were to come to Him He would not receive me?" How darest thou say that when it is written, "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out?" Oh, I have so offended that if I were to cry, "Father, I have sinned," I could not expect Him to forgive my offence. This is a base slandering of the heavenly Father! What penitent has He ever repelled? Thou knowest not how good He is—He is inconceivably gracious, He delighteth in mercy. Why will you so cruelly defame the ever-merciful one? Turn from this wickedness, or you will destroy your own soul.

And yet again, unbelief is a very froward thing because it disparages the Lord Jesus. It tramples upon the blood of the Son of God. The unbelieving sinner virtually asserts that he has found out the limit of the Saviour's power to save, and that He stands just over the margin to which His grace extends; for he thinks that Jesus may save any one except himself. Oh soul, dost thou doubt the infinite virtue of the divine sacrifice? Is it not true, as He hath said it, that He is "able to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by Him, seeing He ever liveth to make intercession for them?" Oh, if thou didst but know my Lord and Master thou wouldst not talk so; for He with a word can cast out devils, heal the sick, and raise the dead. He hath but to say "Son, thy sins be forgiven thee," and they are forgiven. He has but to look on thee, poor sinner, and thou shalt live. Yea, be assured that if thou wilt look on Him thou shalt live.

And do you not think it is another instance of great frowardness that unbelief casts reflections upon the Holy Spirit? It seems to say, "I feel sorely afraid, and therefore there is no peace for me.

I AM TOO HARDENED

and foolish for the Holy Spirit to lead me to faith in Jesus; and therefore I will not trust." "Is anything too hard for the Lord?" Change thee, man? Why, He hath turned millions from darkness to light. Who art thou that thou shouldst set thyself up as a kind of vanquisher of grace, conquering grace by thy sin, and saying to the ocean of God's love, "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further?"

II. And now, secondly, we turn to the better side of our subject, and remark that faith has the divine approval. "Blessed," says God, "is that man that maketh the Lord his trust." We are sure that it is so. Wherever there is faith, God is pleased with it; for faith is the sure mark of God's elect. We can only know them by their believing in the Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life. God would never have set that of which He disapproved to be the mark of His eternal choice; but as He makes faith in Jesus to be the token of His covenanted ones, He must approve of it.

Remember, that God has been pleased in His great love to make this of the Gospel. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." "Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved." The Lord puts faith into the very forefront because He delights in it. I find not that the Lord has promised salvation to love, or to patience, or to courage, admirable as these graces are; but He has put this crown upon the head of faith—"Thy faith hath saved thee; go in peace." The Lord must certainly approve of that which He makes to be the grand necessity of salvation.

Dost thou not know that God has made faith to be the one thing needful in the matter of prayer? If thou comest before Him in prayer He will not ask thee to bring thy hands laden with gifts, nor to drop from thy tongue choice words of eloquence; but thou "must believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him," or else thou canst have nothing at His hands. If, then, God has made the efficacy of prayer to turn upon faith, He must have a high estimate of it. He has made faith to be the master-key by which all the chambers of His treasury may be unlocked, and therefore depend upon it He will never cast it out as unwarranted and presumptuous. "Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust," whoever that man may be.

Beside that, He has been pleased to make faith to be the mode and manner of the spiritual life. "The just shall live"—how? by works? No—"the just shall live by faith." There is no living except by faith. Let any child of God try to live by sense or reason, even for a day, and see how miserable he will be. Oh souls, ye cannot have too much faith in God! You need never say, "May I believe?" It is altogether another question—How dare you doubt your God?

"But is it true," says one, "that faith means trusting in God?" That is it. God bids you trust Jesus, and you shall be saved. Will you accept His testimony and trust Jesus? That is the whole of it. In common life we exhibit faith in man, and no one blames us for a legitimate trust. A man says that he has received a thousand pounds. How is that? He has nothing in his hand but and that is merely a bit of paper. Yet he is quite confident that he has the thousand pounds, because he has faith in the Bank of England and in its promises. That is my own mind as to God's promise: it is to me the thing which it promises, even as the note for £1000 is a thousand pounds. "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen." If thou believest God as thou believest thy friend, thou art saved; for faith has brought thee into the state of salvation. But this is what men will not come to. They will stop and mutter and sputter, and spin all kinds of cobwebs, and invent all sorts of theories in order to evade the sweet necessity of trusting in the Lord.

Furthermore, it is not unreasonable, but it is highly reasonable, that God should take pleasure in faith. Beloved, look at yourselves. Judge of the Lord from yourselves in this matter; for the Lord Jesus permits you so to judge of the Father's mind. You who are fathers, what would you say of your child if he did not believe your promise? If he said that he could not trust you, what would you think of him? If your boy had offended, and refused to ask pardon because he would not believe that you would forgive him, what would be your judgment of his character? Would you be pleased with him if he would not confess that he was wrong, but took to sulking because he thinks you are unwilling to forgive? Would you take pleasure in such a child as that? No, but one of the beautiful things about your little children is just this, that they have not a thought or a care, but

JUST TRUST YOU IMPLICITLY.

When children have lost confidence in their parents, farewell to domestic peace. If you, being evil, love to be trusted, must it not be so with God? If you, a poor sinner, come and say, "Lord, I have greatly sinned, but I believe thou art such a greatly loving Father that thou canst blot it all out for Jesus' sake," do you not think that He will be pleased to hear your confidence? But He cannot be pleased with you when you say, "Lord, I know all about Thy Gospel and its blessings, but I really cannot trust Thee!"

God will accept our faith, for it is in conformity with our position toward Him. What position ought the creature to occupy to its Creator? Should it not constantly depend upon Him? What position should a sinner occupy toward his Saviour? Should he not rely upon Him most heartily? What position should a child of God occupy toward the divine Father but one of loving confidence?

Brethren, God loves faith because faith supplies the missing link between us and Himself. A servant who thinks evil of his master cannot be an acceptable servant to any man; he will be looking out for his own interests, and whenever they come across those of his master we know what will happen. But if, after having acted very crookedly, the man should have proof of his master's affection for him, and should come to the belief that his master is a model of goodness, then you have laid the foundation of another kind of service, such as no wages can purchase. From a loving trust there will proceed patience, diligence, zeal, fidelity, and obedience, and everything which is suitable in a servant toward a good master. So when a soul comes to make the Lord its trust it has set out upon the right track; and though it be but at the head of the way, yet it will make advances and arrive at no mean degree of rightness with God.

III. My time has failed me, and therefore I must close by noticing, in the last place, this fact—that faith is blessedness. "Blessed is that man that maketh the Lord his trust." To believe in God is to be blessed by God. "Oh, but," saith one, "I believe in God, and I am in great trouble." Just so, and within that trouble there dwells a measureless blessing. Your trial is the veil which covers the face of a loving God. Faith will make you to sing with the author of this psalm, "I waited patiently for the Lord." Faith says, "I am in deep trial, but all things work together for my good. It is therefore a great gain to me to be as I am. All these griefs and woes are but to cure me of the malady of inbred sin." This enables the believer to receive correction with patience. He knows that all is right, and therefore the child of God frets not, and does not kick against the pricks. As in the old days of surgery a brave man laid himself down and gave himself up to the knife, so does the believer resign himself to sharp affliction because he knows that it is necessary for his spiritual life, and will tend to his perfection in grace. Thus faith distils a potent medicine from poisonous plants, and extracts light out of darkness. Is not this enough to make a man blessed?

Faith, again, releases the afflicted out of trouble. Turn to the psalm again and read: "I waited patiently for the Lord; and He inclined unto me, and heard my cry. He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings." Thousands of saints who have tried and proved the faithfulness of the Lord unite in chorus to declare that He hath delivered His people and will deliver them.

The man that maketh the Lord his trust is blessed because his faith creates in him a deep peace. It is responsibility which causes the wear and tear of life; at least, it is so in my case; now, he who trusts a matter with the Lord sees that the fulfilment of the promise lies with God and not with him. When we trust in the Lord we cease to worry, because it is the Lord's business to answer to our faith—

"'Tis mine to obey, 'tis His to provide."

He who takes the Lord for his Guide no longer worries about the way; he who takes Him for his Watchman rests in perfect peace; he who accepts Him as a Saviour looks for sure salvation at His hands. There is a wonderful calm in the heart when we can commit our way unto the Lord; then we delight ourselves in the Lord, and He gives us the desires of our heart. That blessed act of casting every burden upon the Lord is faith's masterpiece, and it gives a sweet

QUIETUS TO ALL CARE.

When a man trusts his money with a firmly established bank, he does not sit up all night to protect his cash-box and iron safe. No, his money is out of his own keeping, and he feels at ease about it. Thus we commit our body, soul, and spirit into the pierced hand of Jesus, who hath redeemed us, and we know and are confident that He is able to keep that which we have committed unto Him until that day. None can know perfect rest of heart but those whose minds are stayed on God by a sincere trust in Him.

Faith, in addition to bringing peace, creates a holy elevation of character, and that is blessedness. The man who lives by sight and walks according to the judgment of the flesh, is cabined and confined within a range too narrow for blessedness. He is not much above the brute that perisheth; his provender and stall are the main dependence of his joy; but the man that lives by faith ranges among eternal things, and drinks from celestial founts. His is a high, sublime, mysterious life.

"Ah," cries one, "I could not live with nothing to depend upon!" Oh, my brother, is God nothing? Elijah had nothing to depend upon, for Cherith dried up, and the ravens came no more with bread and meat, and the widow woman had only flour enough for one more meal; yet the little meal in the barrel wasted not, and the cruse of oil never failed. He had nothing to depend upon but God, you know; that is to say, he had only everything. The believer has nothing to depend upon except his God, and what more does he want?

WHAT MORE COULD HE HAVE?

Mark how yon heavens stand without a pillar! See how the round world floats in space without a stay! What more does the universe require than the power of the Eternal? Oh believer, get thee out into these deep waters, where there is sea-room for faith, and no weak creatures to interfere with unmingled reliance upon God; for blessed is that man whose life is rendered sublime by an undivided confidence in the living God.

Lastly, blessed is the believing man when he thinks of dying, for he is sure and certain that he cannot truly die. Faith has so linked him with the one living God that he feels immortality pulsing through his entire nature. When he comes to lie on the bed of sickness, and gradually decays, he has no fear of his departure; on the contrary, he looks forward with expectation to be delivered from the bondage and sinfulness of this mortal life, and to be admitted into the liberty and perfection of the life eternal. See him as he quits the shores of earth; he is not torn away by violence, forced unwillingly into an unknown hereafter. No, he undresses for his last rest, solemnly but expectantly. A song is on his lip, and glory is in his heart. He has finished his work, he has been washed from his sin, he has embraced the promise, and now he falls asleep upon the breast of his Redeemer, assured that he shall wake up in the likeness of his Lord. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace."

Oh, souls, if ye will believe, ye shall have both heaven on earth and heaven in heaven; but if ye will not believe your God, your Saviour, many sorrows shall be to you, and in the end you will destroy yourselves forever. It matters not what excuses you make about this, or that, or the other; if you will not trust your God He will have nothing to do with you. If you believe in the Lord Jesus you shall be numbered with His chosen, and all His promises shall be fulfilled to you; for with you has He made an everlasting covenant which shall stand fast forever and ever, when all visible things have melted away. May God uplift you from the miry clay of unbelief to the rock of confidence in Him, for Christ's sake. Amen.

OPENING OF THE FIRST CABLE TRAMWAY IN EUROPE, AT HIGHGATE HILL, LONDON, ON MAY 29.

ENGLISHMEN who visit this country have dwelt with so much emphasis and persistence on the superiority of their native land to the United States, that it is pleasant to notice a practical admission of inferiority lately made. This is the adoption of the cable system of running street-cars which idea John Bull not only borrowed from America, but sent for an American engineer to show him how to operate it.

The opening of the Highgate Hill Cable Tramway is undoubtedly an event of much social importance. It introduces to the notice of the British nation a method of working tramways which has already, in some of the principal cities of the United States, solved trying problems of conveyance, especially in districts whose natural features precluded the use of any other method of propulsion. The importance of the results will be second to none in the future development of the surface-car system in large cities and populous districts. The average cost of horsing the cars on ordinary roads exceeds forty-four per cent of the gross receipts, and, in addition, the cruel fact remains that the life of the car-horse does not exceed four years of hard work at sixteen miles a day. Five thousand horses are thus worked to death every year.

The considerations which resulted in the adoption of the cable system for the New York and Brooklyn Bridge have a universal bearing on the respective practical values of the various means of locomotion at present available for street cars. The endless steel wire rope is seven eighths of an inch in diameter. This cable passes from the depot in High Street, underground, up the hill, there over a large terminal grooved wheel sunk in a deep pit, thence down the whole length of the hill in a covered way to the Highgate tavern at the bottom. There it turns round another terminal wheel sunk in a pit, similar to the one at the top of the hill. The steel rope being kept continuously in motion by the steam-engines at the depot, the cars are provided with a means of gripping the cable in its underground path, and of being released from connection at the will of the conductors in charge.

The car track itself is of the usual construction, but centrally between the two rails of the permanent way there is provided a continuous elliptical tube or trench one foot deep by eight inches wide, below the surface of the road, in which the endless cable moves along at the rate of six miles an hour.

This new steep-gradient road was opened by a procession of decorated cars and an inaugural ceremony by the Lord Mayor of London and the Directors of the Company (as seen in our picture). The streets were thronged with thousands of people, and the houses along the line of route were gay with flags and garlands.

The Cable Tramway is the invention of Mr. A. S. Hallidie, an American engineer of great practical skill, of whom a vignette portrait is given in the corner of the picture of the opening ceremony. From a youth he evinced a genius for mechanics and engineering, and has won a deservedly high reputation for the various useful works which he initiated and carried through to a successful termination. At the present time he is President of the Railroad Company, and also of the Cable Railway Company of California. He fills at the same time the high position of Regent of the University of California, and was for ten years President of the Mechanics' Institute of San Francisco.

AN INDIAN PRIEST.

The Rev. E. Lewis, of Bellary, Southern India, narrates the following incident: "In one of my out-stations, there is a very popular ministry, presided over by a very powerful priest. After several days' preaching in the town some men belonging to his ministry came to us and said, 'Will you come with us to the priest? We should like to see what you will say to him, and what he will say to you.' We accepted the offer, went to the ministry, were introduced to the priest, and sat down—the priest upon his throne, we below. We commenced talking on ordinary subjects until we felt at ease with him, and he with us; and then, addressing the old man, I said, 'You and I ought to have very much in common. You are a teacher of the people, so am I. Suppose we compare notes. Will you tell me how you deal with men? How you seek to lead them to repentance and to a pure and holy life? If you tell me all these things, I will tell you how I work, what I hope for, my prospects for the present, and hopes for the future.' He was somewhat taken aback, but in a very short time he commenced laying down some of the doctrines of their philosophy, and enlarging upon these various doctrines. 'Then,' I said, 'I want to come to your practical life. What do you do to reach men?' He answered, 'I have as much as I can do nowadays to see that they keep to their caste, and to collect the dues they ought to give me.' All was over; and, brethren, you can understand at that time, with such a congregation, with those men by our side, we had as splendid an opportunity as it was possible for any missionaries to have to witness to the Lord Jesus Christ. We spoke to him and to them of Jesus, who gave up His life for men. The souls of the congregation were stirred. Ever after that the old man has considered himself our friend."

A RESCUE FROM THE PIRATE'S CAVE.

(See Illustration.)

LOUD shouts of mirth were ringing around the high peaks which sheltered a little bay. They proceeded from a group of boys who were playing among the boulders, which at low tide were a perfect treasury of shells, and seaweed, and strange things that the sea swept up and left in the interstices. The boys were almost wild with delight. They were city boys, who could appreciate a playground such as that, and as they leaped from rock to rock and picked up the tiny little turtles and crabs, and gathered the long strips of seaweed, they made the little bay resound with their strong young voices. There were five of them belonging to two families, who were neighbors and friends in the city and were taking their trip in company.

"Wonder what that hole is," said Fred Halcome, pointing to a hole in one of the highest of the rocks, which rose almost perpendicularly from the sea.

"Maybe it's a pirate's cave," said Frank Lewis, another of the boys, who had surreptitiously enjoyed more than one dime novel. "Say, boys, we'll find out what it is. Come along."

They were soon at the crag, and Fred Halcome, the biggest and strongest of the boys, stood up to his ankles in water, his shoulders bent, on which his little brother George mounted, and peeped into the hole.

"Oh here's a discovery!" George cried, "it's as big as a room. Hold still Fred, I'm going in." And so saying George crawled through the aperture and was lost to sight.

It was not in boyish nature to remain outside in such romantic circumstances, and Fred Halcome consented to continue his services as an animated ladder on condition that he should be helped up afterward. The three boys were quickly up, and two of them lying flat on their stomachs extended their hands downward to Fred to help him up. Then they explored the cave, a natural chamber in the rock, high enough for them to stand upright.

This place was a grand find to have made on the first day of their arrival. "We'll call it the Pirate's Cave," Frank Lewis said, "and I'll tell you all about three-fingered Roland the pirate, and we'll form a regular pirate gang, and I'll be Roland, and we'll make this place our treasury. Look here; why, this is another cave inside. This is bully. It's a regular castle," and Frank crept through a narrow opening into a smaller cave which was lighted by a narrow crevice, looking out on the opposite side of the rock. "This will be my cabin," Frank said, "the captain's room." There were many details to be settled and, of course, questions of precedence to be arranged, during the discussion of which time passed quickly.

"Now boys," Frank said, "we must have seats and a bed. They must be made of stones, and seaweed spread on the top. Attend to your captain's orders. Fred and George, you go down and gather small stones and hand 'em up. Harry and Will, you stand at the mouth of the cave and receive them. Then you shall all work to make the bed and the seats. We'll make this a genuine castle."

Fred and George said, "Ay, ay, sir," and touched their foreheads in approved pirate style and started on their errand. They quickly returned with scared faces. The waves were nearly up to the mouth of the cave. The boys could not know exactly how deep the water was, but as it had taken two of them, the one standing on the shoulders of the other to get in, they knew that any one jumping out would be drowned. That was a serious situation. They looked out. The place where they had been playing was covered with boiling waves. The great boulders on which they had jumped were not to be seen, though the foam on the water showed where they were. The great billows rushed against the rock and drenched them with spray. And the tide still rose. Soon it would be in the cave, and every boy there felt that there was danger of his being drowned. There was no time to be lost. Frank, who in spite of the general alarm still clung to his command, ordered two boys to go back to the crevice in the inner cave and shout regularly and together, while the two others did the same at the hole by which they had entered.

Meanwhile there was trouble at home. Where could those boys be? The men folks were not much troubled. The boys would come back safely they said; but the mothers and the girls grew more anxious every minute. At length Mr. Lewis and Mr. Halcome were induced to go down to the beach and see if they could see the boys—they were sure to have gone there. They strolled off leisurely to oblige the ladies, but having the general belief that the boys would be all right. They walked for some distance along the beach, and then climbed a cliff to watch the grand sight of the tide coming in on that rocky coast. They came upon a group of men standing there, apparently in consultation. Evidently something had happened. The two gentlemen went to the group and made inquiries.

"Some boys down in a hollow in the rocks sir. You can hear 'em shouting if you listen," said one of the men addressed. They did listen, and there was no mistake. The fathers recognized their sons' voices.

"Is there a boat near that we can send? Those are our boys," Mr. Halcome said.

"Bless you, sir, there's no boat could go there. Why, there's rocks down there as would stave in any boat in this tide."

"Will the water reach them where they are?"

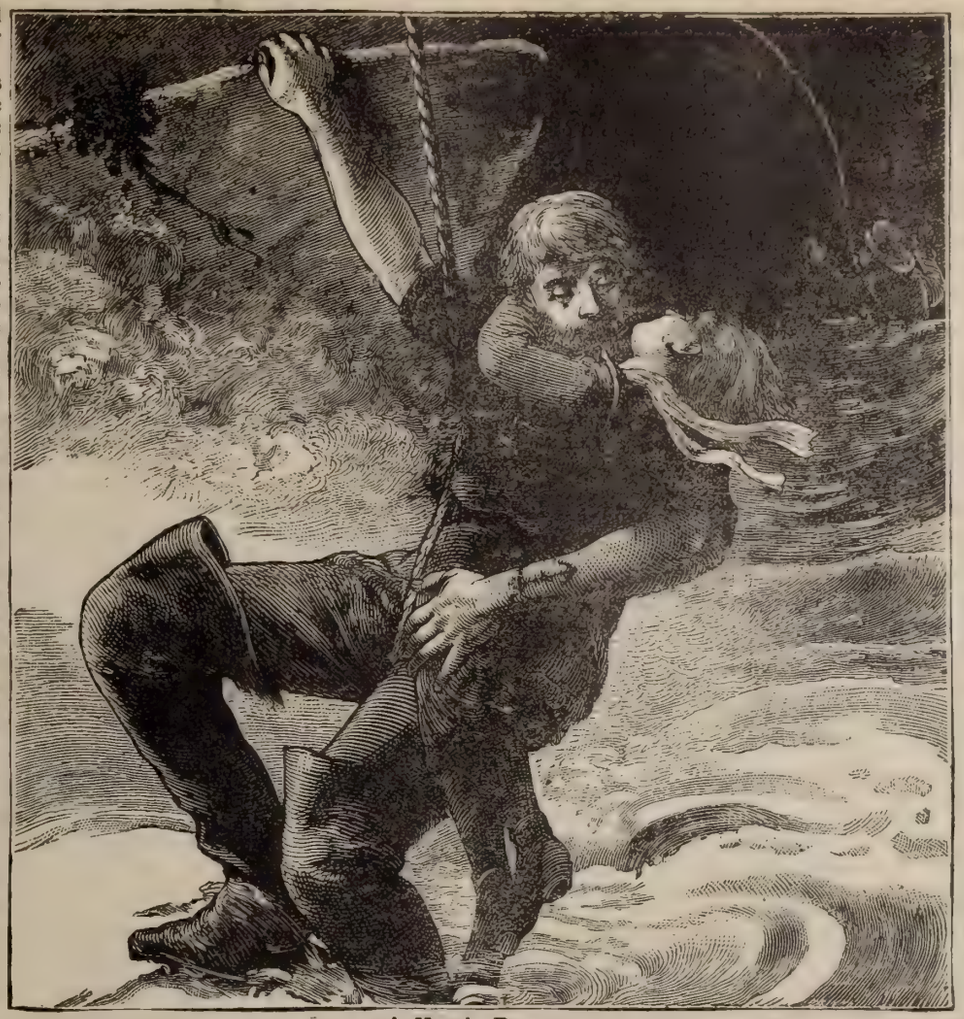
"Oh yes, they are in Wild Man's Cave; the tide fills that always."

"What can we do then? We will pay you well if you can save them."

"We weren't waiting for pay, sir," said one of the men. "We've sent one of the men for ropes, and two of us are going down to see what we can do. But it's a risky job. Here Bob comes with the ropes. Now we'll try."

Those two gentlemen thought that they lived hours during the next thirty minutes. The two daring men who were lowered by the ropes from the summit of the cliff were watched with anxious eyes, while prayers for their success went up from two hearts almost broken by suspense. At last the ropes hung loose, and in a minute there was a shout, and those at the top began to haul in. In a few minutes two boys were safely landed and the men again descended. Two more boys were brought up and only Frank remained. He was up to his waist in water the brave rescuers said, but he was holding firm. Down the heroic men went again and in a few moments the last of the boys was rescued.

Who can describe the joy of the two fathers as they clasped their sons in their arms! Or the gratitude of the mothers when they heard of it, to the noble men who had risked their lives for the boys. There was joy and gladness in the little boarding-house that night and heartfelt thanks to God for the preservation of the lives of the loved ones. There were prayers too that the lives saved might be consecrated to God, and that as they had been saved from death by the heroic rescuers.so they might be saved from eternal destruction through Him who gave His life for them.



A Heroic Rescue.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

An Involuntary Revelation.

ROBERT WALDRON shrank from hearing his father and sister inform the young minister what the disadvantages were, under which Hester had labored. Miss Waldron had alluded to them vaguely as having led in some measure to a state of mind which she regarded as peculiar. Miss Waldron would have been perfectly content with Hester's spiritual condition if the girl had been, like herself, self-satisfied and self-righteous. But Hester did not think that the little sect, of which she had just become a member, had a monopoly of the truth, or that its doctrines covered and explained all the mysteries of life. Miss Waldron knew exactly why some disaster had occurred. God had sent it in order that she and a few others might learn some particular lesson, but Hester thought of the poor sufferers and sympathized with those whom their death had bereaved, and was doubtful whether Miss Waldron and her friends were so capable as they supposed themselves of understanding and declaring the mind of the Infinite Ruler of the universe. Hester had not concealed her doubts, and Miss Waldron consequently entertained gloomy views about the girl's spiritual condition. But she wished to be charitable, and therefore made allowance for her on the ground of her disadvantages. But neither she nor Robert were prepared for Mr. Bramwell's inquiry as to the nature of those disadvantages. Robert would have had the crime and its consequences buried out of sight forever, but sin cannot be so buried, and Robert Waldron was finding out that those who sin must reap the harvest they sow. It was the chagrin with which the consciousness of the fact filled him, that prompted his brusque words to the young minister, who looked up at his livid angry face with astonishment.

Robert Waldron walked away without giving Carl time to answer; and Miss Waldron threw herself back in the chair, with her handkerchief to her eyes. Mr. Waldron, with an expression of shame and pain upon his face, was about to speak, when Carl interrupted him gently.

"I know it all," he said; "I knew it long before I had any thought of coming here. Grant wrote to me, and told me all he then knew, at the time he was attending Mr. Robert Waldron in Mr. Morley's house, about nine months ago."

Mr. Waldron regarded Carl with an air of profound astonishment, mingled with incredulity as to whether he had heard him aright; and Miss Waldron dropped her handkerchief and turned a bewildered gaze upon him.

"Attending my son in John Morley's house!" ejaculated Mr. Waldron; "what did you say, Mr. Bramwell?"

"It cannot be a secret to you," answered Carl, taken by surprise himself; "surely you knew it, Miss Waldron? Your brother was almost murdered at the door of Mr. Morley's house about nine months ago."

"Robert had an accident nine months ago," she said, "through which Mr. Grant nursed him; but it was at Beckbury, twenty miles from here."

"I have done wrong," cried Carl, with a look and tone of concern; "but it did not occur to me for an instant that you did not both know the facts. I knew that he wished the secret kept from the townspeople, which I very well understood. I beg of you not to betray my indiscretion to him. If you wish me to gain his esteem and friendship, it would only prejudice him against me."

He spoke with extreme earnestness, and addressed himself rather to Mr. Waldron than to his daughter. With her he felt sure that he was safe.

"But what is it?" asked Mr. Waldron, with impetuosity; "I must know the whole of it now. What did you say? Robert almost murdered at John Morley's door?"

Grant can tell you all about it," said Carl; "but if he will not, I will read his letter again, or put it into your hands, on condition that you do not betray either of us to your son. If I could see any good to result from letting him know of it, I would make no condition at all; but I do not."

"I will go and question Grant this moment!" exclaimed Mr. Waldron, hurrying away with more than ordinary energy, and leaving his daughter alone with Carl. There had been very much to excite and trouble her in the foregoing conversation; for Robert had already insinuated to her his own apprehensions relating to Carl and Hester. It had been done with caution and finesse, but there was a dread in the depths of her own heart with which it exactly coincided. It would be hard indeed if Carl were so soon to cease to belong exclusively to herself. He drew nearer to her, and appealed to her in a tone of earnest but deferential importunity.

"Mr. Watson committed Hester Morley to the care of Grant and myself," he said, "but what can we do for her? It is you, who are so good, and to whom the Master has intrusted so many talents, who should be the friend of this lonely girl. I do not know what calamity Mr. Watson feared for her, but there seemed some special dread about her future. What could I do to protect her from sorrow and danger? I will be indeed her friend, but you are wiser and better than I; a woman like herself, your heart has a purity and tenderness unknown to man. You will be her friend, even as you are already so generously and so nobly mine?"

He spoke with eloquent warmth, and approached her so closely that his hand nearly touched hers. There was a peculiar fascination about the mere presence of a young and pleasing woman, such as she appeared to him; and this morning he felt more than usual the need of a woman's gentle ministry to chase away the gloomy impressions of the night.

"Ah!" sobbed Miss Waldron, with very real and very bitter tears, "I am so much your friend that I tremble for you; so impulsive and so inexperienced as you are. I am older than you, and have seen much, both in the Church and the world. I foresee that you may attain to great eminence and usefulness; but a single false step at the outset of your career may become your ruin. Be warned in time. I am frank with you because I feel a great regard for you. Leave the charge of poor Hester Morley to me, and do not take too great an interest yourself in her welfare. She is young and foolish, and might draw you into a difficulty it would be hard to escape from."

Miss Waldron succeeded in pronouncing these sentences in a tone penetrated with candor and a deep concern in him. The hot quick blood of his sensitive nature had mounted to his face, and a spark of almost angry resentment had kindled in his eyes; but he could not steel himself against her agitation and tears. There was subtle, delicious flattery in this warm interest of a woman, his elder and superior, which compensated for the gall of the admonition. When she raised her eyes to him, sparkling through her tears, they met a glance in his which made her heart glow with a sensation altogether new to her. Her eyelids dropped, and her lips trembled; but she mastered her emotion sufficiently to resume the conversation in a somewhat lighter tone.

"I speak for your sake," she said. "Hester has a certain amount of beauty which would make it excusable for a man young as you are to be attracted by it. But I know of no one so unsuitable to become a prominent member of any Church, such as a minister's wife should be. Of course, some day you will fall in love and marry, but I trust not with Hester Morley. She is visionary and unsound in the faith; she is not to be trusted. There is not the spirit of the daily cross in her. Though she is in the Church, she belongs to the world. Her only friend is a frivolous Frenchwoman of the lower orders, a Papist, and Hester herself owns that she makes no effort to convert her. She says that she is too old for change, and too dark to understand our pure and lofty creed. I shall insist, some day, upon bearing the bread of life to this famishing soul; for Hester, who sees her frequently, does not feed her with a single crumb. You can judge how unfit she is for a post of honor in the vineyard. Therefore I warn you beforehand. 'As a jewel of gold in a swine's snout, so is a fair woman which is without discretion.'"

With this harsh quotation hurled at Hester, Miss Waldron concluded her admonition, and Carl remained silent. Seeing the impression she had produced, she recommended him, with an air of sisterly sweetness, to seek some repose before entering on the necessary preparations for the services of his first Sunday as pastor of the church. Carl obeyed with alacrity, and shut himself up in his own room for the rest of the morning.

In the mean time Mr. Waldron was hastening with all speed to find Grant, before he left his lodgings to make his morning call upon his patients, whose number was increasing with fair rapidity under the prestige of Mr. Waldron's patronage. He burst upon him just as he was preparing to go out, and lost no time in beating about the bush. As a statesman Mr. Waldron had known no tactics, except that of asking straightforward and pungent questions; and he tried no other means now. Grant was as frank as himself; and having a greater respect for him than for his son, and being rather glad at Carl's inadvertence, he soon put Mr. Waldron into possession of all the facts he knew.

"But what rancor there must be in John Morley's soul!" cried Mr. Waldron, sinking into a chair and resting both his hands upon the arms of it. "I can barely credit it, Grant. Were you convinced then, both of you, that he, and nobody else, could have struck the blow!"

"Is there any other man who owes him such a grudge?" asked Grant, bluntly.

"Oh, I don't know," he answered, in accents almost peevish, and with a gesture as if he would have nothing to do with it. "My son has wounded me to the very quick; and I have ceased to seek out his faults. He will have to bear the consequences himself, here and hereafter."

His upright head sank a little on his breast; and his eyes, bright and undimmed still, met Grant's regard ruthfully.

"You are too hard upon him," said Grant with an honest plainness which was as honey to Mr. Waldron. "I would stake my head that this is the only folly of which he has been guilty; and he was little more than a boy when he fell into it. He was four years younger than I am; and, dear me! what I might have done if I'd been rich and idle, and an only son, like him!"

Mr. Waldron breathed more calmly, and the rigid muscles about his mouth relaxed into the expression which generally served him as a smile. But his mind recurred to John Morley.

"Yet how could you account for him taking you into his own house?" he asked.

"He could do nothing else," answered Grant. "I walked into the nearest house with your son in my arms, and Hester had let me in before he knew anything of it. To screen himself he was obliged to let us remain. Neither of us believe that he had any previous design to attack him; but seeing him sauntering about the street which he was forbidden to enter, John Morley was overcome by a sudden access of revenge and passion. A blow struck more warily must have killed him; half an inch, ay, the tenth of an inch would have done it."

"But what weapon did he use?" asked Mr. Waldron, shuddering.

"Some days afterward," he replied, "I saw in his workshop several iron bars, from a foot and a half to four feet in length. They are used for screwing up the binding-presses. If one of these happened to be at hand it would form a very likely weapon."

"I am afraid it must be true," said Mr. Waldron.

"I am sure of it," replied Grant.

"But, how then?" he exclaimed, "you choose this man for your friend, you visit him daily, believing him all the while to be a murderer!"

"No more a murderer than you or I," said Grant, calmly. "I have studied John Morley; he is as soft-hearted as a woman, always apt to be overwhelmed by the sin and misery of the world. To him there must be a constant pressure of despair from the thought of the sin and misery of the wife he has loved and lost. If he knew for certain that she was dead, half his burden would fall off. When he saw your son, a frenzy seized him, and I do not wonder at the blow he struck. In many countries it would pass for a virtue rather than a crime."

"But he is a member of the church," said Mr. Waldron, "and attends the means of grace."

"Just now," answered Grant, "a long walk every day would be the best means of grace for him, and it would do him more good to be a member of the Alpine Club. The truth is, he is crusted over with morbid melancholy amounting to monomania. Why, I should commit a score of murders if I lived, as he does, in the eternal gloom of that house! So would you, Mr. Waldron."

"Hush! there he is," cried Mr. Waldron.

In a window nearly opposite them could be seen the head of John Morley set in the blackened and decayed frame of the casement. He stood motionless, looking upward with blank eyes which evidently saw nothing. The deep lines in his face seemed more furrowed than ever, and his whole aspect was one of grim and perpetual hopelessness. He glanced round once, and his eyes appeared to sweep the full range of their sight as if searching for some object which he had lost, but which he had long since despaired of finding. Mr. Waldron watched him with painful and contending emotions.

"Grant," he said, "I'd give him half my possessions if they would do him any good. Yet he almost killed my son, my only boy! I feel nearer hating him than I ever felt toward any man. You do not know how a father feels! Why, it was only last night I shook the hand that had been raised against my boy's life! I hope I am a Christian. God deliver me in His abundant grace from the devil! But to think what it would have been if Robert had been murdered, and I had never heard him speak again. He was such a good boy once, Grant; a good, affectionate, conscientious boy was my Robert. Bob I called him then. And that man yonder had nearly killed him! I wish he would take half my fortune, and go away out of the country. But to-morrow I shall see him at chapel, and next week he will stand beside me at the grave of our old pastor. I had better go home and think it all over quietly by myself; and may God give me grace to prove myself a true Christian."

He wrung Grant's hand convulsively, and took a last furtive glance at the gray, despairing face in the window opposite. Then he retraced his steps homeward, and, like Carl Bramwell, shut himself up in his room alone to think over the discovery of John Morley's crime and Robert's danger.

Miss Waldron took care that Carl should have no opportunity of seeing Hester again until some of the excitement of his new position had worn off, and until she had established a stronger influence over him. It was astonishing how great an effect her clever platitudes had upon him. She possessed the art of investing commonplace observations with a seeming profundity which might easily have imposed upon an older man than Carl; while at the same time she surrounded him with those thousand minute delicate attentions which lie only in the power of a woman. Once or twice she drove with him to John Morley's house, and waited in the carriage at the door while he made a pastoral call; by which means she insured an extreme brevity of visit, and had the satisfaction of learning that Hester had not made her appearance.

How long she could have maintained this careful line of conduct is uncertain, if Grant had not been impatient to introduce Carl more familiarly to John Morley; and he took the first chance that presented itself. Carl naturally chose to see a good deal of his future brother-in-law; and though Grant was made welcome at Aston Court by all, even by Miss Waldron, who was fully awake to this weak point in her position, yet she could not forbid the young minister visiting him in his own rooms. A favorable opportunity occurred before long, when Grant invited him, without formality, to call upon John Morley.

"I want you, if possible, to infuse a little hope into his nature," said Grant; "and then, if I could induce him to shut up shop an hour earlier and take some healthy exercise, we should make him a tenfold better Christian than he is. Don't you agree with me?"

"To be sure I do," answered Carl.

"Miss Waldron wouldn't," said Grant, laughing; "but it stands to sense that when a poor fellow's liver is as bad as a liver can be, he cannot be as good a Christian as he ought to be. I'll make you see that as plain as print, Carl, if you will only attend."

"Hadn't we better see Mr. Morley first?" suggested Carl.

"Well, I'm ready," he answered. "I don't need a hat just to cross the street. There, a customer has gone in—a rare bird opposite—but if you like we will go and see Hester first. I am quite at home over yonder." And he proved the truth of his words by entering the house without knocking at the door.

S. S. Lesson for July 13, II Sam. 6 : 1–12. Golden Text, Prov. 3 : 33. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

David's Good Intention—The Counsel of God not Asked—A Mistake in Methods—The Cart Instead of the Shoulder—A Heathen Example—Worldly Methods in Christian Work—Uzzah's Officious Interference—Terribly Rebuked—Unnecessary Concern for God's Glory—God will Undertake—The Ark in the House—Formal Prayers—The Blessing on the House—Joy in Restored Communion.

WHEN David was established upon the throne, one of his first thoughts was to bring back the ark of God. But in this he did not seek to know God's mind. It is frequently the case that a child of God who seeks counsel from Him for all other things, yet fails to do so concerning anything which is in itself a positive duty, and undoubtedly right to do. What could be more laudable than to bring back the ark of God, the glory of the people of the Lord, and the visible token of His presence? Yet David, though he gathered together all the chosen men of Israel, did not, as was his wont, inquire of the Lord.

Everything looked propitious. "David arose, and went with all the people that were with him from Baale of Judah, to bring up from thence the ark of God, whose name is called by the name of the Lord of hosts that dwelleth between the cherubims." No doubt David and the people thought they were doing the best thing possible, but they did it in their own way instead of in the Lord's way. "They set the ark of God upon a new cart." This was just what the Philistines had done when they sent away the ark of God (I Sam. 6 : 7). The Lord's will was quite another; He had "separated the tribe of Levi to bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord" (Deut 10 : 8), and they were to bear it "upon their shoulders" (Num. 7 : 9). David was doing a right thing in a wrong way. Very often the Lord has to teach His children not only to do what is right, but to do it in the way He has directed.

was an imitation of the heathen. There are many new carts in our outward worship as well as in our family prayer. Everything which gathers together all human resources resembles this "new cart;" it is a going down to Egypt for help. Various attractions or eloquent appeals to get money, for however laudable an object, savor more of the "new cart" than of the priestly heart and shoulder which carries the witness of a present God. These long prayers and got-up sermons, this gorgeous ritual, all speak more of the "new cart" than of the Christ-life. Even among earnest working Christians there is a great deal of going down to Egypt for help. How often we hear it said, "We have got into a dead state in this town; we must send for such and such a popular preacher to give us a lift," instead of going directly to the Lord in priestly intercession to learn the secret of never getting into a dead state. God wants nothing to come between His Levites and the ark. He wants us to be in very deed temples of the Holy Ghost and Christ bearers.

Uzzah and Ahio, sons of the high priest Abinadab, "drave the new cart." It might seem as though David, in his zeal, had gone beyond the commandment of the Lord in bringing priests, and not merely Levites, into the service; but all was done according to man's idea, and not God's. There was great rejoicing: "Ahio went before the ark, and David and all the house of Israel played before the Lord on all manner of instruments made of fir wood, even on harps and on psalteries, and on timbrels, and on cornets, and on cymbals." All the appearance was that of the greatest devotion; they could not well have done more; but nevertheless it was not according to the mind of God, and He could not let it prosper. When they came to Nachon's threshing-floor, Uzzah put forth his hand to the ark of God and took hold of it, for the oxen shook it. And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Uzzah; and God smote him there for his error; and there he died by the ark of God." At first sight this would appear a very great judgment for a very little sin, and one altogether unintentional. But it was the duty of the priests

TO ASCERTAIN THE MIND OF GOD.

They had the book of the law within the ark, which had been twenty years in Abinadab's house, and consequently there was no excuse for their ignorance of God's will. Uzzah too, in seeking to steady the ark, was acting as though God could not take care of His own ark, the token of His covenant with Israel. Uzzah was superintending God, and stepping altogether out of his place. Is not this the sin which we commit when we are filled with anxiety for the honor of God, as though we cared more for it than He? There are some Christians who, when they or their efforts are attacked, misconstrued, and misrepresented, undertake to justify themselves and explain matters, saying they do it for the glory of God, to vindicate His honor. God is infinitely more capable of caring for His own honor than we are. We are very poor apologists for God; and very often Christians who thus attempt to steady the ark and support the cause of God by their arguments, lose their own spirituality in so doing. It becomes us to be ready, willing, intelligent instruments in the hands of God, but never masters of the situation. God is King, God is responsible; give Him His place.

David was displeased because the Lord had made a breach upon Uzzah; he lost patience with God, and got fairly out of temper. He had gone forth with the best intentions, put himself to a great deal of trouble and expense; his whole soul was in the cause, and it did seem too bad that God should appreciate so poorly the sacrifice he had made. David had yet to learn that "to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of lambs" (I Sam. 15 : 22). Zeal may exist with a very large amount of self; there may be devotion even to the giving our body to be burned, and yet we may be in God's sight nothing at all, because we are carrying out which do not accomplish His purposes. We exist for God, not God for us. When an earnest, zealous child of God sets himself to fasting and prayer for some spiritual blessing—the baptism of the Holy Ghost, for instance—and wears himself out in his zeal; is he in this way advancing the cause of God? Any one who knows him intimately may admire, and seek to imitate, his zeal, but does not feel drawn by it to trust in God, who seems to be so chary of His gifts as to keep such an earnest child of His so long waiting. Let another child of God be awakened to his need of the Holy Ghost as an indwelling Person. He reads: "If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more will your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him?" (Luke 11 : 13). "Be filled with the Spirit" (Eph. 5 : 18). "Receive ye the Holy Ghost" (John 20 : 22); and the glad consciousness dawns upon him, "It is the Lord's will more than mine." He takes the gift with joy and gladness, and tells others of the unspeakable goodness of his God. In the one case the devotion of the man is noticeable, in the other it is the goodness of the Lord.

David was so displeased with God that he would not carry the ark of God into the city of David, but placed it in the house of Obededom the Gittite. "And the ark of God continued in the house of Obededom the Gittite three months: and the Lord blessed Obededom and all his house." It is a blessed thing to have the ark of God in our house; a blessed thing to have Jesus dwelling there, the evidence that God is keeping covenant with us. Many speak of family prayer as having the ark in the house; it is truly one little evidence of it. It is a blessed thing when the father of a family takes the Word of God and brings out of it by the Spirit the message of God for his family on that day. Or when the father is absent, it is blessed that the mother should do the same thing, and then that prayer should follow—father, mother, children, servants, all speaking out of their hearts to the Lord. It is blessed when they all praise Him for blessings received, and each one brings personals needs to Him for the business, the housekeeping, the children, the lessons, the housework. In such a family there is evidence indeed that the ark is with them. But formality in family prayer is a great of the things of God among children and servants. In household worship as in public worship there is far too much of putting our hands to the ark of the Lord. A lady who only recently came into deep spiritual blessing writes that at family prayer she first, then all the children and governess and servants follow, and already the dear children are registering the answer to their prayers. Children are far more real in prayer than many grown-up people, they believe so fully that God does hear.

A LITTLE GIRL,

speaking of Rev. 8 : 1–3, said, "God said to the angels in heaven, Hush, and they heard a little sound; it was me, praying."

David was not above

LEARNING THE LESSON

God would teach him. When he heard how God had blessed the house of Obededom and all that pertained to him because of the ark of God, he "went and brought up the ark of God from the house of Obededom into the city of David with gladness." This time he carried out the thoughts of God. He said, "None ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites: for them hath the Lord chosen to carry the ark of God, and to minister unto Him for ever" (I Ch. 15 : 2). Then he called upon the priests to sanctify themselves, and said, "For because ye did it not at the first, the Lord our God made a breach upon us, for that we sought Him not in due order." And God helped the Levites that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord (I Ch. 15 : 13, 26), and when they had gone six paces, David sacrificed oxen and fatlings." Thus we hear no more of the new cart; the ark was borne by God's chosen bearers, the Levites, and David was occupied in offering sacrifices of thanksgiving.

And David danced before the Lord with all his might; his communion was restored, his vexation ended. When the ark was brought into the city of David and placed in the tent that David had pitched for it, then David sacrificed burnt offerings and peace offerings, and then he blessed the people in the name of the Lord. He was not in a position to bless them while he was making devotion a substitute for obedience. But now that he himself was blessed, he could bless others also. Indeed his wife despised him in her heart; but David was not occupied with his own glory, but with the Lord's, and he could not be hindered by this; now he saw things in the light of God, and his heart was full of joy and gladness.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The International Conference on Egyptian affairs assembled in London on Saturday last. The envoys present represented France, Germany, Austria, Italy, Turkey, and England. They handed in their credentials, and then adjourned for a week or ten days, during which time informal conversations will take place and they will consult their respective governments on the suggestions made. The understanding between England and France, as far as its terms have been disclosed, is that England shall withdraw her troops from Egypt at the beginning of the year 1888 in case the Powers shall consider such withdrawal possible without endangering the public order. The French financial bureau after 1885 will have a consultative voice in regard to the Egyptian budget, and will have the right to veto any increase of expenses on the part of the government. It shall continue to exercise the right of financial inspection after the evacuation of the country by the English in order to insure the complete and regular collection of the revenue. England also undertakes during her occupation to propound schemes to the Porte and the Powers for the neutralization of Egypt, like Belgium, and for the neutralization of the Suez Canal. This practically concedes all the French demands. Mr. Gladstone's opponents contend that he has sacrificed English blood and treasure in Egypt, and is now surrendering the fruit of all the effort to France.

The Death of the Prince of Orange, who was heir to the throne of Holland, adds another to the list of burning questions now agitating Europe. The present king, who is over seventy years of age, has no other son to inherit the crown, and as he is in infirm health his death may be looked for in the near future. The Dutch burghers are, it appears, opposed to living under the rule of a queen, and Prince Bismarck is suspected of having fomented their objections with the view of making German interests paramount in the little kingdom. Should the young Princess Wilhelmina be proclaimed queen on the death of the king, a regency would be required, as she is only four years old. Efforts are being made to have a German relative made a member of the Council of Regency, but the Dutch are alarmed at the interest displayed by their powerful neighbor, and will resist the appointment. The question is a delicate one, and France and other powers are showing a lively interest in it, moved by apprehension lest Germany, who has long coveted Holland, should secure it by intrigue or by force. A king, however, is by no means indispensable to a nation. The Dutch could live under a Republic.

A New Franco-Chinese Complication has arisen out of an attack on the French troops in Tonquin. Four thousand Chinese regulars, who were provided with artillery, had intrenched themselves at Langson, in violation of the treaty, and attacked the French forces on June 23d as they were on the march, killing seven and wounding forty-two. The violation of the treaty has caused a heated agitation among the war party in France, and although China disavows responsibility for the attack, the most violent schemes of reprisal are urged upon the French Government. One proposal is that the French fleet should bombard Canton. A more thrifty proposition is that France should seize a portion of the territory of China proper and hold it as a hostage until an indemnity of, say, 400,000,000 francs be paid. The French Government will, it is expected, accept the explanation of China and soothe the angry feelings of their own people.

The Extension of the Franchise to Agricultural laborers in England and Ireland has been granted by the House of Commons, and the bill has been sent to the House of Lords, where it passed its first reading. Rumors that it would be rejected at its second reading were current before it left the House of Commons. They prompted Mr. Gladstone to make a speech, which is regarded as a menace to the peers. The government, he said, had tried its best to avoid a conflict with the House of Lords, but should a conflict arise, while he would greatly regret it, he had no doubt of the issue. The Conservative leader said Mr. Gladstone's speech was not a speech on the Franchise Bill, but on the question whether the House of Lords should any longer form a part of the legislature of the country. He protested with unwonted vigor against the pretension of requiring the Lords to forego their constitutional right of independent judgment on a measure sent up to them in obedience to the dictation of an imperious Prime Minister. He closed by affirming in solemn tones that Mr. Gladstone's was the most serious declaration that a Minister of the Crown had ever made, or the House of Commons had ever heard. If the Lords reject the bill, as it now seems probable they will, a constitutional crisis will be precipitated which will cause a serious agitation in the country.

An Outbreak of Asiatic Cholera is Reported from Toulon, one of the chief naval stations of France. It is near Marseilles, and is the site of the largest dockyards in the country. The disease has been unusually fatal, some of the victims dying in an hour after their seizure. A panic prevailed in the town when the facts were made known, and all who could leave it did so. The government ordered the evacuation of the barracks. The dead were not allowed to be carried to the cemeteries, but were buried in trenches dug for the purpose and covered with quick-lime. A cable message dated Toulon, June 27th, says: "The city presents a strange sight. Fires are burning in the streets for purifying purposes. A post-mortem examination of two bodies has been made. In each case there were signs of Asiatic cholera." Precautions of a stringent character are being taken to prevent the disease spreading to other cities.

The Boers of the Transvaal are again the object of European concern, caused by the visit to the various capitals of M. Kruger, the President of the Transvaal Republic. Mr. Kruger, who arrived at the head of a delegation from the Boer Congress, has been making official calls upon European statesmen. He informed the Sun's correspondent that his European tour had been successful. He had arranged satisfactory treaties with England, France, Germany, and other powers, and had secured terms which, he believed, guaranteed the material prosperity of the Transvaal in the future. He was especially touched by the cordiality of his reception in Berlin. Even the missionaries and the mission societies there were effusive in their welcome and friendship for the Boer delegates. President Kruger believed that the disorders in Zululand, which had all been caused by the officious intermeddling of England, would soon be at an end, and announced that the Boers were determined to maintain the new King, Dinizulu, on the throne of his father, Cetewayo.

Renewed Anti-Jewish Disturbances are Reported from Russia. A cable message from St. Petersburg states that on June 19th a rumor was started in Nizhne Novgorod to the effect that a Jew had kidnapped a Christian child and taken it to a synagogue. A mob quickly collected and attacked the synagogue where the child was supposed to be. Many of the Jews were harshly handled, and nine were killed. Six houses belonging to Jews were wrecked, and many were plundered. A large force of police and a detachment of Cossack infantry succeeded at last in restoring order. One hundred and fifty arrests were made.

Mr. Moody Closed his London Mission on Monday, June 23d, with a large reunion at Temple Hall. The young converts and workers and many leading clergymen were present at the meeting. It was resolved to send a cable message to Mr. Sankey, tendering him a greeting. Mr. Moody made a long farewell address, in which he urged his hearers to become systematic and thorough students of the Bible. He closed with words of blessing, and expressed the deepest emotion. The majority of the audience were moved to tears. The hall was beautifully decorated with choice flowers. Work has been done in eleven districts, and over four hundred meetings have been held. Mr. Moody was absent only one day during the whole season, and that was owing to illness. He estimates that more than 1,500,000 persons were present at the services. All classes of society have been reached and influenced. Peers and paupers have sat side by side drinking in the same message of salvation. The number of persons converted will reach into the thousands. Among them were several pronounced skeptics. Six male choirs and six Mizpah bands of reformed drunkards have been organized. Two large halls are now in process of building at Stratford and Wandsworth to continue the good work begun there, and one of the iron halls has been bought for the use of the Salvation Army.

The Third Pan Presbyterian Council or Presbyterian Alliance assembled in Belfast, Ireland, on June 24th. It comprises delegates from the Presbyterian churches all over the world. At the opening of the council St. Enoch's Church, in which it met, was thronged with a vast assembly of people. The opening sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Watts, chairman of the General Committee. On the following day a committee from the Methodist Conference was admitted into the Alliance amid great enthusiasm. Dr. Croke read a congratulatory address to the Presbyterian Council, in which he said the conference recognized the firm stand the Presbyterian Church has ever taken against Popery and other errors. On Friday Dr. McVicar, of Montreal, read a report in relation to his church, and made application for admission into the Council. It was decided by a vote of one hundred and twelve to seventy-four to admit the Cumberland Church into the Council.

A New Mission Station in Paris has been opened by Mr. McAll. It is called "the Baltimore Station," as its entire cost has been provided by the Baltimore Association in America, which has also guaranteed its support. The room is situated in the very centre of Parisian gayety, near the Park of St. Denis. Behind the principal hall are several rooms, which can be used for prayer-meetings, etc. The hall is approached from the great Boulevard by a very wide and lofty corridor; over the front entrance the word "Conference" appears in gas, and on the inner doors is written "Salle Baltimore." The Rev. A. F. Beard, D.D., of the American Union Chapel in Paris, assisted at the opening ceremonies.

"Thy Healer," A New Magazine Devoted to the subject of faith-healing, may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price five cents, including postage. It is issued in London on the first and fifteenth of each month, and will be sent to subscribers promptly on its receipt in New York. The annual subscription is one dollar. It is *edited by Mrs. M. The Late Captain W. ROBINSON, a Pioneer of Christianity in Fernando Po—Scenes in his Life.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM ROBINSON,

The Christian Mariner.

Birth in 1817—His Early Passion for the Sea—Sent as Cabin-Boy to Quebec—Life on Board Ship—Apprenticed—His First Voyage to Africa—A Remarkable Dream of the Last Day—Conversion—Wonderful Escape from Drowning—Raised to the Position of Captain—Wrecked—Gunpowder Ignited by Lightning—His Son Murdered by a Negro—Christian Work with his Carpenter—At Fernando Po—Death and Burial of the Captain at Sea.

A STRIKING illustration of the fact that God is ready to honor the efforts of Christians of any calling who sincerely seek to serve Him, is furnished by the story of the life of a pious sailor, recently published. It contains a rebuke to unfaithful Christians who are content to leave the Lord's work to His ministers and let opportunities of serving Him pass them unused. The life of Captain Robinson is one so full of incident and adventure that it cannot fail to interest all who read it.

William Robinson, whose portrait appears on our front page, was born in Aldgate, London, on April 17th, 1817, and died on August 10th, 1872, at the age of fifty-five, after having borne an important part in establishing the valuable mission at Fernando Po, on the West Coast of Africa, and not far from the Cameroons, the scene of the labors of the heroic Baptist missionary, Alfred Saker, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 26th.

William's father, when a youth, settled in Philadelphia, Pa., with the view of becoming a surgeon ; but, having no taste for the profession, he became a carpenter, and acquired moderate wealth. His abolitionist principles, however, made him unpopular, and he ultimately decided on quitting the country.

Having disposed of his property somewhat hurriedly, he eventually landed in London, having in his possession about $5000. He unwisely deposited this money, without security, in the hands of a friend, while he paid a visit to his native city of Glasgow. On returning to London he applied to his friend for his money, but could not get it. He was put off with one excuse or other until he gave up the attempt to recover it. A series of misfortunes followed ; and while his faithless friend began to exhibit signs of increasing wealth, Mr. Robinson became poor.

William, his son, in a few years from his birth became a dark-complexioned, robust youth, with a lively, jovial disposition. His school days were few, and his youthful education scant in quality and quantity. Being much in company with his father at the London Docks, he early conceived a passion for the sea. He determined upon becoming a sailor, but his parents, knowing more of sailor life than he, tried to dissuade him from his purpose. At length, finding his desire continued, they yielded to his wishes, and sent him to sea, hoping the first long voyage would bring him to a different mood of mind. They placed him in the hands of a captain who proved to be a morose man and sent him

AS CABIN-BOY TO QUEBEC.

Young Robinson, though enamored with a "life on the ocean wave," had little sympathy with many of the sailors' habits. From his earliest days he had apparently been the subject of religious influences. His parents showed him an example worthy his imitation. He seems, moreover, to have had early inclinations for the house of God and religious society. In short, he gave signs of being a Christian from his youth. But as he emerged from boyhood the early impressions faded, and the youth showed less inclination for spiritual things.

Before reaching the end of his first voyage he became home-sick, and longed for the time when he should again reach his native land. The charming ideas he had conjured up of the delights of a sailor's life had to give place to new ones not so charming, the result of actual of scoldings and floggings, administered without justice or mercy. On his return from Quebec he would have abandoned the sea, but the thought of being called a coward braced his nerves and fired his heart with renewed courage. To make the impression that he was not so chicken-hearted as some anticipated, he frequently laughed over his troubles, and told romantic tales of what he had seen and done.

In 1829 he was apprenticed to Captain Walker, of Sunderland, on board the ship, Valiant. This vessel was engaged in a rough-coasting trade, and the youth's first journey as an apprentice was to Ostend, in Flanders. His second was from London to Cronstadt, in Russia. Soon after returning from this voyage his father died suddenly on the docks, of apoplexy.

Robinson was released from his apprenticeship at the age of eighteen, and joining another ship, he set sail on his

FIRST VOYAGE TO AFRICA.

Returning from this trip, in 1835, he shipped for Van Diemen's Land. All went pleasantly until they reached Cape de Verde Island. But there a dispute arose between the captain and one of the sailors. A struggle ensued, in which another sailor, who went to the assistance of the first, was wounded, and there were symptoms of a general mutiny, which, however, was averted.

From the age of twenty to twenty-six, Mr. Robinson made several journeys to Sierra Leone, Quebec, and Jamaica. In after years he was fond of relating of the Last Day he once had on the way from Sierra Leone. He says : "It is always uppermost in my mind. I thought it was night ; and I awoke and saw a white place in the clouds, and it descended toward the earth. A voice which made my ears tingle shouted aloud 'The Last Day! The Last Day!' I then saw the cloud form itself into a large tent upon the earth. I walked toward it with a very sorrowful heart, the sound still ringing in my ear, 'The Last Day!' I saw numbers of people running to and fro ; but I did not heed them. In the tent I saw three remarkable persons—the One in the centre was like the Saviour, as represented in Gethsemane, with a nimbus of glory round His head. Those on the right and left I knew not.

"I then thought that Christ and the two with Him began to call the inhabitants of the world by their names alphabetically. I began to think, ere my turn came, I should have time to repent and prepare myself. I thought I looked into the place where the wicked entered, and I saw a deep pit ; the smell which came from it was very disagreeable. I therefore came away from it. I then thought I saw a number of people from all parts of the earth. All was in darkness outside the tent—no one spoke ; every one seemed to commune with his own thoughts. Then I awoke with serious impressions upon my memory."

The next voyage after this dream, Robinson was the subject of deep religious convictions and pious resolves, and it is believed he then gave himself to Christ as his Saviour. In company with the mate and a Christian youth fresh from the home of his godly parents, he frequently spent his spare time in singing hymns ; and as often as possible he retired to pray in private. On the homeward journey a terrible storm arose ; the ship sprung a leak, and all hope of saving her was abandoned. Mr. Robinson wrote that he then felt "if they had gone down into the deep, his spirit would have gone up on high." They were, however, preserved, and made the remainder of the voyage in safety. A singular about that time powerfully affected him. While on the coast of Jamaica, in 1839, he and a lad were sent ashore in a small boat for a hogshead of sugar. On returning, they encountered a heavy sea, and their boat filled with water, and sank. Fortunately, the sea was comparatively shallow at that particular spot, and their boat stood upright, with the mast-head projecting out of the water. Both William and the lad held on to the mast as best they could, and prayed and hoped for help. After waiting in dreadful suspense for a considerable time, they were cheered by the appearance of a boat, apparently approaching them. Their hopes of relief from this quarter were doomed to bitter disappointment, as the expected deliverer passed them unheeded, though they shouted lustily for help. Their hearts sank within them, and they gave themselves up to die. A boat from their own ship at last came to their rescue. (See frontispiece picture.) The mast to which they clung was broken shortly after, and a shark was seen close at hand. While hanging shivering by that feeble mast, and battling with the waves for his life, William repented most bitterly of his sins, and promised if delivered that he would give himself to Christ as his Saviour, and live for Him, which he subsequently did.

In the twenty-ninth year of his age he was

and its responsible duties were undertaken by him with fear and trembling. His first journey as captain was made in the Clyde, to the West Coast of Africa, in 1846. In November, 1850, he started the third time for Africa in the Clyde. Being heavily laden, he feared disaster, but put to sea, hoping for the best. When out at sea a hurricane arose, and for three days and nights the crew bravely struggled with it, expecting all the time to go down. A schooner passing just in time Captain Robinson and his men were taken on board, and almost immediately

THEIR SHIP FOUNDERED.

In 1857 the captain began dealing somewhat extensively in gunpowder, in the Brass River. One day he obtained permission to land about 150 barrels of this explosive material on the beach ; at the same time retaining in his vessel about 200 barrels. While he was engaged in the transfer a terrific tropical thunder-storm commenced. The lightning flashed vividly, and the deafening thunder roared its awful peals continuously. About one o'clock a loud peal of thunder was followed by another noise like an explosion, and immediately the ship Severn, which Mr. Robinson now commanded, was so shaken that the hatches flew up. The captain, who was just recovering from fever, was standing at his cabin door (see frontispiece), and seeing everything displaced and shaken, and the hatches off, he thought the lightning had surely got to the powder on board. He stood for a moment almost paralyzed, waiting with bated breath to be blown to atoms. Finding his fears groundless, with a long-drawn sigh of relief, he exclaimed, "Thank God ! it has missed the powder." The beach presented a scene of ruin and desolation, for the electric spark had fallen into the stores, ignited the powder, and blown a number of buildings into shapeless ruins; and others, not blown away, were wrapped in flames. Again he had narrowly escaped death, and again he offered to God sincere thanks for his deliverance.

In November, 1861, Captain Robinson took charge of the schooner Margaret to proceed to the coast of South Africa. He signed articles, and was ready to sail, having his son with him, when a mail steamship arrived from that coast, bringing, among its passengers, a distressed captain, who had lost his ship in the river Congo. The captain was anxious to obtain employment, and the owners of the Margaret hearing of his arrival, and knowing his intimate knowledge of the coast, induced Captain Robinson to surrender the command to him, which he did, and he was transferred to the Empress. Thinking the voyage to the South would be an advantage to his son, he allowed him to remain in the Margaret.

MURDER ON SHIPBOARD.

Under his new captain the son William left the Liverpool Docks in excellent spirits, and started joyously upon his voyage. He was a promising youth, and the pride of his fond parents. Like his father he was industrious, kind, and obliging, and soon stood high in the estimation of his captain and shipmates. On board the Margaret, sailing out from Liverpool, there was a native of Rabenda, a colored man. It was November 29th, 1861. The day was exceedingly fine, and young Robinson was standing at the wheel, the captain and his men being in the hold, attending to some duty there. Suddenly, as though a demon had taken possession of him, the negro of Rabenda rushed like a maniac upon the lad, and with a long knife which he had concealed, cut and slashed at him. Young Robinson struggled with his dusky assailant, but being no match for him in strength, was soon stabbed and hacked to death. (See frontispiece.) After the fatal deed the frantic man jumped overboard, and was seen no more. He is supposed to have cherished revenge through being previously reprimanded.

All possible means were tried to save the life of young Robinson, but without avail. As the shadows of death gathered around the murdered lad, the captain said to him, "Have you anything to say to your father or mother, William?" "Oh yes, captain," was the faint reply, "but I have not time. Kiss me, captain, and read the Bible, and pray for me." This done, while the rough crew stood around, many of them weeping, the promising Christian youth breathed his life away, faintly but earnestly praying,

"OH, DEAR JESUS, RECEIVE MY SOUL."

From this time forth Captain Robinson's Christian life became more earnest and his desire to work for God more intense. It seemed that his bereavement had drawn him closer to God and convinced him that true joy and blessedness were to be obtained only in Christian service. Whenever he had opportunity he sought to win souls for his Master, and he was encouraged by seeing fruit of his labors. Of the sailors who shipped under him several were saved through the blessing of God on his appeals, and he never ceased to urge any unconverted man on his vessel to seek salvation through Jesus.

WORK ON THE AFRICAN COAST

was, however, his favorite sphere. His voyages continued to that part of the world, and the whole of the time his ship was there discharging her cargo and receiving a new one, Captain Robinson spent, when not in engaged in the ship's duties, in Christian work among the natives. In June, 1869, he was at Fernando Po, in charge of the sailing vessel Elgiva. The ship would have to remain there some time, and at the first opportunity the captain went ashore to hold a Christian service. He took with him the carpenter of the ship, a man of sterling piety, with rude eloquence, and possessed of a sweet and powerful voice. The natives with whom the captain traded were persuaded to come together, and a service was held. The next day they brought others, and the captain and the carpenter had the privilege of addressing a congregation of over a hundred persons. (See frontispiece.)

The services were continued at Fernando Po, and were much blessed. Among the converts were several members of the crews of other ships in the harbor, who were attracted by the preaching and singing. The island was in absolute spiritual darkness, for although the Baptist Missionary Society had once placed a missionary there, he had been forced to leave. All the time the Elgiva remained there the services were kept up, and the interest and numbers increased. On his return home Captain Robinson proceeded at once to narrate the blessed results of his effort to the missionary societies, and at length the Primitive Methodist Society offered to take charge of the work. There is now no more promising and prosperous station on the Western Coast of Africa than the one which has grown from the seed sown by the merchant captain and Hands, the carpenter.

It was only three years longer that the Christian captain was permitted to work for Christ on earth. In August, 1872, he was making the homeward voyage from Sierra Leone, and was about half way home when he was seized with sudden and alarming illness. For a few days he suffered excruciating pain, which no physician was at hand to relieve. At length death came to his relief. He died August 10th. His body was committed to the deep by his officers and crew to await the day when the sea shall give up her dead.

IN THE WRONG BOX.

UP-HILL WORK.

AFTER Jacob had signed the pledge and confirmed it, he felt the strongest desire for beer. He hadn't been so violently thirsty for months.

How to keep his pledge in the face of these tremendous yearnings was the difficulty. He felt as if he were being dragged in two different directions.

At first he tried to whistle them away. Then he tried what the force of argument would do.

He raked up every strong term he could lay his hand on to hurl at the drink. But his thirst defied reason and argument, and triumphed still. And now despair rose in his mind. He began to wonder whether it were possible to keep his pledge. He had never anticipated such a struggle as this. It was at this juncture that suddenly a way of escape opened out before him. It came from a simple question he had asked himself—

"Why am I more thirsty after I have left work than before?"

And the answer he gave himself seemed to him to solve the difficulty. "Because my mind is less occupied. Yes, if I can only get my thoughts in order, and give 'em somethink to do, it will be all right."

Jacob was certainly getting nearer to the solution of his problem, for so long as his thoughts were travelling in the direction of rumshops and the drink, the fight must be well-nigh a hopeless one. That very day Jacob paid a visit to the fishmonger's, and brought home some mussel-shells. He would have paid for them if the fishmonger had not handsomely made him a present of them.

What in the world was he going to do with mussel-shells?

You will not have to wait long for the answer, for that very evening Jacob began to polish them. How he worked away, to be sure! He threw his whole soul into it; for if he didn't work energetically, and bestow all his thoughts upon it, he would be exposed to other and worse thoughts, and his labor would be thrown away. And there was plenty to occupy his thoughts, though there might seem to be little.

He could think of the surprise some persons would feel when they saw what a beatiful shell a mussel really had under its black exterior. He could think of what he should do with them when he had polished them. He could think of the necessity there was for work; for if a man would see the beauty of such a simple thing as a mussel-shell, he must set to work and polish it. With such thoughts as these, and there were many more of them, he was well able to keep out thoughts of the drink, especially with the help of a big jug of toast and water which his wife was careful to mix for him.

I said one of Jacob's thoughts was what he should do with his shells after he had polished them. He determined to make boxes of them; and very pretty, useful boxes they were—much appreciated, too, to judge by the sale, for many were the purchasers among his teetotal friends, while not a few even found their way into non-teetotal homes; one, for instance, being presented by a purchaser to one of the many saloon parlors where Jacob used to spend his money and his time.

THE TOP OF THE LADDER.

Many an eye had been kept on Jacob, and many a prayer had been offered up for him. His temperance friends were too true to be content with merely giving him a start. One evening one of them dropped in at Jacob's house, and after watching his polishing operations for some time, said, "What a selfish beggar you are, Jacob!"

Jacob wanted to know what he meant.

"Why, you're keeping this good thing all to yourself. Here you've been a teetotaler for more than three months, and you haven't made a single speech for the cause."

"I ain't got the gift of tne gab, mate," answered Jacob.

"You'd got it fast enough when you used to get the drink aboard," was the reply.

"Ay, but I was a fool then. Fools can talk plenty."

After the polishing had gone on for a few minutes in silence, Jacob's friend began again:

"Don't 'ee feel as if you'd like to let out a bit against the drink?"

To which Jacob replied:

"Mate, I've got such a boiling feeling in my innards sometimes when I'm settin' a polishin', that if the drink was a beast I'd kill him right off."

"You're the chap for us, Jacob," said his friend, slapping him on the back. "'Taint no good yer saying you won't, you shall."

And before many days were over Jacob did, and pounded away against the drink as if he had been a spouter of some years' standing. But that wasn't the only way in which Jacob developed, no, nor the best way either.

One evening another temperance friend dropped in; the polishing was as vigorous as ever, and Jacob was just beginning to bring to light the beautiful mother-of-pearl. This afforded just the text he wanted.

"I say, Jacob, like that shell, you're a bit different from what you used to be."

"Ay, mate, that I am."

"Don't you think you might be a bit different still?"

Jacob asked him what he was driving at.

"Well, man, just this, that though you're a teetotaler and all that, you ain't a religious man."

"No," said Jacob, "I ain't!"

"Don't you feel as if you wanted a trifle more'n you've got?"

"Well, to tell 'ee the truth, them's just my feelin's. I aint't got all I want."

Now was his friend's chance. He gave the name to Jacob's want, and told him that he would never be satisfied until he accepted the Lord Jesus Christ as his Saviour, and gave up his heart into the Lord's hands. "You know, Jacob, the Lord Jesus knows more about our hearts than we do, and it's just because they're so sinful that He wants 'em. He wants to get rid of their sins, don't you know? Ah! mate, you'll never know what it is to be happy till you come to Jesus, and go in as hot and strong for religion as you have for teetotalism."

"Well, mate, I know you mean it well, and I thank'ee. 'Taint every man as 'ud speak out so plain as you've done. And I'll promise I won't forget what you've said—there now."

Neither did he, as there was plenty of evidence to show. For instance, Jacob took to going to church, a most unusual thing for him. Then he took to speaking well of religious men. This was a new departure also, for his comments before had been anything but flattering.

Then he began to read his Bible, and, as time wore on, less and less secretly. Then he took to companying with Christian men. Before long he began to introduce Gospel truths into his speeches, and more and more fully, until, instead of being temperance Gospel addresses, they became Gospel-temperance ones.

Perhaps one sentence from a speech of his will confirm all our suspicions—

"Mates, temperance in yer minds is well, but the Lord Jesus Christ in yer hearts is loads better."

REMINISCENCES.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

Here is David, the psalmist, with the forefinger of his right hand against his temple, the door shut against the world, engaged in contemplation. And it would be well for us to take the same posture often, closing the door against the world, while we sit down in sweet solitude to contemplate.

In a small island off the coast of Nova Scotia I once passed a Sabbath in delightful solitude, for I had resolved that I would have one day of entire quiet before I entered upon autumnal work. I thought to have spent the day in laying out plans for Christian work; but instead of that it became a day of tender reminiscence. I reviewed my pastorate; I shook hands with an old departed friend, whom I shall greet again when the curtains of life are lifted. The days of my boyhood came back, and I was ten years of age, and I was eight, and I was five. There was but one house on the island, and yet from Sabbath daybreak, when the bird-chant woke me, until the evening melted into the Bay of Fundy, from shore to shore there were

and the groves were ahum with voices that had long ago ceased.

Youth is apt too much to spend all its time in looking forward. Old age is apt too much to spend all its time in looking backward. People in mid life and on the apex look both ways. It would be well for us, I think, however, to spend more time in reminiscence. By the constitution of our nature we spend most of the time looking forward. And the vast majority of this audience live not so much in the present as in the future. I find that you mean to make a reputation, you mean to establish yourself, and the advantages that you expect to achieve absorb a great deal of your time. But I see no harm in this, if it does not make you discontented with the present, or disqualify you for existing duties.

It is a useful thing sometimes to look back, and to see the dangers we have escaped, and to see the sorrows we have suffered, and the trials and wanderings of our earthly pilgrimage, and to sum up our enjoyments. I mean this morning, so far as God may help me, to stir up your memory of the past, so that in the review you may be encouraged, and humbled, and urged to pray.

There is a chapel in Florence with

A FRESCO BY GUIDO.

It was covered up with two inches of stucco until our American and European artists went there, and after long toil removed the covering and retraced the fresco. And I am aware that the memory of the past, with many of you, is all covered up with ten thousand obliterations, and I propose this morning, so far as the Lord may help me, to take away the covering, that the old picture may shine out again.

I want to bind in one sheaf all your past advantages, and I want to bind in another sheaf all your past adversities. It is a precious harvest, and I must be cautious how I swing the scythe.

I. Among the greatest advantages of your past life was an and its surroundings. The bad men of the day, for the most part, dip their heated passions out of the boiling spring of an unhappy home. We are not surprised to find that Byron's heart was a concentration of sin, when we hear his mother was abandoned, and that she made sport of his infirmity, and often called him "the lame brat." He who has vicious parents has to fight every inch of his way if he would maintain his integrity, and at last reach the home of the good in heaven.

Perhaps your early home was

IN THE CITY.

It may have been in the days when Canal Street, New York, was far up-town, and the site of this present church was an excursion into the country. That old house in the city may have been demolished or changed into stores, and it seemed like sacrilege to you—for there was more meaning in that plain house, in that small house, than there is in a granite mansion or a turreted cathedral. Looking back this morning, you see it as though it were yesterday—the sitting-room, where the loved one sat by the plain lamplight, the mother at the evening stand, the brothers and sisters, perhaps long ago gathered into the skies, then plotting mischief on the floor or under the table; your father with firm voice commanding silence, that lasted half a minute.

Oh, those were good days! If you had your foot hurt, your mother always had a soothing salve to heal it. If you were wronged in the street, your father was always ready to protect you. The year was one round of frolic and mirth. Your greatest trouble was an April shower, more sunshine than shower. The heart had not been ransacked by troubles, nor had sickness broken it, and no lamb had a warmer sheepfold than the home in which your childhood nestled.

Perhaps you were brought up

IN THE COUNTRY.

You stand now to-day in memory under the old tree. You clubbed it for fruit that was not quite ripe, because you couldn't wait any longer. You hear the brook rumbling along over the pebbles. You step again into the furrow where your father in his shirt-sleeves shouted to the lazy oxen. You frighten the swallows from the rafters of the barn, and take just one egg, and silence your conscience by saying they won't miss it. You take a drink again out of the very bucket that the old well fetched up. You go for the cows at night, and find them wagging their heads through the bars. Ofttimes in the dusty and busy streets you wish you were home again on that cool grass, or in the wheat-carpeted hall of the farmhouse, through which there was the breath of new-mown hay or the blossom of buckwheat.

You may have in your windows now beautiful plants and flowers brought from across the seas, but not one of them stirs in your soul so much as the old ivy and the yellow sunflower that stood sentinel along the garden-walk, and the forget-me-nots playing hide-and-seek mid the long grass. The father who used to come in sunburnt from the fields, and sit down on the door-sill and wipe the sweat from his brow, may have gone to his everlasting rest. The mother, who used to sit at the door a little bent over, cap and spectacles on, her face mellowing with the vicissitudes of many years, may have put down her gray head on the pillow in the valley, but forget that home you never will.

Have you thanked God for it? Have you rehearsed all these blessed reminiscences? Oh, thank God for a Christian father; thank God for a Christian mother; thank God for an early Christian altar at which you were taught to kneel; thank God for an early Christian home.

I bring to mind another passage in the history of your life. The day came when you set up

YOUR OWN HOUSEHOLD.

The days passed along in quiet blessedness. You twain sat at the table morning and night, and talked over your plans for the future. The most insignificant affair in your life became the subject of mutual consultation and advisement. You were so happy you felt you never could be any happier. One day a dark cloud hovered over your dwelling, and it got darker and darker; but out of that cloud the shining messenger of God descended to incarnate an immortal spirit. Two little feet started on an eternal journey, and you were to lead them, a gem to flash in heaven's coronet, and you to polish it; eternal ages of light and darkness watching the starting out of a newly created creature.

You rejoiced and you trembled at the responsibility that in your possession an immortal treasure was placed. You prayed and rejoiced, and wept and wondered, and prayed and rejoiced, and wept and wondered; you were earnest in supplication that you might lead it through life into the kingdom of God. There was a tremor in your earnestness. There was a double interest about that home. There was an additional interest why you should stay there and be faithful, and when in a few months your house was filled with the music of the child's laughter, you were struck through with the fact that you had

A STUPENDOUS MISSION.

Have you kept that vow? Have you neglected any of these duties? Is your home as much to you as it used to be? Have those anticipations been gratified? God help you to-day in your solemn reminiscence, and let His mercy fall upon your soul if your kindness has been ill requited. God have mercy on the parent, on the wrinkles of whose face is written the story of a child's sin. God have mercy on the mother who, in addition to her other pangs, has the pang of a child's iniquity. Oh, there are many, many sad sounds in this sad world, but the saddest sound that is ever heard is the breaking of a mother's heart. Are there any here who remember that in that home they were unfaithful? Are there those who wandered off from that early home, and left the mother to die with a broken heart? Oh, I stir that reminiscence to-day. Can it be that you so turned in that way?

I find another point in your life history. You found one day you were you couldn't sleep at night; there was just one word that seemed to sob through your banking-house, or through your office, or your shop, or your bedroom, and that word was "Eternity." You said, "I'm not ready for it. O God, have mercy." The Lord heard. Peace came to your heart. In the breath of the rill and the waterfall's dash you heard the voice of God's love; the clouds and the trees hailed you with gladness; you came into the house of God.

You remember how your hand trembled as you took up the cup of the Communion. You remember the old minister who consecrated it, and you remember the church officials who carried it through the aisle; you remember the old people who at the close of the service took your hand in theirs in congratulating sympathy, as much as to say, "Welcome home, you lost prodigal;" and though those hands be all withered away, that Communion Sabbath is resurrected to-day; it is resurrected with all its prayers, and songs, and tears, and sermons, and transfiguration. Have you kept those vows? Have you been a backslider? God help you. This day kneel at the foot of mercy and start again for heaven. Start to-day as you started then. I rouse your soul by that reminiscence.

But I must not spend any more of my time in going over the advantages of your life. I just put them all in one great sheaf, and I top them up in your memory with one loud harvest song, such as the reapers sing. Praise the Lord, ye blood-bought immortals on earth! Praise the Lord, ye crowned spirits of heaven!

II. But some of you have not always had a smooth life. Some of you are now

IN THE SHADOW.

Others had their troubles years ago, you are a mere wreck of what you once were. I must gather up the sorrows of your past life; but how shall I do it? You say that is impossible, as you have had so many troubles and adversities. Then I will just take two, the first trouble and the last trouble. As when you are walking along the street, and there has been music in the distance, you unconsciously find yourselves keeping step to the music, so when you started life your very life was a musical time-beat. The air was full of joy and hilarity; with the bright clear oar you made the boat skip; you went on, and life grew brighter, until, after a while, suddenly a voice from heaven said, "Halt!" and quick as the sunshine you halted; you grew pale, you confronted

YOUR FIRST SORROW.

You had no idea that the flush on your child's cheek was an unhealthy flush. You said it can't be anything serious. Death in slippered feet walked round about the cradle. You did not hear the tread; but after a while the truth flashed on you. You walked the floor. Oh, if you could, with your strong, stout hand, have wrenched that child from the destroyer. You went to your room, and you said, "God, save my child! God, save my child." The world seemed going out in darkness. You said, "I can't bear it, I can't bear it." You felt as if you could not put the long lashes over the bright eyes, never to see them again sparkle. Oh, if you could have taken that little one in your arms, and with it leaped the grave, how gladly you would have done it! Oh, if you could let your property go, your houses go, your land and your storehouse go, how gladly you would have allowed them to depart if you could only have kept that one treasure!

But one day there arose from the heavens a chill blast that swept over the bedroom, and instantly all the light went out, and there was darkness—thick, murky, impenetrable, shuddering darkness. But God didn't leave you there. Mercy spoke. As you took up the cup, the adder tongue, horroring, flashing, rushed over the brim, and you were about to put that cup to your lips. God said, "Let it pass," and forthwith, as by the hand of angels, was put into your hands: it was the cup of God's consolation. And as you have sometimes lifted the head of a wounded soldier, and poured wine into his lips, so God puts His left arm under your head, and with His right hand He pours into your lips the wine of His comfort and His consolation, and you looked at the empty cradle and looked at your broken heart, and you looked at the Lord's chastisement, and you said, "Even so, Father, for so it seemeth good in Thy sight."

Ah, it is your first trouble. How did you get over it? God comforted you. You have been a better man ever since. You have been a better woman ever since. In the jar of the closing gate of the sepulchre you heard the clanging of the opening gate of heaven, and you felt an irresistible drawing heavenward. You have been purer and stouter of mind ever since that night when the little one for the last time put its arms around your neck and said, "Good-night, papa; good-night, mamma. Meet me in heaven."

But I must come on down to

YOUR LATER SORROW.

What was it? Perhaps it was sickness. The child's tread on the stair or the tick of the watch on the stand disturbed you. Through the long weary days you counted the figures in the carpet or the flowers in the wall-paper. Oh, the weariness of exhaustion! Oh, the burning pangs! Would God it were morning, would God it were night, were your frequent cry. But you are better, or perhaps even well. Have you thanked God that to-day you can come up in the fresh air; that you are in this place to hear God's name, and to sing God's praise, and to implore God's help, and to ask God's forgiveness? Bless the Lord who healeth all our diseases, and redeemeth our lives from destruction.

Perhaps your last sorrow was a

FINANCIAL EMBARRASSMENT.

I congratulate some of you on your lucrative profession or occupation, on ornate apparel, on a commodious residence—everything you put your hands to seems to turn to gold. But there are others of you who are like the ship on which Paul sailed where two seas met, and you are broken by the violence of the waves. By an unadvised indorsement, or by a conjunction of unforeseen events, or by fire or storm, or a senseless panic, you have been flung headlong, and where you once dispensed great charities, now you have hard work to make the two ends meet.

Have you forgotten to thank God for your days of prosperity, and that through your trials some of you have made investments which will continue after the last bank of this world has exploded, and the silver and gold are molten in the fires of a burning world? Have you, amid all your losses and discouragements, forgot that there was bread on your table this morning, and that there shall be a shelter for your head from the storm, and there is air for your lungs, and blood for your heart, and light for your eye, and a glad and glorious and triumphant religion for your soul?

Perhaps your last trouble was

A BEREAVEMENT.

That heart which in childhood was your refuge, the parental heart, and which has been a source of the quickest sympathy ever since, has suddenly become silent forever. And now sometimes, whenever in sudden annoyance and without deliberation you say, "I will go and tell mother," the thought flashes on you, "I have no mother." Or the father, with voice less tender, but as stanch and earnest and loving as ever—watchful of all your ways, exultant over your success without saying much, although the old people do talk it over by themselves, his jerky hand on that staff which you now keep as a family relic, his memory embalmed in grateful hearts—is taken away forever.

Or there was your companion in life, sharer of your joys and sorrows, taken, leaving the heart an old ruin, where the ill winds blow over a wide wilderness of desolation, the sands of the desert driving across the place which once bloomed like the garden of God. And Abraham mourns for Sarah at the cave of Machpela. Going along your path in life, suddenly, as you stepped on, right before you was

AN OPEN GRAVE.

People look down, and they see it was only a few feet deep and a few feet wide, but to you it was a cavern down which went all your hopes and all your expectations.

But cheer up in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Comforter. He is not going to forsake you. Did the Lord take that child out of your arms? Why, He is going to shelter it better than you could. He is going to array it in a white robe, and palm branch, and rays of light, and have it all ready to greet you at your coming home. Blessed the broken heart that Jesus heals. Blessed the importunate cry that Jesus compassionates. Blessed the weeping eye from which the soft hand of Jesus wipes away the tear.

Some months ago I was sailing down the St. John River, which is the Rhine and the Hudson commingled in one scene of beauty and grandeur, and while I was on the deck of the steamer a gentleman pointed out to me the places of interest, and he said, "All this is interval land, and it is the richest land in all the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia."

"What," said I, "do you mean by interval land?" "Well," he said, "this land is submerged for a part of the year; spring freshets come down, and all these plains are overflowed with the water, and the water leaves a rich deposit, and when the waters are gone the harvest springs up, and there is the grandest harvest that was ever reaped." And I instantly thought, "It is not the heights of the Church and it is not the heights of this world that is the scene of the greatest prosperity, but the soul over which the floods of sorrow have gone, the soul over which the freshets of tribulation have torn their way, that yields the greatest fruits of righteousness, and the largest harvest for time, and the richest harvest for eternity." Bless God that your soul is interval land.

But these reminiscences reach only to this morning. There is one more point of

and that is the last hour of life, when we have to look over all our past existence. What a moment that will be! I place Napoleon's dying reminiscence on St. Helena beside Mrs. Judson's dying reminiscence in the harbor of St. Helena, the same island, twenty years after. Napoleon's dying reminiscence was one of delirium —Tête d'armée—"Head of the Army." Mrs. Judson's dying reminiscence, as she came home from her missionary toil and her life of self-sacrifice for God, dying in the cabin of the ship in the harbor of St. Helena, was, "I always did love the Lord Jesus Christ." And then, the historian says, she fell into a sound sleep for an hour, and woke amid the songs of angels.

I place the dying reminiscence of Augustus Cæsar against the dying reminiscence of the Apostle Paul. The dying reminiscence of Augustus Cæsar was, addressing his attendants, "Have I played my part well on the stage of life?" and they answered in the affirmative, and he said, "Why, then, don't you applaud me?" The dying reminiscence of Paul the Apostle was, "I have fought a good fight, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord the righteous Judge will give me in that day, and not to me only, but to all them that love His appearing." Augustus Cæsar died amid pomp and great surroundings. Paul uttered his dying reminiscence looking up through the wall of a dungeon. God grant that our dying pillow may be the closing of a useful life, and the opening of a glorious eternity.

An Effort to Produce a Temperance Beverage as a substitute for intoxicants is being made. Mr. Robert Graham, the organizing secretary of the Church Temperance Society in Lafayette Place, New York, has received a letter from the secretary of the Lichfield Diocesan branch of the English Society, saying that he is on a committee of eight, calling themselves the "Temperance Drink Prize Committee," who are offering £700 and £300 as prizes for some drink that shall take the place of beer. This offer will be open to competition in England and America, and the writer hopes the matter will be taken up here.

Madness was Produced by a Jest in Philadelphia on June 26th. An Italian sailor, who speaks but little English, was arrested in that city for some trifling act of insubordination committed on board his ship, the Martini. An Italian official visited him in prison, and as a joke said to him, "You are to be hanged," significantly closing his hands about his throat and protruding his tongue. The Italian was overwhelmed with terror. "You canna meana that," he gasped. Then he fell in a fit, and has been delirious ever since. He crouches in the corner of his cell, and presents a pitiable object of terror. He sits and mutters by the hour, "Whata for they taka me life?" Several specialists in mental diseases visited the poor fellow last week, and all pronounced him hopelessly deranged. All efforts to disabuse his mind have failed. Several Italians spoke to him in his native tongue, but he heard them not, and only wailed piteously, "Whata for they taka me life?" It was a cruel joke, and the joker doubtless feels deep remorse for having attempted the wretched witticism. The victim evidently held his life very dear, or the announcement that he was to lose it would not have deprived him of reason. Had he been a consistent Christian the trick would not have had such a result. Even an ignominious death has no such terrors for one who desires to be with Jesus (II Tim. 4 : 6).

THE MAHDI IN PROPHECY.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

The Predicted Separation of India from England—The Mahdi's Proclamation in India—The Two-headed Beast of the Apocalypse—The Third Frog-like Spirit—The Mahdi Tradition—Its Similarity to Popish Ideas—Its Identity with Anti-Christian Predictions—The Mahdi's Power—The Attitude for the Christian.

WE have always held as an axiom, that as India was not included within the area of the prophetic earth, or Cæsar's Roman Empire at the period of her most extended sway, that therefore in the construction of the ten-kingdomed confederacy of the closing days of the present age, in accordance with the teaching of the Image of Daniel 2, that portion of England's dominions will ultimately be wrested from her imperial and legislative control. The events now transpiring in the East furnish many indications of the approaching fulfilment of this prediction.

Already the Mahdi, who is causing so much excitement in the Soudan, has appealed to the Mohammedans of India, claiming their allegiance and support. A large number of proclamations from him were, last month, found in circulation in India.

THE PROCLAMATION

purports to emanate from "The Slave of God, Mohammed-el-Mahdi, son of Syed Abdullah," and is addressed "To his friends who follow him and concur in supporting the true religion."

The document, which, according to Mohammedan fashion, is plentifully interspersed with texts from the Koran, begins by dwelling on the merit of engaging in a Holy War, and warns the people that God has forbidden them to accept His enemies as their superiors.

"Learn ye," it proceeds, "that God hath chosen me for the Khilafat-el-Kuhara" (that is, principal Vicegerency), and "Mohammed hath given me the joyful news that my companions are equal to his."

The writer then goes on to say that he sends Sheik Othman-el-Bakree, whom he has appointed Holy Ameer of the Bedouin tribes and of the other peoples who follow the path of safety. He directs them to obey the Sheik and to give him every assistance, adding, "Whoever shall accompany him shall be considered to have accompanied me, and shall be included in the honors mentioned above for my companions."

The faithful are then promised victory and the spoil of their enemies, and are exhorted not to fear the strength and numbers of their opponents, because all these are strangers to God, and small parties of men have often overcome large bodies through God's grace.

It would appear from the context that this proclamation was intended rather for the Arab tribes than for Indian Mussulmans. It is, however, significant that it should have penetrated to India; and it is clear that the circulation of such appeals to religious fanaticism is dangerous to the peace of the Indian Empire.

As we have repeatedly pointed out, of prophecy (Rev. 13 . 11) represents the Papal Mohammedan combination in its later stages, when the Roman Catholic Church will have entered into alliance with the Mohammedan superstition. From this beast issued, in conjunction with the Dragon or Satan (Rev. 12 : 9), and the second beast with the seven heads and ten horns, representing Cæsar's political Roman Empire revived, the three frog-like spirits. The first spirit, which comes from Satan, is Anti-christian infidelity; the second spirit, which comes from the Roman Empire, is revolutionary communistic socialism; and the third spirit, which comes from the Papal Mohammedan combination, is a crusading, fanatical propagandism, which appeared in the Jesuistical movement on the one hand, and on the other in India in 1857, and which is now arousing Mohammedanism all over the world.

THE TWO-HEADED WILD BEAST

It is a remarkable fact that this spirit finds in the Mahdi, and other Mahdis who have gone before him, its legitimate manifestation. Mohammedanism has been looking for centuries for its leader, and again and again men have arisen claiming to be the long-expected Messiah or sent one. The others have put forward claims precisely similar to this one, but none have done so with such prospects of success. He is undoubtedly one of the false Christs, whose appearance the Saviour taught us to recognize as a sign of the nearness of His own advent (Matt. 24 : 24).

Like Roman Catholicism, Mohammedanism holds, in close connection, dogma and politics. The spiritual head must be, according to their fundamental doctrines, a temporal ruler. This connection the Mahdi realizes. He claims, as his predecessors have done, to be a political deliverer and a religious reformer. His mission is to free Islam from external enemies and to re-establish pure faith.

THE ORIGINAL TRADITION

represents the Mahdi, who was to come, as an incarnation of the divine essence. That he would be a reappearance of Ali, the cousin and son-in-law of Mohammed, who was assassinated during the struggle he made for recognition as supreme Caliph, and who was declared to have left the world only for a season, to return as Mahdi or leader, and establish a kingdom of righteousness. Another legend represents him as not dead, but sitting in the heart of a mountain slumbering between two guardians, and near him two fountains—one of water and the other of honey. For a brief season, during which injustice and wickedness must be triumphant, he would remain in this place of concealment, but sooner or later he would come forth as Mahdi, and fill the world with justice and truth. Abdallah, who preached the doctrine a few years after Mohammed's death, declared that from the beginning of the world until his time there had been six Messiahs sent to the world, and that the seventh and last would appear shortly. Each had brought to earth a new revelation and had proclaimed it to man by a special representative. The series was as follows: (1) Adam and Seth; (2) Noah and Shem; (3) Abraham and Ishmael; (4) Moses and Aaron; (5) Christ and Simon Peter; (6) Mohammed and Ali. The one destined to make up the mystical number of seven would be called the Mahdi.

A LION AND A PANTHER,

It will be seen how closely this tradition identifies the Mahdi with the Mohammedan Antichrist. The Jewish Messiah was to be simply a descendant of David, whereas the Mahdi was to be who had been in his previous terrestrial existence an emanation of the deity. In this way the Mahdi doctrine, in its older form, has a certain analogy with the Christian belief in the second advent of Christ, and it is worthy of remark that Hakim, one of the pretended Mahdis, put forward his inordinate pretensions at the commencement of the eleventh century of the Christian era—a time when there was a very general belief throughout Christendom that the end of all things was at hand and the Millennium about to begin.

The extent to which the Mahdi superstition is influencing the Mohammedan world may be realized by sent to the London Daily News, in which the writer says that "the Mahdi can bring together an enormous power against any opponent, but especially against a Christian foe. In dealing with this Mahdi question, it should never be forgotten that in the eyes of millions of Mussulmans Mohammed Ahmed is the true Mahdi, and his wonderful career for the last three years is well calculated to impress the Oriental imagination with a belief in the divine nature of his mission. This belief may continue latent as long as there is a struggle between the Moslem Khedive and the new Prophet, both claiming to act in defence of the religion of Allah. But once let a Christian power attack 'the Holy Mahdi, the man sent by God to restore Islam to its pristine force and glory' and all doubts and hesitation will disappear, and every Moslem tribe in the Soudan and in Central Africa will gird on their swords and rush to the defence of God's prophet. The Arabs are certain to fight English troops with greater courage and greater fanaticism than they would Egyptians or Turks, because they believe that when a true believer dies fighting the infidels, his place in Paradise is assured. To cynics this may appear an insufficient incentive to desperate valor, but the statesman who fails to take into account the intense and all-absorbing belief in Allah, the God of Mohammed, entertained by the African Mohammedans, will never be able to gauge the importance or danger of the present movement."

It is impossible at the present stage of the conflict to say whether this latest Mahdi will be recognized by the Mohammedan world, and become the predicted Mohammedan Antichrist who will ally himself with the Papal Antichrist. The struggle is being fought, and the student of prophecy, who knows what will be the final issue of the supreme struggle, will watch it with absorbing interest, waiting to learn whether this is the conflict he knows will surely come at no distant day.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Joiner Defying the Wind.—At a Recent meeting Dr. Ferguson said: "A joiner in a Scotch town was conveying a plank on his shoulder on a strong windy day. When he came to the corner of a street up which the wind rushed with extra force, it caught the plank, making the man stagger. The joiner, addressing the wind, said: 'Wud ye? Wud ye? I'll cairry it frae Dan tae Beersheba in spite o' ye.' This is a grand motto for blue ribbon folk when the gust of temptation or mockery assails them. Just look it straight in the face and say, 'Wud ye? Wud ye? I'll carry my blue-ribbon from Dan to Beersheba, God helping me.'"

The Peril of Worldly Amusements.—Mr. Oatts, speaking on the duty of Christian workers keeping themselves free from the slightest suspicion of conformity to the world, more especially in regard to entering into its so-called amusements and time-killing entertainments, stated that quite recently he was speaking to a young woman who was in great mental and spiritual distress. Her difficulty was that a prominent leader of a religious meeting, by his inconsistent conduct in this matter, had led her to doubt the truths of Christianity. Is it right that Christians who have been bought with a great price, even the precious blood of Christ, should indulge themselves in this way, when the eyes of the world are scanning their every movement? Can they not deny themselves these "harmless" amusements for the sake of others? "Our citizenship is in heaven, whence also we look for the appearance of our Lord Jesus Christ."

The Bowling-Green and Billiards.—Mr. Crow related: "I was much struck with the case of a young man who for almost a year engaged in the work of the Lord, and did much good. For the purpose of endeavoring to counteract the malign influence of the grogshops, the leaders of the congregation to which he was attached thought right to start a bowling-green, and to open a hall where billiards and many such like games were the principal attractions. My friend was invited to the opening ball, and accepted the invitation. As he entered the hall, I said to him, 'Do not think that I wish to dictate to you, or to interfere unduly with what you think it right to do, but I feel that it is my duty to warn you against this step.' For a month or six weeks he attended his evangelistic work, but during that time he became colder and colder, till at last he acknowledged that his spiritual state was such that he could take no real interest in matters pertaining to the cause of Christ. We have reason to give thanks that, through the mercy of God, he was restored to his right mind, in response to the intercession of his true friends at the throne of grace. 'Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.'"

A Lady Missionary's Testimony.—Mr. Sloan related: "I was talking recently with a lady who is a missionary to the heathen. She told me that she knew that her spiritual life was growing deeper, and that she was living closer to Christ than ever before. I asked her, 'Has your spiritual life always been progressive?' 'No,' she replied. 'It was many years after I knew Jesus as my Saviour from death that I took Him into my life, and allowed Him to control me in everything.' 'It is only since you did so that you became conscious that you are growing more like Him?' I inquired. 'Yes,' was her quiet response. It is a great pity that so many Christian people will put more faith in their own power to stand fast against temptation and worldly-mindedness than take Jesus into their daily life, and allowing Him to keep them."

A Blue Ribbon Temperance Umbrella.—"In another meeting, a woman, whose face I did not recognize, took my hand, and shook it vigorously, at the same time expressing her great joy at seeing me. 'Do you not know me?' she inquired. 'No; I do not remember to have seen you before,' was my reply. 'Don't you recollect giving my husband and me the blue ribbon over in the Masonic Hall?' For fear of hurting her feelings, I did not reply directly to her question, but inquired, 'Are you still keeping the temperance pledge?' 'Of course we are. My very umbrella is keeping it.' So saying, she shook a small umbrella in my face, and I saw that it was adorned with a blue ribbon. In this, as in many other instances, temperance has been the first step in the way which leads to the acceptance of Christ and the joy of His salvation."

A Brave Italian Workman.—The Rev. Mr. Gault said: "Bergano is a city in Italy, with a population of forty thousand people. It has fifty Roman Catholic churches and fifteen Roman Catholic schools. An attempt was made to begin Protestant services in the stronghold of Popery, but the priests lashed up the population to such a furious state that the missionary was assaulted, and almost killed; but the Lord works in many ways. A workingman began to read the Bible to all who would listen to him. The missionary heard of this, and visited the man in his own house. The priests were watching, and immediately the man was dismissed from his daily employment and turned out of his home. Three times did he secure lodgings, and as often was he turned out of them; he could not get a place to shelter his head. The missionary also tried to hire a house for him, but failed. Finally a house was bought for mission purposes, and to shelter this man, and now a grand work is going on there, the result of this poor workingman standing firm for Christ and His Gospel under severe persecution."

Saved from Utter Wreck.—Mr. Rodgers Related: "In an inquiry meeting, lately, a man came to me and said, 'May I speak with you for a few minutes?' 'Certainly,' I answered, 'what is it?' He replied, 'At one time I was the superintendent of a Sabbath-school; now, just look at what the drink has brought me to! I am poor and wretched in mind and body. I have only threepence left of my wages, and I was on my way to the rumshop to spend it in drink, when my attention was attracted to the crowd at your open-air meeting. I came over to see what it was, and heard you speaking of the love of God, and parden for the worst of sinners. I tried to persuade myself that it was all nonsense, but my conscience told me that you spoke the truth, and constrained me to enter the hall. Now what am I to do?' I responded, 'You must give up indulging in strong drink, and return to the Lord Jesus, who alone can keep you from becoming an utter and eternal wreck. Will you do this?' 'I will, sir, from this moment,' he answered. His wife was in the habit of buying whiskey and beer every Saturday for use at home on Sunday. He went straight to his wife and asked, 'Where are the whiskey and beer you bought for Sunday?' She said, 'It is all right in the press safe.' Opening the press door, he took the bottles out and emptied the contents into the sink. Since that night he has never tasted strong drink, but he has 'tasted that the Lord is gracious.'"

HOW WE CONQUERED THE MASON.

By Lady Hope.

I WANT to mention one incident from our little cottage hospital in the country. I remember being there one day chatting with the nurse, who was telling me she had two beds empty. One of the committee-men was in the room, and he was just laughing at us working, as he said, so tremendously hard, though the nurse did all the real work. All I did was to go to the patients and talk with them. Just as he was speaking, a violent ring was heard at the door, and the servant ran into the room to tell us a man had fallen from a church tower—two miles off—and was badly hurt, and they had sent to see if they could bring him to the hospital.

"Oh, certainly," we said. But the committee-man ran to the door to ask the messenger who it was that was injured.

"Why, it's the mason!" he came back saying. "You can't have him here. He is a fearful character; he'll turn your tidy little place upside down. His voice is like a bull's; it would be heard all over the house."

"But we must have him. Let's get hold of him," said the nurse, "and then—"

So we went to the committee-man, and put the case to him that it was just the kind of man we wanted to reach, and that illness and injury quieted a man wonderfully, and that we wanted to have him.

"You are most extraordinary women," he said. "I cannot understand you."

However, he gave in, and we told them to bring the man to the cottage. By and by they came with him, and I won't soon forget their carrying him up the stairs in a sort of chair. He made the place ring with a roar like a bull's. He raved and swore at being taken to such a place; he hated going there.

"Don't you come up," the nurse said, "till I've got him safe in bed."

By and by I went up and found him beginning to soften already. Everything seemed to him so clean and tidy and comfortable. He was grumbling a little, but next morning he was turned, he was as quiet as a lamb. He lay there for three weeks before he got better. We used to have short prayers in the room, and the most of the men would kneel down, but he would not—he was not going to kneel. One day I talked about Christ's love, and how He knelt to bathe the feet of His disciples, and how He died to save lost rebellious sinners. Then we had prayer, and the others knelt, and this great big man at last knelt down with us. When we had finished prayer, he said, "You've done for me now; between nurse and you you've quite broken my heart."

He became quite a changed character from that day, and the whole town soon knew it. Some time after his little boy died, and I remember the poor mother telling me afterward:

"It was a sad day when our boy died, and I thought my heart would break standing by the open grave. It was a cloudy day, and as I stood there a gleam of sunshine broke through the cloud and fell across my husband's face; and when I looked and saw the changed face, and how full of love and kindness, so different from what it used to be, I couldn't help thanking God that, though He had taken away my boy, He had given me my husband; and I thanked God for that little hospital."

I believe that in the time of sickness men are ready to hear if only we go to them, and I am sure that at such a time there has often broken from the cloud a stream of light that has brightened their whole life. Let us then do all we can to help a mission which not only helps to heal the sick bodies, but brings to the weary and troubled souls peace, joy, and rest in God. Let us use both hands, and He will bless our work among the poor around us.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

A Case of Self-Amputation by a Brave Lad is reported from Auburn, N. Y. A boy named Terence Finley, in attempting to jump on a moving train close to that city, fell, and had his right foot cut nearly in two just above the ankle. Recognizing that the foot must be amputated any way, the little fellow, with rare courage, himself severed the few remaining tendons before the surgeon arrived. The nerve he displayed is really extraordinary, and shows how, in a severe crisis, when a great effort is demanded, strength is found where it would be least expected. Even that boy's resolution, wonderful as it was, is less than that sometimes required to cut off some darling sin or break some evil habit. Yet our Saviour said it was better to enter into life halt or maimed rather than having two hands or two feet and be cast into hell (Matt. 18 : 8).

A Man Charmed by a Snake had a Narrow escape from death recently. The Montgomery Standard states that four men started to the woods in search of plants. They saw a snake's den, but it was apparently empty, and they did not examine it closely, but continued their botanizing expedition, in which they became separated. Soon afterward one of the number was seen standing spellbound in front of the den, and an immense black snake was found coiled in front of him. The man was rigid, and his eyes were starting from their sockets. The snake was moving with a wavy motion, and slowly drawing closer. The reptile was immediately killed before it had time to strike, but a delay of a few moments would have been fatal to the fascinated man. The snake was nine feet long. The man had to be carried to a wagon. He says he felt unable to move or to resist. The same powerlessness is often described by the victims of liquor and morphia, who admit that they are being ruined, body and soul, but are unable to resist the tempter. To such men an Almighty Saviour offers strength sufficient for their need (Isa. 40 : 29).

A Man Died of Leprosy in New Orleans on June 16th. About a year ago the unmistakable symptoms of the terrible disease first appeared in the man, who had been engaged in hauling dead cattle to bone yards, or fertilizer factories, and the disease was attributed to handling the carrion. When he first became aware that he had been seized with the loathsome disease he came to New York, where he consulted the most eminent physicians and placed himself under their treatment. They afforded him no relief, and he gradually became worse. Aware of the inability of the physicians to cope with the incurable disease, he returned to his home in New Orleans. In February last he became desperate, and determined to put an end to his life, but was prevented from so doing by his relatives. He repeated this attempt several times, but was so closely watched that his efforts were futile. Once he boarded a ferry-boat, and when the vessel was in mid-stream he leaped overboard, but boats were lowered and he was rescued and taken to the Charity Hospital, where he remained until death relieved him. The loathsome disease is frequently used as a type of sin; and if the sinner could see his own condition as God sees it he would know how true a type of it leprosy is. But the sinner need not despair or seek death as a way of escape; Christ, who healed the lepers, can also still eradicate the leprosy of sin (Matt. 9 : 5, 6).

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Treasury Statement for the Entire Fiscal year was issued July 1st. From this it appears that the debt was decreased during the year ending June 30th by $101,040,971, as against $134,000,000 in the preceding year. The surplus revenue for 1883–84 was therefore $100,000,000. The one hundred and twenty-eighth call for bonds matured on July 1st, which, being for $10,000,000, raises the reduction to nearly $112,000,000, and represents an annual decrease in interest of $3,350,000. The total receipts for the year were $348,000,000, against $398,000,000 for the preceding year, a difference of $50,000,000 in round numbers. During the discussion of the Tariff bill in the last Congress it was estimated that the passage of the Revenue bill then pending, and which is now a law, would work a reduction of about $70,000,000 per annum. The actual reduction in these sources, as shown by figures reported to the Treasury Department, is a few thousands short of $42,000,000, the reduction in customs having been $19,000,000, and in internal revenue $23,000,000.

The President's Veto of the Bill Restoring Fitz-John Porter to his rank in the army occasioned some surprise last week. In giving his reasons for the veto the President said he was "unwilling to sanction any legislation which shall practically annul and set at naught the solemn and deliberate conclusions of the tribunal by which he was convicted, and of the President, by whom its findings were examined and approved." Another reason was that the bill was unconstitutional, as it creates a new office upon condition that the President shall appoint to fill it a designated person, and is therefore a legislative encroachment upon the Executive authority. The House promptly passed the bill over the veto, but the requisite two thirds majority was not obtained in the Senate. There is, therefore, an end of the bill for this Congress. The question has been argued now twenty years, and has become a party matter. The real point at issue appears to be whether Congress ought to have the power of reviewing the judgment of a court, and, if it have that power, whether the circumstances justified General Porter in disobeying the orders of his superior officer.

Several Vacancies in the Diplomatic Service were filled by President Arthur last week by nominations which receive general approval. Congressman John A. Kasson, of Iowa, who has had diplomatic experience as Minister to Austria under President Hayes, was nominated Minister to Germany in succession to Mr. Sargent. The vacancy at the Court of Russia is filled by the nomination of Alphonso Taft, who is now United States Minister to Austria. Mr. John M. Francis, who now represents the United States at Lisbon, is transferred to Austria-Hungary, to take Mr. Taft's place, and Lewis Richmond, of Rhode Island, is named for Minister to Portugal.

This Congress, Like its Predecessor, Disgraced itself by holding sessions on Sunday. After frittering away the early part of the session and neglecting its work, both Houses were in such haste to adjourn, that on Sunday last they devoted the day to business. The day was chiefly occupied by receiving conference reports on the points of disagreement between the Senate and the House. They related chiefly to the appropriation bills which the House showed a determination to cut down. The agreements reached were principally due to concessions of the House; the Senate, however, abandoned Mr. Sherman's pet appropriation of $3950, to reimburse the amount paid for the expenses of the Louisiana Commission in 1877. The River and Harbor bill as it leaves Congress calls for $13,909,200 beside the million dollars previously appropriated for the Mississippi improvements. The President is being urged to veto the bill as he did the eighteen-million-dollar bill of 1882, leaving to Congress the responsibility of passing it over the veto.

The Expediency of Nominating a Prohibition ticket in Indiana is doubted by the temperance leaders in that State. Dr. J. A. Houser, the President of the State Christian Temperance Union, remarked last week that the Prohibition Convention summoned for July 24th had been postponed because a feeling was growing among the temperance people that the result of putting a third ticket in the field would be to give the offices to the Democrats. Dr. Houser said: "The temperance men appreciate the fact that the Democrats in the State are in full accord with the Liquor League, and that such a movement would redound to the benefit of that party. Of two evils their good sense admonishes them to choose the least. They see a ray of hope in the plank of the Republican platform favoring a call of a constitutional convention, while they cannot find even a crumb of comfort in the Democratic principles as enunciated by Mr. English. If a constitutional convention should be held and a prohibition amendment submitted to a vote of the people at a special election, the temperance people will have gained what they have been struggling for these many years. Therefore they are disposed to vote the Republican ticket."

The Failure of the Star Route Cases can now be easily understood. The revelations being made before the Springer Committee show that the conviction of the defendants would have astonished all concerned in the prosecution. The counsel for the Government quarrelled among themselves, and each suspected the others of intriguing to let the defendants go. One of the lawyers has been charged by a witness with having actually received a bribe to secure the safety of one of the culprits. As a specimen of the influences at work, the Attorney-General produced, on Thursday last, a letter he received on December 20th, 1882, from Mr. Bliss, who, as counsel for the Government, held a prominent position in the cases. In the course of the letter Mr. Bliss said: "As to the matter which I spoke of to you this morning—as to the using of Price as a witness—why not consult with Secretary Chandler on the political view of it? Of course you would not consult any one in the legal aspect. But the matter may be productive of great difficulties." There is nothing to show whether Mr. Brewster did take Mr. Chandler into consultation in order to get "the political view of it." Mr. Chandler was certainly the most competent man in the Cabinet to enlighten him on the political aspect of it, if the Attorney-General needed enlightenment. It would appear, however, from the revelations made before the Springer Committee, that the deficiencies of Mr. MacVeagh, Mr. Brewster, Mr. Bliss, and all those concerned, were not of that character. "The political view of it" seems to have been the only one taken. If they had taken a just and conscientious view of the case and of their own duty, the defendants would not have escaped.

The Framing of a Tariff Plank in the Platform is the most important duty, next to that of the nominations, which the Democratic National Convention, now in session at Chicago, has to perform. The protectionists in the party are anxious that the declarations of the Convention on the tariff should be vague, so as not to offend voters of protectionist views. They recommend that the issue of the election shall be Mr. Blaine's record, and that it be fought with a candidate of unimpeachable integrity. An appeal has, however, been made to the Convention by the Manufacturers' League, which is likely to command attention. The League urges the abolition of all duties on raw materials, in order to give manufacturers an opportunity of competing with other nations in the markets of the world; also an adjustment of the tariff by which the rate of duty on the manufactured article shall be proportionate to the labor and skill expended upon it, the articles nearest the crude state to pay the lowest rate of duty.

Drunkenness as the Parent of other Vices is readily recognized by all observers of the events of the day. A confirmation of the fact is afforded by the recently issued report of the chaplain of the Magdalen Asylum, of New York, that of eighty-nine fallen women in the Asylum at one time, all but two had fallen through drink. A lady missionary among this class says that, of two thousand known personally to her, there were only ten cases in which intoxicating liquors were not in large part responsible for their fall.

The Prohibitory Law went into Operation in Iowa at midnight of Friday last. A large trade was done in Des Moines during the day in filling flasks and jars, the habitual drinkers evidently expecting the enforcement of the law. A telegram from Des Moines on Saturday says that none of the saloons had opened, and disreputable houses were emptied of their inmates, and in some cases were offered for sale. A wholesale liquor dealer says he believes the law will reduce drunkenness materially, but thinks the wholesale men will have a flood of orders for small lots. These will be for medicinal, mechanical, and culinary purposes, and, where customers are prudent and reputable, they will be supplied, otherwise not. He thinks the wholesale men will be more circumspect than the pharmacists. Temperance people all over the Union will watch the course of events in Iowa with lively interest.

The National Prohibition Camp Meeting commenced a ten days' session at Decatur, Ill., on July 2d. Dr. Davies made an address of welcome, which was responded to by President Haney, who declared that the meeting had nothing whatever to do with political affairs. Among those present at the opening exercises were: Mrs. Woodbridge, of Ohio; the Rev. Dr. W. H. Boole, of Brooklyn; the Hon. William W. O'Brien, of Chicago; Governor Glick, of Kansas; Miss Frances E. Willard, of Chicago; George C. Christian, of Chicago; the Rev. Henry Wilson, of New Jersey; and Mrs. Lucie Simpson (colored), of Bloomington.

The Increase in the Consumption of Distilled liquors in the United States during the past five years has been remarkable. At a meeting of Good Templars in Washington, D. C., recently, Mr. George A. Hilton, of the Internal Revenue Department, stated, in the course of an address on the urgent necessity for active and persistent temperance work, that since 1879 the increase of consumption of distilled spirits was forty-three and a half per cent, and of fermented liquors nearly sixty per cent. Unhappily there is no reason for hoping that these figures are exaggerated, Mr. Hilton's statement being based on official records.

A New Faith Cure Establishment was opened at Stratford, Conn., recently. It has been organized by Rev. Arthur Sloan, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, who recently resigned his charge in that city. The Rev. W. F. Watkins, of Holy Trinity Church, New York, preached the opening sermon, and referred to the work that was being accomplished. It is said that a New York lady has contributed $600 to the mission. A vestry meeting has been held to decide as to the acceptance of the Rev. Mr. Sloan's resignation of the rectorship of Christ Church. The result has not yet been announced. A vestryman said that Mr. Sloan had said that under certain conditions he might resume his pulpit, but that in case he did the seats must be free, and he should accept no salary.

Two Cases of Faith Cure are Reported from Cleveland, Ohio. Both sufferers were afflicted with spinal disease. One of them—Mrs. Oliver Mansfield—has been under medical care seven years, most of the time being confined to her bed. It was a clear case of curvature of the spine, which bent her out of shape. Dr. Hickman, pastor of the Woodland church, offered prayers for her recovery, and explained to the afflicted lady the nature of healing faith. She believed, and determined to avail herself of the promise. She rose and walked without assistance, being made perfectly straight. For the first time in seven years she stood erect. Her husband said to the reporter who sent to the New York Times the despatch describing the cure: "If you had seen Mrs. Mansfield a week ago, you would have said she could never sit up, to say nothing about walking. She could not have done it without the help of the Lord. Since her cure she has been up, and is growing stronger, and there she sits now, strong in the Lord." The other case is that of Miss Rebecca Kerby. She has been bedridden for forty years with a spinal complaint and a complication of maladies. For twenty-eight years she has not sat up once. Dr. Hickman and his people visited her and prayed with her. She began to have faith, and, a few days ago, arose from her bed, sat in her chair for an hour, and walked across the room, and has repeated it several times since. She says that she has not a doubt of eventually being made strong and well.

The Great Problem of the Times was the subject of Professor Seelye's Baccalaureate address to the graduates of Amherst College, Mass., on June 29th. He said: "There are probably 100,000 men in the United States to-day whose animosity against all existing social institutions is hardly less than boundless. They are forming themselves into societies—sometimes secret and sometimes open—they openly advocate on the platform or through the press the destruction, by fire, by the bullet, by dynamite, by any of the stupendous agencies the modern investigation of nature has provided, of the property and the life of those whose ways of living they condemn. These utterances, wild as they may seem to others, are made in sober earnest, with a clear knowledge of their meaning and a firm determination to carry out all that they imply, and by earnest and determined men, whose numbers are steadily increasing. They are making converts on our own soil, and are receiving continued increase from immigration. They are the signs, here and elsewhere, of an attempted revolution, which, if it succeeds, will destroy the whole structure of our civilization, and if it does not succeed threatens to shake this structure to the centre." After showing that social science is impotent to deal with this fearful problem, President Seelye said: "There is but one proper antidote. While the teachers of social science teach how every man lives for himself, the Divine Teacher teaches 'a love which seeketh not her own.' To penetrate human hearts by love, to bind them together in self-forgetting endeavor, is the true social perfection. But there is only one way in which this can be done—the preaching of the Gospel. Salvation by sacrifice—the salvation of others by the sacrifice of ourselves; the salvation of the world by a divine sacrifice, this is life for the world and the only life."

The Dangers of Beer Drinking are Elaborately described in a learned article in the current number of the Medical News of Philadelphia. The writer says, in the course of the article: "The habitual consumption of beer in excessive quantities tends to hypertrophy by the direct action of alcohol upon the heart, by the enormous amount of fluid introduced into the body, and by the easily assimilated nutritive constituents of the beer itself. The condition of patients suffering from the effects of excessive beer drinking not rarely amounts to a true plethora of the most typical kind, such as is seen among the drivers of beer wagons and workers in breweries in this country. The excesses in beer common in some parts of Germany are rare in the New World, but that such excesses are attended by a direct and grave danger, hitherto little suspected, should be generally understood."

A Curious Condition to a Legacy Occurs in a will presented for probate in New York last week. This is the clause referred to: "I give and bequeath unto my godchild, Frederick Rudolph Peipers, the sum of $2000, lawful money of the United States of America, for his own use, benefit, and behoof forever; provided, however, and this legacy is upon the express condition that my said godchild shall, from and after the time that this bequest shall have been made known to him, continue to so spell and write his name for all time forth, and in default of his so doing this legacy to him shall be wholly void and of no effect, and the sum herein bequeathed shall fall into and become part of my residuary estate, and shall be disposed of according to the provision of the clause in this my will disposing of my residuary estate." The testator was evidently anxious that his name should be remembered after his death. It is a natural desire, and God makes the promise to those who keep His commands, "I will give them an everlasting name that shall not be cut off" (Isa. 56 : 5), while we are assured that in spite of all precautions "the name of the wicked shall rot" (Prov. 10 : 7).

Disappointment with New York Led an immigrant to attempt suicide last week. A few weeks ago Joseph Jungwerth and his wife, Teresa, were residing in Austria, their native country. The man was earning good wages as a machinist, and his wife was employed in a café. Unhappily the woman listened to the stories told of the magnificence of New York and the ease with which fortunes were made there. She was dazzled, and with some difficulty induced her husband to cross the Atlantic with her. They arrived four weeks ago, and during that time have endured serious hardships, being unable to obtain remunerative employment. The disappointment so preyed on the woman's mind that she went to a bath-house in Delancey Street, and there made an attempt to commit suicide. She was discovered before life was quite extinct, and was removed to a hospital, where she lies in a critical condition. She is not the first by thousands who has been deceived and disappointed in a similar effort to gain a fortune. Those who seek eternal riches through Christ need have no fear of such disappointment. Even in this world no one has ever been found to regret at the close of life having trusted the Saviour (1 Tim. 4 : 8).

OUR SANCTUARY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary. O LORD, the hope of Israel, all that forsake Thee shall be ashamed, and they that depart from me shall be written in the earth, because they have forsaken the LORD, the fountain of living waters. Heal me, O LORD, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved: for thou art my praise."—JEREMIAH 17 : 12, 13, 14.

The Despised Preacher—Alone with his God—A Broken Passage—The Purity of Bible Language—The Prophet's Conception of a Sanctuary—I. Its True Place—A Sovereign Reigning—In Power—In Glory—Christ the Place of Worship—II. Those who Depart—Who they Are—People Who have Known Him—What Will Become of Them—The Writing in the Earth—A Sore Thirst—A Boy's Idea of Elijah's Translation—III. The Comers to God—Away from the World—With Faith.

THIS book of Jeremiah is a very thorny one; it might be called, like his smaller work, "The Book of Lamentations." Our text is as a lily among thorns, as a rose in the wilderness; the solitary place shall be glad for it, and the desert shall rejoice. The words sound like sweet music amid the crash of tempest. The bitter tree yields us sweet fruit. The weeping prophet wipes away our tears. I do not know that the whole of Scripture contains more delightful promises than those which fell from the lips of this son of sorrow, who has been to so many a son of consolation. May God grant that this lily to-day may be exceeding lovely in your eyes as you see it in the sunlight of the Holy Spirit.

It seems to me that in this passage the mourning prophet is sitting alone in communion with his God, speaking out his steadfast faith, and washing the feet of his sorrows in the laver of the promises. The singular change of the pronoun from thee to me shows how near the Lord was to him; so near, indeed, that Jehovah not only speaks by the prophet, but breaks in with personal language, and speaks Himself. All men who have to deal with great multitudes of people for God or they will lose their power. Jeremiah was sick at heart, for he prophesied, but he was not believed; he entreated and persuaded, but his affectionate appeals were rejected; he saw the nation hastening to destruction, and he could not avert the doom; all this made him cry out in the anguish of his soul, "I am the man that hath seen affliction." Hence he could not have lived if he had not found sanctuary in his God. He often stole away into secret places that he might pour out his breaking heart before the Lord, and commit himself to the tender care of Him whom he so faithfully served. Let us imitate him, and overcome our griefs by secret fellowship with the happy God.

The passage before us is a very broken one. Those who are acquainted with the original tongue will tell you that it is difficult to construe it. It is a fragmentary passage, and several meanings have been given to it. Do you not know the reason of this? Should not a broken heart use broken words? When you have been in great trouble, and have drawn nigh to God, you have often had to pour out your heart in faltering accents. Nor does this destroy our prayer, or even shorten its power. Our God can put our speech together when we cannot put it together ourselves. A sigh here and a cry there, an utterance of faith at one moment and a groan of sorrow at the next; these make up a singular patchwork to ourselves, perhaps; more singular still to any one who should overhear us in our solitary sighs; but such supplications are not at all singular to God. He reads the meaning of His saints, and understands the language of their sighs.

However, it seems to me that the translators of the Authorized Version have given us the true meaning of the original, as I think they generally do. The men are not yet born who will give us a better rendering either of the Old or the New Testament than is to be found in our old English Bibles, and it is my belief that they never will be born. These men wrote a marvellously pure English, and really translated the Bible into our mother tongue, being helped of God not only to see the meaning, but to write it in words which are understood of the people. Learned men in our day for the most part know every tongue except English; and they fall into the error of mistaking long Latinized words for our native language. Give me plain expressive Saxon. You may place every confidence in whatever small improvements the translation may require, it is in the main so good that its rivals have had but short lives, while it retains all its primitive power.

In this text no doubt the prophet had in his eye the temple at Jerusalem. Seated upon the summit of a hill, with deep valleys surrounding it, the temple stood aloft, above all, a noble structure, seen from afar. To the Jew it was "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth." When God dwelt in it the temple might be fitly described in the language of Jeremiah as "A glorious high throne" for God. That glittering temple of snow-white marble, adorned with abundance of gold, seemed as it gleamed in the sun to be the lofty seat of Jehovah, whereon He reigned in the midst of His people. The temple, I say, may have been in the prophet's eye, but I do not think that it was in the heart of his meaning.

The passage which we read just now, in the seventh chapter of Jeremiah, shows you that Jeremiah was by no means a devotee for the material temple, nor did he rest his confidence in its outward ceremonial. He had reached a more spiritual region. That evangelical spirit which spake by Isaiah also rested upon Jeremiah. He had come to understand that God is not to be worshipped as if He dwelt in temples made with hands, nor to be served by merely outward rites; but that God is a spirit, and must be worshipped in spirit and in truth. It seems to me to be clear that the prophet here speaks of God Himself as being to His people the place of their sanctuary and a glorious high throne. With this I shall begin—the true place of our sanctuary. Secondly, I shall have a little to say about the departers from God, the true place of our sanctuary—they are to be ashamed, and written in the dust. Then, thirdly, the comers to God as the true sanctuary. How do they come? They come with the language of the fourteenth verse: "Heal me, O Lord, and I shall be healed; save me, and I shall be saved."

I. First, let us consider

of our sanctuary. It is not at Jerusalem, nor yet at Samaria; it is not at Rome, nor yet at Canterbury. The place of our sanctuary is not the meeting-house wherein we gather; the place of our sanctuary is our God Himself. "God is our refuge and strength." "Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations."

He is viewed under the aspect of a sovereign reigning in majesty—"A glorious high throne is the place of our sanctuary." Many refuse to worship God as reigning; they have not yet grasped the idea that the Lord is King, so that they cannot understand the song, "The Lord reigneth; let the earth rejoice." For that includes, first, divine sovereignty, and some men grow black in the face with rage against that truth; they cannot endure it. Not even over His own mercy will they allow God to exercise any sovereignty; He is to be bound by their rules and compelled to deal alike with all; so they say. But He will not have it so; for this is His word: "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion." Now this God whose sovereignty is so much disputed is our God; a glorious high throne for absolute dominion and sovereignty is the place of our sanctuary. To Him whose sovereign grace is the hope of the undeserving we fly for succor.

Besides sovereignty, of course, His glorious high throne includes power. A throne without power would be but the pageantry of vanity. Wherefore, rejoice in this, that the Lord reigns as absolute monarch, full of power to execute His own purposes of infinite love. In all times of disturbance and trouble flee ye to the Lord of all as to a sanctuary, and find your comfort in Him. Forget not that the Lord reigns in exceeding glory. The excellence of His dominion surpasses all other, for He is the blessed and only Potentate. We shelter beneath no insignificant princedom—a glorious high throne is the place of our sanctuary. The text teaches more than this, however. It says, "A glorious high throne from the beginning is the place of our sanctuary." As His is the most potent of empires, so is it the most ancient. The arrangements of providence which seem so complex to us are not complex to Him; they are simple, direct, and effective. God is working evermore for a glorious purpose, which shall one day make the universe and all eternity to sing with rapturous joy that ever God determined to do what He is now doing. Let us rest in that truth.

When the prophet alludes to the place of our sanctuary, our mind is naturally led to feel that there must be some kind of place where God especially reveals Himself. We all know that He manifests Himself in heaven; and we expect erelong to be there to swell the number of His courtiers; but He has also revealed Himself on earth, and very significant are the places where He has done so. The place where He mainly revealed Himself among men was the temple, to which I have said Jeremiah somewhat alludes. Now, where was the temple built? It was built upon that mountain whereon Abraham took his son Isaac to offer him up as a sacrifice.

WONDERFUL SCENE!

There, all in lonely quietude, the servants left at the foot of the hill, the great patriarch, the father of the faithful, laid the wood upon the altar and unsheathed the knife to slay his only son. There the scene ends, and the curtain drops; but what a wonderful picture it was of the greater Father, the everlasting God, who did in very deed and truth offer up His Son, the heir of the promise, that we might live through Him! A ram caught in the thicket was the substitute for Isaac; but there was no substitute for Jesus, the Son of God. He died the just for the unjust to bring us to God. But there, where the most instructive of all types of the heavenly Father's love was exhibited, there must be the temple wherein God would converse with men and make for men a place of sanctuary. The temple itself was built upon that site, and there it was that God dwelt visibly between the wings of the cherubim, above the ark of the covenant, over that golden lid which was called the mercy-seat.

What was that ark of the covenant, but a type of our Lord Jesus Christ in a most instructive way? There stood the cherubim above the golden lid of that coffer; and Jesus also was "seen of angels." The cover made the mercy-seat, or propitiatory, and this the Lord Jesus is to us. He, as the blood-besprinkled mercy-seat, is the place where God meets with us, hears our prayers, and accepts our persons and our praises. Look within the lid with holy reverence, and first you see two tables of stone upon which the law of God was engraven. Did not Jesus say, "I delight to do Thy will, O my God: yea, Thy law is within my heart?" Looking again, you observe a golden pot filled with manna, and you remember Him who is the bread which came down from heaven, whereof if a man eat he shall live forever. Nor may we fail to notice a rod, a rod that has budded and blossomed and brought forth almonds; for by it we are reminded that the sceptre of rule is with the Lord Jesus Christ, and the government shall be upon His shoulder. This is His living and productive sceptre, with which He rules the souls of His people. Do you wonder that the Lord in meeting His people ordained as the trysting place such an eminent type of His dear Son? The ark of the covenant was made according to the pattern which Moses saw in the holy Mount; and above its mercy-seat was the place were God dwelt, and where He communed with His people.

Now then, dear friends,

THE PLACE WHERE WE WORSHIP

is God Himself revealed in the person of His dear Son. I pray you, never try to worship anywhere else. Christ is the one altar, the one temple, the one sanctuary. Set not up your high places of will-worship; erect not images to Baal in the form of self and sin. God in Christ Jesus should absorb all the worship of all the sons of men.

In addition, the Lord God is our refuge; for a sanctuary was a place to which men fled in the hour of peril. Is not Jesus our refuge from present guilt and from the wrath to come? Does He not deliver us from the guilt of sin? Ay, He is our refuge from temptation, our refuge in the hour of trial, our sanctuary in every season of sorrow, distress, and pain. This glorious high throne affords us an abiding shelter under the assaults of the enemy. I do not think I can preach on such a text—so there I must just leave it for you to think it over, or, better still, for you to flee to it, and fleeing to it to abide in it, worshipping in spirit and in truth.

II. Secondly, I am to speak but a few words, but those very solemnly, concerning from God. Alas, that there should be such!—men who leave the river for the desert, the living for the dead! Who are they? The text says, "All that forsake Thee," and "they that depart from me." See, then, that this text has a bearing upon us, because these people of whom we are now going to speak were not an ignorant people who did not know God, or how could they be said to forsake Him? They were not like the heathen who have never heard His name. You cannot forsake a person with whom you have no acquaintance. Alas! there are among His own professed people a company that forsake Him. They mix for a time with the people of God, but they ultimately go out from them because they are not truly of them. In this land we have a people to whom God has been very gracious in sending the Gospel to them; but they are forsaking Christ for Rome, turning aside from faith in the Redeemer's merit that they may trust in priestcraft. It will not do, my brethren,

IT WILL NOT DO.

But there are many such, and many that did run well for a time; what did hinder them that they should not still obey the truth?

They went back to the world for gain or for ease; because of poverty, or because of riches, or because of fear of man, they turned aside and went away from God. At first they ceased to worship Him, they took no delight in His ways; they tried to be neutral, they were lukewarm, careless, indifferent, they forgot God. After thus declining in zeal, and refusing outward worship, they went further; for He says they had departed from Him—they could not endure the Lord, and therefore went into the far country. They said unto God, "Depart from us; we desire not the knowledge of Thy ways." They went into open sin; they disowned their God and broke His commands; some of them even dared to blaspheme Him. The course of sin is downhill. The man who once forgets his God soon forgets himself; and then he throws the reins on the neck of his lusts and goes from sin to sin, forgetting his God more and more.

I may be addressing such this morning; I fear I am. To such I have to tell what will become of them one of these days. This will become of you—you "shall be ashamed." I do not know a more painful feeling to a true man than to be ashamed, when he feels—"I was foolish and wrong;" it makes his cheeks crimson, his heart swells, his eyes overflow. The most hardened of sinners will one day be ashamed, saying, "I acted unprofitably to myself." Such shame will come over you forgetful ones one of these days. You that live without God will erelong be disgusted with yourselves for it. It may not come upon you till you die, but it is very probable that it will assail you then. When in your dying hours, what a dreadful thing it will be to be filled with shame at the remembrance of the past, so as to be afraid to meet your God, ashamed to think that you have lived a whole life without caring for Him! What will it be to wake up in the next world and to see the glory of God around you—the glory of the God whom you despised! Oh, the shame that will come over the ungodly in judgment! It is written, "They shall wake up to shame and everlasting contempt." Every intelligent being that is right toward God will despise the man that forsook God and turned away from Him. "They shall wake up to shame and everlasting contempt." What a waking!

And then it is added that they "shall be

that is, if they turn away from God they may win a name for awhile, but it will be merely from the earth, and of the earth. They shall go into oblivion. If you were to go to a school in the East you would find that the children have no slates, and very few of them have wax tablets, for these are rather expensive; and so the schoolmaster spreads the floor with sand or earth, and you see the boys writing their copies on the ground. Then, of course, when they had finished their writing the master would just sweep the floor, and all the writing disappeared. Was this the meaning of our Saviour when He stooped down and wrote on the ground? When they brought to Him the woman taken in adultery, hypocrites that they were, you remember He stooped down and wrote on the ground as though He heard them not; as much as to say, "I shall rub it all out again; all that you have to say will be forgotten." So will it be with men who do not trust in God. Their names will be written in the sand, and in a little time the great foot of Providence will obliterate them all, and they will be quite forgotten.

The text tells us that there shall come something besides this; they that forsake God shall one day be sore athirst even unto death, "because they have forsaken the Lord, the fountain of living waters." There is for the soul but one fountain of water, flowing, cool, clear, ever refreshing. You must have God in Christ Jesus or else you will be as one that is parched with

THIRST IN THE SAHARA.

He looks around him eagerly for a well, but sees nothing save an ocean of sand. He rushes this way till the hot sand beneath his feet burns out of him all power to move; anon he struggles to his feet, and turns in the other direction, but with equal disappointment. He lifts his hands; he cries; he tears his hair in utter despair; he stoops down, he scoops a hole in the ground, he would fain dig to the very centre to find drink, but all in vain, he must pine away and die. His mouth is an oven, his tongue a firebrand, himself the victim of death. So, poor heart, there is nothing for you but God; if you forsake Him you die.

Young man, you are miserable to-day; you used to enjoy the theatre, and even baser amusement; but you cannot rejoice in them now, and I am thankful you cannot. You are becoming dissatisfied and wretched, but you need not remain so. Here is the living water fresh and free, and the Spirit bids me cry, "Whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." The supply for your soul is only to be found in this one well, the well of Bethlehem, the well which springs up from the depths of eternal love in Christ Jesus our Lord. God still sits enthroned in Jesus as upon a glorious high throne; He there receives thirsty sinners to Himself, and gives them to drink till they are filled to the full.

Oh, when I take hold of my God I do not seem as if I wanted anything else. If I have God in Christ then am I all content, filled with all the fulness of God. "But troubles will come." Never mind troubles as long as you have your God. I feel sometimes like Rutherford when he said he could swim through seven hells to get at Christ. So a man might well do. You will not mind the trials of life when once you know that God is yours. A boy once said to his fellow, "John, would you like to have been Elijah? Would you have dared to get into that chariot of fire with horses of fire?" "Yes," said the other, "I would not mind if God drove." That is how believers feel about everything. If God drives let us be fully at ease, for all must be well; if the Lord be King, those who trust in Him are safe. Since Jehovah rules, and overrules, we mount the chariot of fire or walk the waves of the sea and we are secure in either case. If the worst comes to the worst, we shall be wafted to the best place of all, up to the throne of God, to the right hand of the Most High. Wherefore, comfort one another with these words all ye who find sanctuary in your God; but if you trust not in the hope of Israel, you must thirst forever and never attain to satisfaction.

III. Thirdly, and lastly, let us look at

THE COMERS TO GOD.

Those who come to God—how do they come? Very briefly, they come away from all the world. Poor Jeremiah had nobody to help him or comfort him; the best of the men that he met with were sharper than a thorn hedge, they only wounded him; therefore he came right out from them, and confessed that Jehovah, the hope of Israel, was his God and his sanctuary. He set himself quite alone for God and His fear. Come, then, you that wish to come to God, and find Him to be your sanctuary; come right out from the world. If you try to be like worldlings, I hope they will not welcome your imitation. Whenever I am told of a man's holding with the hare and running with the hounds, I am always glad to hear that the dogs bite him. What business has he with the dogs? Come right out! O soul, if thou wouldst have peace, come away to your God. Never take your place with those who shall be written in the earth.

But come to God with faith. It was grand faith of Jeremiah which enabled him to say, "Heal me, and I shall be healed." Sick as I am, if Thou wilt act as physician to me I shall be cured; if Thou save me, lost as I am, I shall be saved. Come along, poor sinner. "Where, sir?" say you. To God in Christ Jesus. This is the Gospel: "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else." "Come now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord; though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson they shall be as wool." Come to your God, come to your God in Christ Jesus with the full conviction that He can and will heal you. "Heal me, and I shall be healed: save me, and I shall be saved."

SCENES IN THE LIFE OF THE LATE SIR BARTLE FRERE.

On June 19th there appeared in this journal a portrait of the eminent Christian statesman who died recently. We now give, on page 444, pictures of three scenes in his remarkable career.

The sketch on the left of the page depicts that memorable scene in which the true greatness of the noble governor was most severely tested. He was at the head of a mere handful of Europeans, surrounded by a native population outnumbering them a hundred to one. But he knew that others in the neighboring province of the Punjaub—his own countrymen—were in greater danger. Some men would in such circumstances have thought first of self-preservation. But Sir Bartle Frere had not thus learned Christ. Summoning the commanding officer of the troops, placed there for the defence of himself and his little band of Europeans, he ordered him to go to Sir John Lawrence and aid in the work of defence. The officer looked at him in amazement, astonished by such a display of courage in circumstances of peril; but he obeyed, and the event proved how wisely the brave governor had acted.

The centre sketch represents his interview with the Sultan of Zanzibar when he was sent by his government to negotiate with that potentate for the suppression of the slave trade in his dominions. Sir Bartle Frere arrived in Zanzibar in October, 1872, and immediately introduced to the Sultan the object of his visit. This was no ordinary diplomatic work. He, as the representative of Great Britain, was there to induce the Sultan to abandon, on principle, a source of revenue. Had the conditions been reversed, and a diplomatic representative been sent to England to induce her to give up the opium trade, or to prohibit the export of rum into any country, success might not have been achieved. As it was, Sir Bartle Frere found his task by no means easy. It was not until May, 1873, more than seven months after his arrival, that he had the gratification of witnessing the signature of the Sultan to a treaty by which he pledged himself to stop the trade in slaves from his dominions.

The sketch on the right represents the meeting in London between Cetawayo, the conquered King of the Zulus, with Sir Bartle Frere, the statesman above all others the cause of his fall. It was in 1877 that Sir Bartle Frere was sent to the Cape of Good Hope as High Commissioner of South Africa and Governor of Cape Colony. There he met with checkered fortunes. Mr. Shepstone and a few policemen had annexed the Transvaal without opposition of any sort, but there were symptoms of Boer disaffection, and Sir Bartle visited that country to soothe their ruffled feelings. At the same time the late Cetewayo, the Zulu King, had formed a large and valiant army, which, in the estimation of Sir Bartle Frere, menaced the settlers in Natal. The consequence was the memorable Zulu war, undertaken without special reference to the home government. We need only name Isandula, Rorke's Drift, and Ulundi to recall the painful characteristics of a contest which reacted so powerfully upon political party fortunes in England, and brought about the displacement of one government for another. But whether Sir Bartle Frere were right or wrong, even his most bitter opponents admitted that he acted from lofty, patriotic motives, that his single aim was to do his duty by the Queen and country he had always so faithfully served, and that he never quailed before investigation or tried to save his reputation by disclaiming responsibility for his actions. The visit of Cetawayo to England gave the King and the author of his overthrow an opportunity of friendly meeting, which on both sides appeared to be appeciated.

GOSPEL WORK AMONG THE HEATHEN.

Fleeing from the Zulus.—The Rev. Owen Watkin, of Africa, speaking of the May meetings of the Methodists in the Transvaal, narrated the particulars of a fugitive missionary and his converts when threatened with death. He said: "They knew that enemies were abroad, and that the Zulu armies were not very far off. They thought the matter over, and said to the missionary, 'What shall we do?' He said, 'I do not know; we will pray to God over it; we will ask the Lord, for we are in a great strait.' And he then went into the middle of the road, and having taken a wand from a neighboring marsh, and having peeled it—with some notion of the Old Testament mode of doing things in his head—and there holding this wand in his hand, he prayed that the Lord God of Israel who had redeemed His people, and who had sent him to that heathen nation, and had enabled him to gather these out of the tribes, that by the falling of the wand He would teach him the way in which they were to go. Then putting the wand as straight as he could, he allowed it to fall, and the wand fell right down on the middle of the road toward Natal. Without a moment's hesitation, away they went toward Natal. Now, mark the providence of God; for if they had taken the other way toward the Drachensberg Mountains, they would have gone right into the van of the Zulu army, and not an individual would have escaped alive."

Brave Death of a Native Christian.—"Our first native convert to Christ was Samuel Antley Fown. I had the pleasure of hearing his confession of faith in the dear Saviour before he was baptized by my then colleague, the Rev. W. B. Luddington. He has only recently died, and this is his testimony in view of eternity: 'I am dying. All men must die. I am going to my Master. Be not afraid because of my death. The heathen people and the devil-men will perhaps try to persuade you that Fown was killed by the spirit whom you worship because he became a Christian, but do not believe them, attend regularly all the means of grace, and give yourself to God's dear Son, Jesus Christ, who alone can save you.'"

A Youthful Native Missionary.—The Rev. E. Lewis, of Bellary, Southern India, says: "I love to see little ones showing signs of giving their hearts to the Saviour. I have a little Indian boy at my home, at Bellary, whom we are trying to influence for good, and I sometimes wonder whether my own boy's heart will be touched by the Holy Spirit as that boy's heart seems to be. Last year I was out with the boy, who is about sixteen years old, in a country district. We were in the middle of a bazaar, or place of merchandise, and I said to the boy, 'Ratnappa, would you like to say a few words to the children?' 'If you like, sir,' he replied; and the dear little fellow stood up there, and for about twenty minutes gave one of the most touching and earnest missionary Christian addresses I had heard in the Canarese language for a long time. I love the boy, and I wonder whether my own boy will be able one day to accept Christ, and preach Him, and whether there is anybody watching over my child, as I am watching over that little Hindoo boy."

A Captive and the Hymn Book.—The Rev. W. Thompson, says: "I had a touching illustration of the character of the work being done in Africa. We were in the midst of one of the most warlike Matabele tribes, who had taken among their captives two women, one of whom found on the back of our wagon a hymn-book in her own language. The tears came into her eyes as she began to sing some of those hymns which she had learned in her own village, and it was a touching sight to see her and her fellow-captive crooning over this Christian hymn-book and finding comfort therein. One of the women looked up when my companion, the devoted missionary, Mr. Price, approached them, and after gazing at him for some time, she said, 'Are you not Mr. Price?' 'Yes,' he replied, and her whole heart seemed to come into her face as she recognized the friend who had first brought to her the knowledge of Christ as her Saviour, and the glad tidings of the Gospel. Sad as was the incident, it was also refreshing; it showed very clearly that good work had been done."

Hindoo Merchants at a Bible Stall.—The Rev. E. Lewis, of Bellary, Madras, relates: "In one town a number of merchants, always eager for gain, came to my book-stall and asked the price of the books. We at once told them the price, and commended them to their attention. One man said to another close by, 'If that were only a blank book what a treasure it would be for our accounts.' We took up their remark, spoke of the Bible as revealing the will and love of our Father in heaven, read various passages from the Gospels, and then, appealing to our congregation, we said, 'Is it not better that you should have a revelation of these truths made to you than that you should have merely a blank book for your accounts?' We told them what the Bible had done for the British nation, and what it had done for other nations as well. One of our hearers said, 'If this were a blank book, it would be like the heavens without the sun.' 'Yes,' said another, 'or like a big well without water.' A third said, 'It would be like a barren field without grain in harvest time.'"

EDITH'S INTERCESSION.

It was noon in a large city, and the shrill whistles of a score of manufactories announced the fact in discordant tones to the ears of operatives, who welcomed the sound, and made no complaint of its lack of musical sweetness. The streets were soon alive with an eager, hurrying throng, intent on putting the half hour to its proper use. Mingled with men whose hands and faces were grimy, and whose clothes bore marks of their occupation, were a few ladies, neatly but inexpensively dressed. They, too, were released for half an hour only, and were walking rapidly from the telegraph office, where they were employed, to a popular restaurant in the neighborhood. These latter were watched with a close scrutiny by a fashionable young man, whose massive watch chain and jewelled breast-pin and rings marked him out as a member of that class which thinks more of personal adornment than of mental culture, and for which the title of "dude" has been newly coined.

Only a few minutes he waited, looking in each face as it passed him; and then, stepping forward with a look of relief, he said, "Edith, Edith, wait a moment, I want to speak to you."

"Why, Edward, is that you?" said a young lady of some twenty years of age, turning upon him a bright, intelligent face.

"Turn down this street," the young man said, "it is quiet here. I have something serious to tell you."

Edith placed her hand on her brother's arm, and took the direction he indicated. "It is nothing very bad, I hope, Edward," she said. "Now you have given up cards and billiards your greatest dangers are overcome. What is the trouble?"

"I am ashamed to tell you, Edith. But I have no one else to sympathize with me and advise me. You were always my friend. Don't desert me in my extremity. Promise me you will stand by me now."

"You know, Edward, I shall never desert you, but it is very cruel of you to get into scrapes that require my help. Your love for our mother and respect for our father's memory ought to keep you on the right track, even if you have no principles of your own. But you have not told me yet what is the matter."

"The fact is, Edith, there is a shortage in my accounts at the office. I did not tell you of it before, but it has been going on for more than two years. I knew it would distress you if you knew, and I hoped something would turn up to make it right. I think the secretary knew of it, but he could not expose me because he was aware that I knew his own accounts were wrong. So I thought I was safe for a time with him to shield me. But he absconded two days ago, and the directors are making a thorough investigation. They will surely find out my deficiency, and then I shall be arrested."

"This is awful, Edward. How much are you short?"

"Over five thousand dollars—I don't know exactly, but it is under six thousand."

"What do you want me to do, Edward? You know I cannot find you money. You had every cent of my savings six months ago. What did you do with that four hundred dollars?"

"I told you at the time, Edith. You made me promise to quit playing cards and billiards, and I told you then I could not do so until I had paid my debts. It took all that and more to clear me."

"Then what can I do? How did you come to take the company's money?"

"I have been a fool, Edith. I have lived up to my salary. Spent every cent in trying to dress and live as a gentleman, and of course I could not let you keep our mother and the home out of your earnings. I paid my share, which was little enough, toward the family expenses. Every month I was a little short, and each month I hoped the next month would be better, so I just used a little of the money in my hands, thinking I could replace it very soon. I had no idea how much it aggregated till about a month ago, when I added it up."

"I am ashamed of you, Edward. I could pity a man who stole money to buy bread, wrong as that is; but to steal to buy luxuries is the lowest depth of meanness, beside the awful sin of the thing. What will mother say! It will break her heart. She thinks so much of our good name, and of you too. How could you do it?"

"I knew you would be angry, Edith, and you cannot reproach me more bitterly than I reproach myself; but that does no good now. I must try to avoid arrest. I thought once I would do as the secretary has done, but I could not bear to leave you and mother. I thought you would go with me to Uncle William and ask him to help us. He will do anything for you, and he could easily lend us the money."

"I don't like going, Edward. It will be a very painful thing, for you know he has reproved you for extravagance often. He will be very angry."

"Yes, I expect that; but he will end by giving the money, and I will economize and pay him back by instalments. If you ask him, I am sure he will do it."

"I am not sure," Edith said. "He might do it for mother or for me, but he will not like helping you, because you ridicule him for being parsimonious. However, I will go to him tonight by the first train after I leave the office."

"That won't do, Edith. It will be too late then. I want you to come now. There is not a moment to be lost. The examiners began on my books this morning, and I must have the money there soon or all will be discovered. Now be a good sister, and come right away. There is a train at 1:30."

"Well, I will go back to the office, Edward, and explain, and then I will meet you at the depot." So saying, Edith hurried away, while Edward strolled toward the railroad depot. She readily obtained leave of absence, and then went on to the depot. Edward was not in the waiting-room, and she wondered where he could be; but a glance at the clock told her the time of the train starting was so near that she had not a moment to lose. It was possible that Edward, not liking to be in the midst of the crowd in the waiting-room, had gone to the platform. She therefore bought her ticket and passed through the gate toward the train.

"Step lively, lady. You have only just time," said the gateman, as he closed the gate after her. But Edith came to a sudden stop just within the gate. She was struck with horror. She saw Edward move from his position close to the car-door to meet her, when two policemen stepped between them and laid their hands on her brother. The worst had come. It was too late to save him. She forgot in that moment his wrong-doing, his weakness, and his frivolity; she thought only of his misery. She went to him, and with sisterly compassion put her arms around his neck and kissed him, whispering as she did so that she would go alone to her uncle and do her utmost in his behalf.

Edith Witnesses her Brother's Arrest.

Edith never forgot that journey. In the car with her were several acquaintances travelling on a pleasure excursion, chatting merrily and full of life and spirits, while in her heart was this terrible sorrow. Never did advocate plead for the life of a client as she did with her uncle for her brother. As she expected, he was averse to helping a youth who had so forgotten his widowed mother, his sister, his dead father's name, and his father's God. He would help to any extent the widow and the brave girl who toiled day by day for an honest livelihood, but for the graceless young scamp who had disgraced his name he would do nothing.

Edith, however, was not to be denied. The old man loved her dearly, and he saw that his refusal was breaking her heart. Eventually he consented to see if terms could be made, and accompanied her back to the city. He went alone to the directors, several of whom he knew, and succeeded, by replacing his nephew's deficiency, in inducing them to withdraw the prosecution. Edith met him as he came away, and together they went to the prison where Edward was confined. Edith's first words told her brother of her success, and the penitent youth flung himself at his uncle's feet and wept tears of gratitude.

"Get up, young man," said the uncle; "I do not want your thanks. I have done nothing for you. All I have done has been for your sister's sake. You are unworthy of her, and if it had not been for her I would have left you to your fate. If you want to show your gratitude, let me see you lead a different life. Then I will believe in it."

Edward vowed that his uncle should have no reason to regret his kindness, and he kept his vow. In another city he obtained employment, less genteel and less profitable, but he had learned a lesson he never forgot, and he earnestly and honestly sought, not without success, to retrieve the past.

How many sinners have thus found favor in the sight of others through the merits of some one else! Our own feelings and our own experience enable us to understand such things. But when we come to the far higher, clearer and grander conception of man receiving pardon for Christ's sake, the idea is not understood or accepted. Yet God is far more loving and ready to forgive than man, and Jesus Himself said, "I say not unto you, that I will pray the Father for you; for the Father Himself loveth you" (John 16 : 26).

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Visit to Hester's Workshop.

JOHN MORLEY'S lobby had a damp, earthy smell, at which Grant uttered a significant "Faugh!" He passed on, followed by Carl, up the staircase to Hester's little sitting-room, the door of which was half open. It was the same homely, austere, bare room where Robert had passed his weary hours of convalescence. To Carl's student-eyes it was full of charms: the glitter of gilded bindings upon the bookshelves; the pile of snowy work upon the table where Hester had been sewing, with an open volume before her. A small thimble lay upon the page, so curious and rare a toy to Carl that he could not forbear to take it up and try it upon his own fingers, one after the other, until it fitted the least.

He wished that Miss Waldron would sometimes employ herself with sewing. The open book was one of his special favorites; and several others upon the shelves were well worth his own reading. He put his hat down on the table near to Hester's work, and regarded the whole with a singularly pleased smile upon his lips. There were no more than two chairs in the room, Hester's and another. He took the other, and looked across to her seat beside the white work and the open book and the thimble lying upon the page. Miss Waldron's kind admonitions were all lost upon him.

He had been in the room, Hester's sanctuary, alone, for Grant had left him there while he went to seek her. Grant was not actually away more than a minute, for he had gone only to the end of the long passage, to the door which connected the workroom with the dwelling, and there shouted to Lawson, in his loud, sonorous voice, to ask if she was up in the attic. Hester's own clear tone had answered, inviting him to come up to her. He went back to fetch Carl.

"She says we are to go up to her," he announced.

"Who says?" asked Carl absently.

"Who says?" echoed Grant; "good gracious, Carl, what a dreamy fellow you are! Why, Hester says so, Hester Morley. I wonder at you. Come along with me."

Carl followed him, almost with a guilty conscience, a sense of treachery and disobedience to Miss Waldron. Yet was it not decidedly his duty to become acquainted with Hester? He would set so strict a guard over himself that he would not fall into the danger his kind sisterly friend apprehended. He knew indistinctly that they were passing through some remarkably dingy rooms and up a narrow staircase; and then they came to a flood of sunshine, and a glorified attic, with a young, lovely, graceful girl standing in the midst of the sunbeams, glowing and blushing with surprise, and looking into his face with shy, almost timid, gray eyes.

It was time for Carl to shake off his absence of mind. It was perfectly necessary that he should conduct himself as a pastor. After uttering a few words, what he knew not, he looked round the curious apartment, and saw an undersized and withered-looking man standing behind Hester. When he met Carl's eyes he bowed profoundly, and with an ease that confounded the young scholar, who had made no study of any mode of salutation. It was a full minute before he could venture to glance at Hester again, but when he did so, she had turned back to the binding-press in the window where Grant was looking carefully at her work. Carl drew a step or two nearer to them.

"Mr. Bramwell," she said, "this is my own work. I have learned to gild the books after Lawson has bound them. This is Lawson, my father's bookbinder, and my oldest friend."

Carl shook hands cordially with Lawson.

"Mr. Grant ought not to have brought you up here the very first time," continued Hester, a little reassured. "I did not know you were with him, or I should have come down-stairs to you."

"I am very glad you did not know," said Carl, with difficulty.

"I am not sure that I am altogether sorry," answered Hester, feeling a girlish sympathy with his evident embarrassment, and talking the more fluently because of it. "You know I have seen you several times already, though I have not spoken to you and I do not feel as if you were quite a stranger. Besides, Mr. Grant has talked to me a great deal about you and your sister. I know all about her; and I do hope she will like me very much when she comes to live at Little Aston.

"I think," said Hester, with a charming little toss of her head, "it is quite as well you should know at once that I belong to the working classes. Yes, I work up here five or six hours a day, for poor Lawson's hand is not always steady enough for it. I am not at all an idle, elegant young lady; Mr. Grant will tell you that. He sits by the press sometimes for a whole hour watching me. We will go down-stairs now," said Hester, after a moment's pause; and she took off her large apron, and smoothed down the sleeves which had been rolled up above her round and dimpled elbows. "My father will be very glad to see you, Mr. Bramwell. For the last three or four years Mr. Watson could not come often to see us, and my father receives no other visitors, except Mr. Grant."

Carl followed her down-stairs, wondering at his own silence and the difficulty he felt in speaking to her. Relief came to him in John Morley's presence, for the melancholy and reserved man brightened at the appearance of him and Grant. The fire and beauty of their early manhood, its freshness and buoyancy, had still a nameless charm for him in the midst of his disease and gloom. He listened to their keen, lively conversation, and allowed himself to be drawn into its current. Carl was conscious of talking well and aptly, and of interesting his host; and he stayed so long that Grant was compelled to leave him. He scarcely knew how he had the courage and resolution to say farewell at last; but he awoke from a confused trance as his foot struck against the massive door-sill of the entrance-hall at Aston Court, and he felt that the next minute he should be in the presence of Miss Waldron.

Should he tell her where he had been, or keep it a secret from her? He felt guilty enough to know that he had gone very near the folly against which she had so emphatically warned him. Yet he was a free man, in bondage to no one. But did not any friendship, and especially a friendship so close and discriminating as Miss Waldron's, in some measure militate against freedom in its completeness? Did he not owe a return of frankness and confidence to one who was so entirely open to him? Yet, on the other hand, what had he to tell? No; there was nothing to say about his visit, and it would only give rise to misapprehension in Miss Waldron's mind if he mentioned it.

With this reflection, amounting almost to a resolution, he went on into the drawing-room, where, the servant told him, volunteering the information with a covert smile, he would find Miss Waldron. She greeted his arrival with the blandest of welcomes, and invited him to a seat upon an ottoman placed near to her own lounging chair in front of a window. She was herself in the shade of the curtains, which shed a becoming hue over her somewhat faded face.

"You have been absent for some time," she said, softly; "it is more than an hour since I went to the library to look for a volume of Kitto, and you were then gone away. Have you been making some visits among our people?"

"I went to see Grant," answered Carl, with an air of hesitation.

"To be sure," she continued; "I suppose he is now very busy with his preparations. Is there nothing I can do to help them on? You know for your sister I should be delighted to do anything in my power; only I suppose we shall lose you when she comes to Little Aston."

Miss Waldron heaved a sigh, which spoke inexpressible things, and remained silently musing, with a sad eye fixed upon the future, for some moments. She then resumed her conversation rather abruptly.

"Then you only went to see Mr. Grant," she said.

"No, not exactly," stammered Carl; "at least, I went only with the intention of seeing him, but he asked me to go across with him to Mr. Morley's."

"Indeed!" said Miss Waldron, with a significant coldness in her tone; and then she betook herself to silence, which extracted more information from Carl than the most persevering cross-examination would have done.

"We went across," he said, in hurried accents; "and as Mr. Morley was engaged, Grant took me up-stairs into the workshop, where the binding is done. Hester was there, but we stayed only a few minutes, and then we came down to see Mr. Morley. He is, as Grant says, a singular study; and it is possible that I may do him good."

"And get harm to yourself," she replied, forebodingly.

"No, I think not," he said; "but if it were so, should I do well to set my own welfare before his? Ought I never to run any risk to myself for the sake of the souls of my people? We applaud those who go into a plague-house at the peril of their own lives; and should not I, in my ministry to others, sometimes lose sight of my own special welfare?"

He spoke with ardor and agitation, while Miss Waldron fixed upon him a dull gaze of wonder and disapprobation.

"I do not agree with you," she said; "no charge can be so important as that of your own soul. But I will pray for you that you may not be overtaken in a snare. Would it not be a help to you if we met one another at the throne of grace at some stated time?"

Carl was perplexed, and looked questioningly into Miss Waldron's face.

"I scarcely understand," he said.

"I mean, shall we appoint a season when we may both pray in our own closets, with the knowledge that the other is similarly engaged at the same moment? It is a great help to those who try it."

Carl shaded his eyes with his hand, and steadily studied the pattern of the carpet before he replied. A man of his age and temperament is often more retiring than a woman of Miss Waldron's years and disposition. He did not raise his eyes, and he looked very much put out of countenance.

"I think not," he murmured; "there is such a solemn secrecy in prayer between God and our souls. I feel as if we ought to be alone before Him. Some may find it a help, but I think it would distract me."

A silence of several minutes followed, which was becoming almost terrible to him; when at last Miss Waldron broke it in tones of profound emotion:

"Still I will pray for you," she said, "and watch for your soul. I proposed it for your sake only, that you might feel that you were not contending with the tempter alone. You are not alone—you never will be while I remain your friend."

She rose, sobbing, and retired, leaving Carl in an uncomfortable state of doubt as to whether he had not behaved like a brute.

The marriage of Grant with Carl's sister was celebrated as soon as they could enter into possession of their pleasant house on the road to Aston Court. It was within a few hundred yards of the park gates, and in the direct route between the court and the town. As soon as Grant returned from the necessarily brief tour of a young country surgeon, Carl quitted Aston Court, and took up his permanent abode in their new home.

Miss Waldron had manifested a very charming interest in everything relating to Carl's sister; and had added several ornaments and luxuries to her dwelling even before having seen her. Nothing could surpass the emphasis of her patronage and kindness to the young wife, upon her entrance into her new sphere. Oddly enough, there was a superficial resemblance between Annie Grant and Rose Morley, which struck painfully upon Mr. Waldron, though it escaped the observation of his daughter. She possessed the same slight and girlish figure and the same fair hair and blue eyes; yet the similarity of circumstances and position, in the first pride and happiness of marriage, may have formed the chief resemblance between them. The same impression was produced by her on the mind of Hester. She had not been witness to the gay and innocent importance of a young wife since she had seen it in her stepmother. The old memories rushed back like a flood upon her, and the old sadness, which had been lighter of late, once more returned to her face.

It is probable that John Morley himself was oppressed by this likeness; for even his friendship for Grant and Carl, a passive, undemonstrative sort of friendship, was not strong enough to induce him to traverse the market-square of Little Aston, and approach the gates of Aston Court, in order to pay a wedding visit to the young doctor and his bride. Annie Grant went to see him, but her gay looks, her cheerful voice, and the bright colors of her dress, all jarred upon his morbid nature. After her visit, he had an access of melancholy which reacted upon Hester. They felt that they dwelt apart in a charmed circle, which they could not pass, and which no other could enter. Yet there was one other encircled by the same heavy chain, who could no more escape from it than they could. Robert Waldron stood aloof from all the small festivities of the honeymoon; and his obvious melancholy strengthened the link between him and Hester. These others, so glad and happy, and hopeful, what had they in common with her? Their eyes were too dazzled with light to see clearly into the darkness where she and her father dwelt. She loved them with a love which excluded envy, but fate placed her altogether apart from them all.

She did not go so often as she might have done to Grant's house, or so often as Carl had, unconsciously to himself, hoped she would have done. He did not associate with her in the pleasant familiarity he had looked for. To be sure, his actions were now free from the hourly scrutiny of Miss Waldron; but her kindly surveillance was not at an end. The distance between the two houses was not great, and there was no part of the town to traverse. She could come up in the most negligent and becoming morning costume, or even with a shawl thrown over her evening toilet, to spend only a few minutes with dear Mrs. Grant, at the most unexpected of hours. Her studies were growing more profound than ever, and Carl's Hebrew and Greek were in perpetual request. She soon knew the place of every book upon his shelves better than he did, and often employed herself with setting them in order for him. He felt that he ought to be grateful, and he strove to be so. It was impossible for him not to be pleased and flattered.

Robert Waldron did not miss seeing his advantage, and making the most of it. Hester went the oftener to visit Madame Lawson, because she could take no pleasure in going to Grant's house; and he did not fail to meet her there as often as he judged it prudent. It had become an unnecessary thing to make any excuse for seeing her thus, as Hester had fallen into a habit of taking it tacitly for granted. In a place so small as Little Aston it required some tact to prevent their meetings becoming known; but he was a master of ingenuity. Besides, the entrance to the court was not commanded by any window, except those of the house where old Mr. Watson had used to live. The few inmates of the court were working folks, who had enough to do to mind their own business; and the woman of the house he gained over by judicious presents. There was positively no danger, either to Hester or him, of their secret being betrayed. He considered himself advancing, with sure and steady progress, toward his end.

GOD'S COVENANT WITH DAVID.

S. S. Lesson for July 20, II Sam. 7. Golden Text, ver. 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

David's Varied Experience — God with him through it all—At Rest at Last—Seeking an Expression of Gratitude—The Project of the Temple—Going to Egypt for Help—David's Project Vetoed—Half Messages Misleading—Wait for Full Direction—God to Originate, Man to Obey—A Covenant of Family Blessings—David Overwhelmed with Thankfuln ss.

WE have seen David in various positions. First as a shepherd lad, but one who knew the Lord was his Shepherd, one who could trust the Lord to deliver him out of the paw of the lion and out of the paw of the bear. Most truly the Lord was with him. Then we have seen him as the anointed of God, and yet disowned of man, serving his God in the court of the rejected Saul; most manifestly there also the Lord was with him. Again, as the champion of Israel, when the giant Goliath challenged single combat, we have seen David manifesting that the Lord was with him. It was the Lord, not David, who delivered from the lion, the bear, the giant, and King Saul.

Now we see the same David sitting in his house, and "the Lord had given him rest round about from all his enemies;" and we see him with the prophet Nathan, his faithful friend and counsellor, holding communion with God. The king says to Nathan, "See now, I dwell in an house of cedar, but the ark of God dwelleth within curtains." David's heart was full of praise, the Lord had been so faithful to him, had granted him such deliverances from Saul (I Sam. 18 : 11, 25; 19 : 10, 12), from sickness (Ps. 30 : 2; 103 : 3), from the strivings of the people (II Sam. 5 : 1–3); he wanted some substantial vent for the gratitude which welled up within him. What could be more natural than the

for the Lord! He could not bear the thought, "My own house is better cared for than the Lord's." Some such thoughts as this has prompted the outlay of large sums of money on the building of churches, chapels, and halls where the work of God might be carried on. But there are few who come, as David did, to ascertain the Lord's mind about it. "Wouldn't it be a good thing to have here?" says one: and then he sets about getting some money to start with, opens his project to some rich men, a few of whom enter into the scheme; others, who have their hands more than full, are urged into it by a feeling that it is expected of them. It is begun; the men who have given the largest sums must have a voice in the matter, they will have it done in the most expensive way; money is not forthcoming; a heavy debt is contracted; and all kinds of means are resorted to to obtain the money—begging letters, bazaars, noted preachers as a catch for a good collection, and every other kind of going down

TO EGYPT FOR HELP.

How different from the quiet waiting before God to know His mind which we discover in this chapter! Nathan says, "Go, do all that is in Thine heart; for the Lord is with thee." The scheme itself was acceptable to God, and so far David could but be filled with joy. Now should he rush forward and make the plans? No, he would wait for direction from the Lord, "He leadeth me" (Ps. 23 : 2).

God does not keep him long waiting; that very night the word of the Lord came unto Nathan, and God clearly showed His thought in the matter. The first words of God's message by Nathan, "Thou shalt not build me an house to dwell in" (I Chron. 17 : 4), must have appeared to contradict what He had already said, "Do all that is in thine heart." But David knew God well enough to listen to the end of what He had to say. Would that every Christian, and especially every Christian worker, knew how to listen to the Lord! Any child who half hears a parent's word, is apt sadly to misunderstand; any scholar who half hears a lesson, learns nothing perfectly; any servant who half catches a direction from his employer, is apt to go astray. And how much more with us, when we are contented to get hints of God's will instead of waiting for FULL DIRECTION!

There can never be disappointment, regret, or perplexity in following out a path which the Lord has clearly marked for us. In the first place, God reminds David that in all the past He has never spoken of the building of a house; His thought was the tabernacle. "Whereso-ever I have walked with all Israel, spake I a word to any of the judges of Israel, whom I commanded to feed my people, saying, Why have ye not built me an house of cedars?" (I Chron. 17 : 6.) These words teach a great truth. All real service of God must originate with Him. We exist, not to originate or to dictate to God, but to receive and to carry out His thoughts. Satan would have us take the lead, and go before God; would have us reason, and take the place of judges and critics over the Word of God instead of receiving it. Jesus calls us to follow, not to lead, to take the place of the learner just as He did on earth (Isa 50 : 4, 5), and so speak the words which we receive from our Father, and do the things which He calls us to do.

But this point once settled,

THE LORD'S MESSAGE

is full of love and confidence. "Now, therefore, thus shalt thou say unto my servant David, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I took thee from the sheepcote, even from following the sheep, that thou shouldest be ruler over my people Israel; and I have been with thee whithersoever thou hast walked, and have cut off all thine enemies from before thee, and have made thee a name like the name of the great men that are in the earth." All this was true, blessedly true, and the gracious Lord does not stop there, but tells of coming mercy upon David's people, of how He will plant them, He will subdue David's enemies, and "Furthermore I tell thee that the Lord will build thee an house." What a glorious exchange! David desired to build the Lord a house of hewed stones, cedar wood, and gold; God promised to build David in children and children's children, which should walk before Him. And the first representative of this house, his son Solomon, should carry out his heart's desire, and build a temple to the Lord. God said, "I will raise up thy seed after thee, which shall be of thy sons; and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build me an house, and I will establish his throne forever. I will be his Father, and he shall be my son (I Chron. 17 : 11, 12). If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of men, and with the stripes of the children of men: but my mercy shall not depart away from him, as I took it away from Saul, whom I put away before thee." "But I will settle him in mine house and in my kingdom forever: and his throne shall be established forevermore" (II Sam. 7 : 12–16; I Chron. 17 : 11–14).

A HOUSE OF LIVING REPRESENTATIVES,

This was God's side of the covenant; how about David's? "Then went King David in, and sat before the Lord, and he said, Who am I, O Lord God? and what is my house, that Thou hast brought me hitherto? And this was yet a small thing in Thy sight, O Lord God; but Thou hast spoken also of Thy servant's house for a great while to come. And is this the manner of man, O Lord God? And what can David say more unto Thee? For Thou, Lord God, knowest Thy servant." Oh, how different this is from man's energy, setting on foot some plan of earnest work showing great devotion, and yet planned by man and carried out by man; God only called in to bless the plans when they are made! Oh, how much of impatience, how much of condemning those who are supposed able to help, how much restlessness, anxiety, disappointment is saved by LETTING GOD TAKE THE LEAD!

David's thought is to build the temple himself, God overturns it with His thought, and at the same time overwhelms David with unspeakable blessing, and makes covenant with him. Instead of being disappointed that his thought was rejected, he is confounded with the love of God, and says, "For Thy Word's sake, and according to Thine own heart, hast Thou done all these great things, to make Thy servant know them." David is occupied with the Word of God, and with His heart of love; but the child of God who goes before Him is filled with concern for the success of his mission, and is half inclined to quarrel with God that He does not more openly and manifestly acknowledge his devotion. "Wherefore Thou art great, O Lord God," says David, "for there is none like Thee, neither is there any God besides Thee, according to all that we have heard with our ears." Not one word does David speak of his faithfulness or devotion. How often we hear earnest workers saying, "Do come and see our work; we have so many mission halls, so many converted drunkards, so many mothers' meetings, and so forth. David says, these workers say, "Look at us." Speaking of God's past mercies to Israel, the king says, "What one nation in the earth is like Thy people, even like Israel, whom God went to redeem for a people to Himself, and to make Him a name. . . . Thy people, which Thou redeemedst to Thee from Egypt, from the nations and their gods." All throughout he rings the changes on God, what He is, what He says, what He does. Lastly, he loses sight of his own idea of building God an house, in his overwhelming joy at God's communication, "For Thou, O Lord of hosts, God of Israel, hast [opened the ear, see margin] to Thy servant, saying, I will build thee an house: therefore hath Thy servant found in his heart to pray this prayer unto Thee." When God speaks first in communion our prayer flows out of it, there is no longer difficulty on our part.

"LOOK AT GOD;"

In the last two verses we see David accepting the Lord's covenant promise, "Thou art that God, and Thy words be true:" "for Thou blessest, O Lord, and it shall be blessed forever" (I Chron. 17 : 27). Thy words be true: David was not uncertain, he could count upon God, and it shall be blessed forever, for he knew that God could not deny Himself.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Cholera at Toulon, France, Continued its ravages throughout last week, and it extended to Marseilles, where the deaths from the disease varied from four to fifteen per day. Cablegrams to the New York Herald say Toulon presents a most mournful appearance. Almost all the inhabitants whose circumstances enable them to live elsewhere have left the city, and the number of those who have thus fled from the pestilence is estimated at three fourths of the entire population. Of 60,000 taxpayers 40,000 have left the city. The people who remain are of the poorer classes who have no means to go elsewhere, and their condition is pitiable. There is no employment for mechanics and no trade for shopkeepers. With the exception of the dealings in the actual necessities of life trade is at a standstill, and many tradesmen have been ruined. Five of them committed suicide during the present week. Many public officials have deserted their posts, and the people demand their dismissal on the ground that their desertion tends still further to disorganize the community and invite anarchy and pillage. At Marseilles there is the same anxiety to leave the city. The railway stations at both cities are filled with refugees, who are eager to get away. Italy has sent a transport to take the Italians home from the plague-stricken cities. Vessels arriving at Marseilles are prohibited from landing passengers from infected ports. Arrangements have been made to fumigate travellers at the Paris railway stations. A mosquito plague at Marseilles increases the gloomy aspect. A thousand bonfires have been kindled in various parts of the city to disperse the pest.

An Outbreak of Hostilities between France and China is threatened as a consequence of the violation of the treaty mentioned last week. France has made a demand on China of $100,000,000 as indemnity, which China at present refuses to pay. She no longer disavows the responsibility for the conduct of the troops in firing on the French, but declines to admit that there was any violation of the treaty. She refuses to regard the attack as an outrage, and claims that the garrison were merely doing their duty in defending the place. The Chinese Foreign Office now admits that the army had obeyed its orders to retain possession of Langson, though this was contrary to the second article of the recent Franco-Chinese treaty, which provided for the immediate withdrawal of the Chinese garrisons. China, however, contended that the evacuation of the frontier towns was conditional upon the signature of a definitive treaty between France and China. A recent telegram from Paris says: "Mr. Patenotre, the French Minister to China, who has been absent from his post to negotiate a treaty with the King of Annam, has been ordered to go to Pekin immediately and maintain the rights of France. In the event of China's refusing redress for the action of her troops at Lang-son, France will immediately declare war. Active preparations are being made for re-enforcements to leave France for the East."

The Constitutional Reform Question in England engrosses popular attention. The Daily News, which is regarded as Mr. Gladstone's organ, explicitly declares that the House of Lords "must be speedily reformed or it must perish." This conflict has been inevitable for many years. The people have been looking since 1830 with increasing jealousy on the power vested in the Lords of blocking the wheels of progress when they are disposed to exercise it. The more radical section of the citizens has frequently protested against the anomaly of a non-elected house, the members of which hold their seats for life by virtue of their birth, having the power to defeat a law passed by the chosen representatives of the people. To say the truth, the Lords have not often used their power in opposition to the popular will, and they have frequently rendered valuable service by checking crude legislation. A conflict, however, now seems inevitable. The present situation is developed by the proposal to extend the franchise which Mr. Gladstone has carried through the lower House. It cannot, however, become a law until it has passed the House of Lords, where Mr. Gladstone's supporters are in the minority. The majority at a private meeting decided to reject the bill, hence the irritation of the Liberals throughout the country, who declare that the Peers have no right to decide by whom the Commons shall be elected. Mr. Gladstone is advised to take the ready method within his power, of raising to the peerage a sufficient number of his supporters to pass the bill. The suggestion may have the effect of inducing the conservative Lords to withdraw their opposition, as they have a natural horror of having their exclusive body swamped by a heavy influx of a class they dislike.

The Improved Financial Condition of the Irish people forms the subject of an elaborate communication cabled by the British correspondent of the New York Sun. He says that the total reductions made in the rents of the Irish peasantry by the Land commission will amount this year to nearly £3,000,000. It is, perhaps, nearly impossible for people on the American side of the Atlantic to fully appreciate the magnitude of this gain to the Irish people. It not only leaves for circulation among a people numbering less than five millions an increased sum of about $15,000,000, that otherwise would be drained out of the country and spent elsewhere, but it practically reduces Irish taxation $3 per capita. Americans have probably noticed one result—a lessening of demands for the relief of Irish distress. Throughout Ireland the beneficial result is palpable. Poor people who have for long past seldom had a shilling of money in their possession now occasionally may be seen in the small shops, happy in their ability to expend an occasional half sovereign. The general effect upon the temper of the people is very perceptible. The farmers and the shopkeepers who depend upon them are decidedly better off than they have been for several years past. On the other hand, the upper class storekeepers, whose trade consists chiefly in supplying the nobility and landlords, complain bitterly of the dulness of trade. This accounts for the conflicting reports which now go out from Ireland. If you go into a first-class shop you hear that trade was never worse, and if you go into a second-class shop it is generally admitted that trade was never better.

Mormon Missionaries on the Continent of Europe do not find the same toleration they have enjoyed in Great Britain. Elder Smoot, one of the missionaries, has been expelled from Bavaria by order of the Minister of State. Smoot had succeeded in making numerous converts, whom he was preparing to send to Utah, but this plan has been broken up for the present. The German authorities are much agitated over the energy and success of the Mormon emissaries in procuring proselytes and emigrants to Utah in Thuringen and other portions of Prussian Saxony. These Mormon missionaries, it is said, depict the agricultural and other advantages of Utah in glowing terms, but make no straightforward mention of the polygamous practices of this sect. In this way they allure many young women, whose fate after their arrival in Utah is horrible to contemplate, and many young men who are possessed of some capital, none others being accepted. The priests and the military authorities of Saxony have started a crusade against the Mormons, which will probably result in their expulsion from the province, and possibly from the entire empire.

The Pan-Presbyterian Council at Belfast, Ireland, concluded its labors at a late hour on Thursday night, July 3d. A great variety of business was disposed of during the day. A series of rules were submitted, and after some discussion it was agreed to hand them to the Executive Committee for consideration. The committee will report upon them at the next meeting. At the evening session Principal Cairns, of Edinburgh, delivered the farewell address. The Council adjourned to meet in London in 1888. A Presbyterian reunion was held on July 4th, when a committee was appointed to effect a union between the Irish and Scotch Presbyterian churches. Five American delegates and a number of other Americans attended the reunion. The delegates to the Pan-Presbyterian Council were at the meeting. The text of a telegram from President Arthur in response to a greeting sent to him was read, as follows: "Coming from a kindred ancestry, the kind greetings of Irish and Scotch assembled at Belfast to-day are especially pleasing and are very cordially reciprocated."

"Thy Healer," A New Magazine Devoted to the subject of faith-healing, may be had from the office of The Christian Herald, price five cents, including postage. It is issued in London on the first and fifteenth of each month, and will be sent to subscribers promptly on its receipt in New York. The annual subscription is one dollar. It is edited by Mrs. M. Baxter whose expositions of the International Sunday-school lessons are published every week in this journal. It contains incidents of faith-healing reported from Bethshan, the London faith-healing institution, and from other similar institutions in Europe, and articles by eminent writers on the subject.

The movement recently inaugurated to render homage to the memory of Admiral Coligny, by the erection of a statue of him in Paris, has attracted public attention to the life and character of a man of whom the present generation knows little. It is now more than three centuries since that terrible day of St. Bartholomew, when Coligny fell, and with him perished those noble men and women who were the salt of society in France, saving it from utter corruption. The Protestant world to-day, glorying in its freedom from the tyranny of Rome, with an open Bible in its hands and with liberty to preach the gospel everywhere, needs sometimes to be reminded how the blessings it enjoys were obtained, and of the cost at which they were purchased. When the Christian's children, who read that a statue is about to be erected to Coligny, ask their father, "Who was Coligny?" it would be a shame if he were unable to tell them—if a leader in the fight for religious liberty, who gave his life as a sacrifice for the truth, were so completely forgotten three hundred years after his death, that his name was a mere empty sound, even to a Protestant Christian.

Admiral Coligny, Lord of Chatillon, was the leader of the French Protestants of France in the 16th century. He was born in the year 1517, of one of the most noble families of France. He distinguished himself in all the numerous wars of Francis I., especially in a campaign in Italy, where he won his knighthood. After the fashion of those days, he was made an Admiral, though he seems to have known nothing of the sea, and all his great achievements were performed in battles upon the land.

Those were stirring times in France. Vice and corruption flourished in the highest places, and it seemed as if the fate of Sodom and Gomorrah could alone deliver the land from its abominations. But gradually the leaven of the gospel was working among the people, and men were looking earnestly to see whether in the conflict of light and darkness, approaching its crisis, the victory would be won for God. At the opening of the year A.D. 1500, a great barrier stood in the way of all advancement in the direction of human enfranchisement and liberty. The Papal Church upheld despotism, arrested science, suppressed inquiry, and forbade progress. Wherever free thought showed itself, whether in religion or science, the Church endeavored to crush it. For the execution of this purpose

THE INQUISITION WAS ESTABLISHED.

Savonarola was burnt at Florence, and Huss at Constance; while at Rome Bruno was condemned to the stake, and Galileo was imprisoned, if he was not even put to the torture, and compelled to recant his theory of the earth's motion round the sun.

The art of printing had, in the mean time, given wings to Luther's words, and accelerated the coming Reformation in France in a remarkable degree. Though the discovery, like others, struggled slowly and obscurely into life, it is a remarkable circumstance, showing the desire of the people for "the light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," that, wherever the printers set up their trade, they usually began by issuing an edition of the Bible, which was eagerly bought and read.

The Pope of that time, Innocent VIII., a profligate debauchee, dreading the light, as all men do whose deeds are evil, armed the Inquisition with new powers, and wherever the so-called heresy appeared it was crushed unsparingly, unpityingly. No matter what the rank or learning of the suspected heretic might be, he must satisfy the tribunal before which he was brought, or die at the stake. In 1545 a horrible massacre of the Vaudois of Provence was perpetrated, accompanied by atrocities which it is impossible to describe. This terrible persecution, however, did not produce its intended effect; but, on the contrary, it produced a strong reaction in the public mind against the fury of the persecution. Then came a temporary lull in the violence of the persecutions, during which the new views made rapid progress; and men of rank and learning ranged themselves on the side of "The Religion."

as the French Protestants were called, shortly became so numerous as to constitute a considerable power in the State, and they began to exercise a most important influence on the political history of France.

From A.D. 1550 to 1575, persecution again stalked forth along a pathway of blood, but again it failed to check the new views; on the contrary, it extended them. The spectacle of men and women publicly suffering death for Christ's sake and the Gospel's, arrested the attention even of the most sceptical and incredulous. Their curiosity was aroused; they desired to learn what there was in the forbidden Bible to inspire such heroic constancy and jubilant endurance; and they, too, read the Book, and, in many cases, became attached followers of The Religion.

Thus Protestantism spread rapidly all over France, even among the learned and the wealthy. Among the Huguenots were the heads of the ancient house of Bourbon, Antoine, Duke of Vendome, and Louis, Prince of Condé. The former became the husband of the celebrated D'Albret, Queen of Navarre, daughter of the Protestant Margaret of Valois, and the latter became the recognized leader of the Huguenots. The head of the Coligny family took the same side. Indeed, it seemed at one time as if France was on the brink of becoming Protestant. In 1561 the representative of the Pope in France, Cardinal de Sainte-Croix, became seriously alarmed, and wrote to the Pope: "The kingdom is already half Huguenot." Unhappily for France, the country fell into the hands of the Queen and

THE GUISES.

Henry II. had married an Italian wife, Catherine de Medici, niece of the Pope. The Guises were the true leaders of the Roman Catholic party, and were especially active in the persecution. Their intolerance disgusted the French aristocracy, even those who were not Huguenots, but who were revolted by the cruelties of the Guises, and who feared that they were attaining a power in the State which menaced the existence of civil liberty. So deep was this fear that several French nobles, prompted, not by a love of Protestantism, but by motives of state policy, entered into a conspiracy against them, making the religious question the issue of the conflict. Louis de Condé was the invisible chief of the conspiracy, and he induced many of his Huguenot followers to join it. But Coligny and other Huguenot chiefs knew nothing about it, and many of those of The Religion who were taken into the secret were strongly opposed to it. Before the conspiracy came to a head the Guises discovered it, arrested its chief, and executed, by hanging and beheading, about 1200 persons.

A ROYAL EDICT OF PROTECTION.

A conference between the heads of the religious parties took place at Passy, in August, 1561, and in the following January a royal edict was published guaranteeing to the Protestants liberty of worship; but the Papal party still continued clamorous for their extirpation.

On Christmas Day, 1562, the Protestants of Passy, to the number of 3000, met to listen to the preaching of the Word, and to celebrate the Lord's Supper, but they did so under a threat of vengeance from the Duke of Guise. Other meetings were held in other places, these bold Gospellers believing themselves to be under the protection of the law, according to the terms of the royal edict.

On March 1st, 1563, they held one of their meetings, at which about 1200 persons were present in a large barn, which served for a church. The day before, the Duke of Guise, accompanied by his wife and the Cardinal of Lorraine, with about two hundred men, armed with arquebusses and poniards, set out for Passy. The next morning they marched direct upon the congregation assembled in the barn. The minister, Morel, had only begun his opening prayer, when two shots were fired at the persons on the platform. The congregation tried in vain to shut the doors; the followers of the Duke of Guise burst in and precipitated themselves on the unarmed men, women, and children. For an hour they fired, hacked, and stabbed the helpless, unarmed worshippers, the Duke calmly watching the carnage. Sixty persons of both sexes were left dead on the spot; more than two hundred were severely wounded; the rest contrived to escape. (See frontispiece picture No 1.)

The massacre of Passy was the match applied to the charge which was now ready to explode. It was the signal to Catholic France to rise in mass against the Huguenots. The clergy glorified the deed from the pulpit, and compared the Duke's outrage to Moses commanding the extermination of all who had bowed the knee to the golden calf. After this, Protestant churches were set on fire at Paris and Popincourt; and massacres took place at Senlis, Amiens, Meaux, Chalons, Blois, Paris, and many other places. At Tours the number of the slain was so great that for days the banks of the Loire were almost covered with the corpses of men, women, and children.

RESISTANCE TO THE DUKE OF GUISE.

The Prince of Condé raised a standard of resistance to this work of bloodshed, and Coligny, at length aroused by the cruelties on every hand, placed himself by his side. A period of fierce civil war ensued, and the whole of France became a battle-field. On both sides the spirit of revenge glowed at white heat. "It was," says Henri Martin, "as if a blast of the infernal trumpet had everywhere awakened the spirit of destruction, and the delirious fury grew and became drunk with its own excesses."

So things went on until 1572. During the first half of that year there was a temporary truce, owing to the marriage of Henry of Navarre to the King's sister. The bridegroom was the chief of the Huguenots, and on each side it was hoped that an end might now be put to the feuds and civil wars that had so long prevailed between the rival religious communities of France. The marriage was celebrated with great splendor in the cathedral church of Notre Dame, on August 18th; and believing in the pretended and somewhat ostentatious friendship of the Queen-mother, and her son, the heads of the Reformed party, including Admiral Coligny, were present to celebrate the event and grace the royal nuptials. The fears of the Huguenots were completely disarmed, and they fell into the snare.

On the day after the marriage a secret council was held in Catherine's private chamber, in the old palace of the Louvre, at which it was determined to order a general massacre of the Huguenots. A strict inquiry had been made through the provinces, that the names of all might be known. The young King took up a pen to sign the order for the slaughter, and casting his eyes on the ground, with struggling feelings, cried, "Since it is to be done, take care that no one escapes to reproach me."

The time fixed was

ST. BARTHOLOMEW'S DAY,

August 24th, 1572, the hour, three o'clock in ne morning, when their victims would be sleeping in their beds; the signal, the tolling of a great bell of one of the churches; the conductor f the massacre, the wicked Duke of Guise. he gates were closed, and the walls secured; ghts were to be hung out from the highest oints in the city, that the marks secretly laced on the houses of the doomed might be een.

The armed bands moved to the places assigned nem, eager for their work of blood. In the alace of the Louvre all were wakeful. The King as restless and troubled in his mind. He eemed to recoil at the thought of the guilt bout to fall on his soul. He would have recalled the order he had given; but his mother, Queen Catherine, entered his chamber shortly fter midnight to confirm him in the horrid eed. She then led him to a window to await he event. And there, until the city clocks truck two, stood a Queen-mother, encouraging er royal son to stain his hands and soul with a housand murders!

It was one of those calm, lovely nights, so frequent in France, in the early autumn. A gentle reeze passed over the gardens of the Louvre; nd the host of stars above seemed, in their soft ustre, to speak only of peace to man. The ilence of the night, however, was broken by

THE REPORT OF A PISTOL.

Charles shook with terror, and cold drops tood upon his brow.* The sound of the pistol-shot was answered by the booming of the reat bell, when, simultaneously, all the rest of he bells of the churches tolled out the signal. The armed men now sprang from their hiding-places, shouting, as they rushed along the treets, "Kill! kill! Death to the Huguenots!" (See frontispiece picture No. 2.) The shrill ounds of the bells, the clatter of arms, the ramp of the assassins, and the shrieks of the lying, soon mingled in one long, loud, terrific ound. The Duke of Guise was determined to nticipate all others in

THE MURDER OF COLIGNY.

Hastening to his hotel, the Duke's party burst pen the outer door. The Admiral was roused rom his slumbers by the shots fired at his followers in the courtyard below. He arose from is couch, and committed his soul into the ands of God. He then fled to an upper hamber. Thither he was tracked by his assasins. One of the soldiers, preparing to strike im with his sword, exclaimed, "Art thou not he Admiral?" "I am," he fearlessly replied; 'but, young man, respect these gray hairs, nor tain them with my blood." In another noment, regardless of the appeal, the man lunged his sword into his breast. (See frontispiece picture No 3.) After receiving nameless outrages, his body was thrown out of the window, at the feet of one of the French rinces, who, spurning it, cried out, "Courage, ny friends, we have had a lucky beginning; let us finish in the same manner." The headless runk of the good Admiral was then dragged hrough the streets of Paris, and afterward hung up by the feet to the common gallows.

From morning till night, the revolting butchery went on, until darkness put an end to he work of blood. The next day it was carried on again; and for five days the soldiery and the ruffians of the city, excited by the carnage and the acquisition of plunder, slew every Huguenot whom they could discover.

The provincial towns throughout the country were ordered to follow the example of Paris, and the horrible mandate was only too well carried out. At Bordeaux, where a large number of the persecuted were holding a religious meeting, the dragoons suddenly fell upon them, cutting down hundreds, without mercy, and dispersing the rest. (See frontispiece picture No 4.) "It was a mere butchery," says Rulhières, 'without the show of a combat."

* It is recorded of him that years afterward, when he lay upon his dying bed, he thought of St. Bartholomew, and suffered agonies of remorse so severe, that his body was covered with a bloody sweat forced from the pores of his skin by his spiritual anguish.

Among the most interesting of hundreds of

of Huguenot refugees, we may instance the following. A French lady of Bordeaux sold all the property she could convert into money, with which she purchased jewels, as being the most convenient form in which to carry her property, and contrived to get on board an English ship in the thick darkness of night, bringing with her the little casket of jewels—her sole fortune. She remained in a state of fear and anxiety till the ship was under sail; but no sonner did she find herself fairly out at sea, and the land disappearing in the distance, than she breathed freely, and gave expression to her feelings of joy and gratitude.

This increased in proportion as she neared England, though about to land there an exile, a solitary woman, and a foreigner; and as soon as she did reach the shore, she threw herself down, and, passionately kissing the ground, exclaimed, "Have I at last attained my wishes? Yes, gracious God, I thank Thee for deliverance from a tyranny practised over my conscience, and for placing me where Thou alone art to reign over it by thy word, till I shall finally lay down my head upon this beloved earth." (See frontispiece picture No 5.)

It is well that the Protestants of the French Republic should keep alive the memory of those days of horror. This project of a statue of Coligny will, one may hope, find noble realization. It should be a grand and beautiful work of art, as Mr. Lowell, our Minister in London, impressed upon those who are conducting the movement, and not such a monstrosity as those which, as he reminded them, exist in all countries, and which, as he said, might be "a terror to the dead." We pray, too, that not alone in the erection of a statue will the endeavor to honor Coligny find expression. France is beset with both of whom she has reason to dread. She coquetted with Roman Catholicism until her history was stained with the massacre of St. Bartholomew; and she coquetted with Infidelity until the horrors of 1789 and the Reign of Terror appalled the whole world. The Prince of Peace, proclaimed in the Protestant churches and in the mission halls which Mr. McAll has established through the country, now invites her love and obedience. May God lead her to look back on her past, and, learning its lessons, give herself to Jesus.

NOTES OF THE RECENT CONFERENCE AT MILDMAY PARK, ENGLAND.

Dr. J. H. Brookes, of St. Louis, Mo., delivered the opening address to workers at this famous conference on the afternoon of Sunday, June 22d. His subject was, "What constitutes

A DIVINE CALL TO SERVICE.

The text was Isaiah 6 : 8, "Also I heard the voice of the Lord, saying, Whom shall I send, and who will go for us? Then said I, Here am I, send me." "Very often," he said, "young converts are urged, most unwisely, to engage at once in public service for the Master, but Isaiah, before he entered upon service, had to go through personal dealings with God to know what he himself was, before he was prepared to say, "Here am I, send me." It is a wise and salutary warning, well suited for days when many think that there is nothing easier in the world than to preach. He gave one instance of a most effective kind of preaching without any words at all. Some years ago a Christian gentleman visited a village in England, notorious for its infidelity. It had been laid on his heart that he ought to go and preach there, but when he arrived, instead of beginning to speak at once, he took his stand on a stone-wall that was running along the single street of the village. For three hours he did not open his lips, but only

HELD UP ALOFT AN OPEN BIBLE.

After standing there for three hours, a recollection of our Lord's three hours upon the cross, a crowd slowly gathered, and gradually a solemn awe fell upon them. I see that man standing silently there, and doing nothing but holding up the open Bible aloft. By and by he got down and walked away by the side of a hedge through the village, sobbing enough to break his heart. Presently two ministers came up, and finding a crowd there, they opened the chapel and went in, followed by the people, and a great revival was the result.

A SAFE RULE.

Dr. Brookes again preached in the evening, his text being John 2 : 5, "His mother saith unto the servants, Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it." This, said the preacher, is always the good and safe rule of service, "Whatsoever He saith, do." The text was really a sermon in itself, but it was illustrated and enforced very effectively. If, he said, we were to go through all the generations that are part of the millions upon millions of men and women who have lived on this earth and have believed in Jesus, their united testimony would be, "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it."

THE DREAM OF AN AGED JEW

was the subject of an anecdote related by Mr. Blackwood, who spoke at the session of June 25th. He said a learned Jewish rabbi had once told him of having been present at a very solemn scene. It was the death-bed of a very aged Israelite, a man of wealth, who had a large family of sons, all old men themselves, and who were now standing round that death-bed. He told his sons that he could picture to himself the patriarch Jacob with all his sons round him, but that he had had a very strange dream.

He dreamed that he was about to enter the future world, and that a heavenly one came to him holding out a garment with which he must invest himself ere he could enter. He tried in vain to put it on, but could not undo the fastenings. On each fastening there was an inscription. On the first was, "Know God;" on the next, "Who can know God?" and on the third there was the inscription, "None but God can know God." But the aged man could not unfasten the knots, for the poor Hebrew had not the key of David, and his sons were unable to help him, and so he passed away!

AN UNSEEN KING.

Mr. Lockhart, of Liverpool, in the course of a vigorous address, illustrated the contrast between the fulness of revelation of God in Christ, and the habit of concealment of themselves adopted by Eastern monarchs. In Bruce's "Travels in Abyssinia," he said, it was stated that the king himself was never seen. When any decrees had to be promulgated the king was accustomed to sit behind a lattice window, hidden from the view of all. On the steps of the throne there was the voice, or word, whose duty it was to make proclamation of the decrees of the hidden king. It was an illustration that might help to show how Christ is the true exponent of God. The Incarnation is the central point of the revelation of God.

A QUESTION ANSWERED.

The Rev. J. H. Shaw, of Cheltenham, said: "So far as the relative knowledge of God is concerned, we may claim the position of children. We have no faculties to comprehend God as He is in Himself; but it is a different thing when we come to think what God is to us in Christ Jesus; then we can cry, 'My God, we know Thee, and freely know the things what are given of God.' Christ said, 'I know my sheep, and am known of mine.' Can we say, 'My Jesus, I know Thee?' I shall never forget an answer to a question that I saw written down by a young lady, six years ago, who was going out in connection with the Female Aid Society. The question was, 'What reason have you to think that you are a child of God?' The answer was, 'I take the lost sinner's place; I claim the lost sinner's Saviour, and so I have the witness of the Spirit in His Word that Christ is mine and I am His.' This is the A B C of the knowledge of God."

THE BALANCE-SHEET.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"All are yours."—I. COR. 3 : 22.

The World's Opinion of the Christian Profession—A Losing Business—Examination of his Assets—A Roll of Government Securities—He Owns this World—A Father's First Care—Provision for His Children—Defects in Title-Deeds—Squatters upon the Property—The Christian's Title to the Refinements of the World—To All Music—All Pictures—To Full Temporal Support—Food and Clothing—Life's Vicissitudes—Many Sharp Curves—Valuable Product of Trials—The Ship Safe after Hurricane—He Owns the Next World—Death a Messenger, not a Robber—Calls to Imperishable Possessions—The City of the Sun—The Land of Eternal Health—A Glorious Consummation.

THE impression is abroad that religion puts a man on short allowance; that when the ship sailing heavenward comes to the shining wharf it will be found out that all the passengers had the hardest kind of sea-fare; that the soldiers in Christ's army march most of the time with an empty haversack; in a word, that only those people have a good time in this world who take upon themselves no religious obligation.

I want this morning to find out whether this is so, and I am going to take stock; I am going to show what are the Christian's liabilities, and what is his income, and what are his warranty deeds, and what are his bonds and mortgages, and I shall find out before twelve o'clock just and I shall spread before you the balance-sheet in time to warn you all against the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ, if indeed it be a failure, and in time for you all to accept it, if indeed it be a success. I turn first to the assets, and I find there what seems to be a roll of government securities—the Empire of Heaven promising all things to the possessor. The three small words of my text are a warranty-deed to the whole universe when it says, "All are yours."

In making an inventory of the Christian's possessions, I remark, in the first place, that

HE OWNS THIS WORLD.

My text implies it, and the preceding verse asserts it—"whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world." Now, it would be an absurd thing to suppose that God would give to strangers privileges and advantages which He would deny His own children. If you have a large park, a grand mansion, beautiful fountains, stalking deer, and statuary, to whom will you give the first right to all these possessions? To outsiders? No, to your own children. You will say: "It will be very well for outsiders to come in and walk these paths and enjoy this landscape; but the first right to my house, and the first right to my statuary, the first right to my gardens, shall be in the possession of my own children."

Now, this world is God's park, and while He allows those who are not His children and who refuse His authority the privilege of walking through the gardens, the possession of all this grandeur of park and mansion is in the right of the Christian—the flowers, the diamonds, the silver, the gold, the morning brightness, and the evening shadow. The Christian may not have the title-deed to one acre of land as recorded in the clerk's office, he may never have paid one dollar of taxes; but he can go up on a mountain and look off upon fifty miles of grain field and say, "All this is mine; my Father gave it to me." "All are yours."

A lawyer is sometimes required to search titles, and the client who thinks he has a good right to an estate puts the papers in his hands, and the lawyer goes into the public records, and finds everything right for three or four or five years back; but after a while he comes to a break in the title, to a deficit, to a diversion of the property; so he finds out that the man who supposed he owned it owns not an acre of the ground, while somebody else has the full right to the entire estate. Now, I

to all earthly possessions. I go back a little way, and I find that men of the world—bad men, selfish men, wicked men—think they have a right to all these possessions; but I go further back, and I trace the title from year to year, and from century to century, until I find the whole right vested in God. Now, to whom did He give it? To His own children! "All are yours."

The simple fact is, that in the last days of the world all the architecture, all the cities, all the mountains, all the villages will be in the possession of the church of Christ. "The meek shall inherit the earth." Ships of Tarshish shall bring presents. "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof." "All are yours." "But," you say, "what satisfaction is there in that when I haven't possession of them?" These things will come before the Supreme Judge of the Universe, and He will regulate the title, and He will eject these that does not belong to them, and it shall be found that "All are yours."

So, again, the refinements of life are the Christian's right. He has a right to as good apparel, to as beautiful adornments, to as commodious a residence as the worldling. Show me any passage in the Bible that tells the people of the world they have privileges, they have glittering spheres, they have befitting apparel that are denied the Christian. There is no one who has so much a right to laugh, none so much a right to everything that is beautiful and grand and sublime in life as the Christian. "All are yours." Can it be possible that one who is reckless and sinful, and has no treasures laid up in heaven, is to be allowed pleasures which the sons and daughters of God, the owners of the whole universe, are denied?

So I remark that all the sweet sounds of the world are in the Christian's right. There are people who have an idea that instruments of music are inappropriate for the Christian's parlor, or for the Christian church. When did the house of sin or the bacchanal get

THE RIGHT TO MUSIC?

They have no right to it. God, in my text, makes over to Christian people all the pianos, all the harps, all the drums, all the cornets, all the flutes, all the organs. People of the world may borrow them, but they only borrow them; they have no right or title to them. God gave them to Christian people in my text, when He said, "All are yours."

David no more certainly owned the harp with which he thrummed the praises of God than the Church of Christ owns now all chants, all anthems, all ivory key-boards, all organ diapasons, and God will gather up these sweet sounds after a while, and He will mingle them in one great harmony, and the Mendelssohns and the Beethovens and the Mozarts of the earth will join their voices and their musical instruments, and soft south wind and loud-lunged euroclydon will sweep the great organ pipes, and you shall see God's hand striking the keys, and God's foot tramping the pedals in the great oratorio of the ages!

So all artistic and literary advantages are in the Christian's right. I do not care on whose wall the picture hangs, or on whose pedestal the sculpture stands, it belongs to Christians. The Bierstadts and the Churches are all working for us. "All are yours." The Luxembourgs, the Louvres, all the galleries of Naples, and Rome, and Venice—they are all to come into the possession of the Church of Jesus Christ. We may not now have them on our walls, but the time will come when the writ of ejectment will be served and the Church will possess everything. All parks, all fish-ponds, all colors, all harvests—all, "all are yours."

Secondly, I remark that the right is in the Christian's name. It is a great affair to feed the world. Just think of the fact that, this morning, twelve hundred millions of our race breakfasted at God's table! The commissary department of a hundred thousand men in an army will engage scores of people; but just think of a commissary department of a world! Think of the gathering up from the rice swamps, and the tea fields, and the orchards, and the fisheries! No one but God could tell how many bushels it would take to feed five continents.

TO FULL TEMPORAL SUPPORT

Then, to clothe all these people—how many furs must be captured, and how much flax broken, and how much cotton picked. Just think of the infinite wardrobe where twelve hundred millions of people get their clothes! God spreads this table first of all for His children. Of course, that would be a very selfish man who would not allow other people to come and sit at his table sometimes; but, first of all, the right is given to Christian people, and therefore it is extreme folly for them ever to fret about food or raiment. Who fed the whales sporting off Cape Hatteras this morning? Out of whose hand did the cormorant pick its food? Whose loom wove the butterfly's wing? Who hears the hawk's cry? If God takes care of a walrus, and a Siberian dog, and a wasp, will He not take care of you? Will a father have more regard for reptiles than for his sons and daughters? If God clothes the grizzly bear, and the panther, and the hyena, will He not clothe His own children? Come, then, this morning, and get the key of the infinite storehouse. Come and get the key to the infinite wardrobe. Here they are—all the keys. "All are yours."

So all

of this life, so far as they have any religious profit, are in the right of the Christian. You stand among the Alleghany Mountains, especially near what is called the "Horseshoe," and you will find a train of cars almost doubling on itself, and sitting in the back car you see a locomotive coming as you look out of the window, and you think it is another train when it is only the front of the train in which you are riding; and sometimes you can hardly tell whether the train is going toward Pittsburg or toward Philadelphia, but it is on the track, and it will reach the depot for which it started, and all the passengers will be discharged at the right place. Now, there are a great in life. Sometimes we seem to be going this way, and sometimes we seem to be going that way; but if we are Christians we are on the right track and we are going to come out at the right place. Do not get worried, then, about the sharp curve.

A sailing vessel starts from New York for Glasgow. Does it go in a straight line? Oh, no. It changes its tack every little while. Now, you say, "This vessel, instead of going to Glasgow, must be going to Havre, or it is going to Hamburg, or it is going to Marseilles." No, no. It is going to Glasgow. And in this voyage of life we often have to change our tacks. One storm blows us this way, and another storm blows us that way; but He who holds the winds in His fist will bring us into a haven of everlasting rest just at the right time. Do not worry, then, if you have to change tacks.

One of the best things that ever happened to Paul was being thrown off his horse. One of the best things that ever happened to Joseph was being thrown into the pit. The losing of his physical eyesight helped John Milton to see the battle of the angels. One of the best things that ever happened to Ignatius was being thrown to the wild beasts in the Coliseum, and while eighty thousand people were jeering at his religion he walked up to the fiercest of all the lions and looked him in the eye, as much as to say, "Here I am, ready to be devoured for Christ's sake."

All things work together for your good. If you walk the desert, the manna will fall and the sea will part. If the feverish torch of sickness is kindled over your pillow, by its light you can read the promise. If the waves of trouble dash clear high above your girdle, across the blast and across the surge you can hear the promise, "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee." You never owned a glove, or a shoe, or a hat, or a coat more certainly than you own all the frets and of this life, and they are bound to work out your present and your eternal good. They are the saws, the hammers, the files by which you are to be hewn and cut and smoothed for your eternal well-being.

Here is a vessel that goes along the coast; it hugs the coast. The captain of that vessel seems chiefly anxious to keep the paint on his ship from being marred, or the sails from being torn. When that vessel comes to the "Narrows," nobody looks on it with any interest. But here is a vessel that went across the sea with vast product, and comes in with vast importation—sails patched, masts spliced, pumps all working to keep out the water; it has come through the hurricane which has sunk twenty steamers. The bronzed men are cheering among the rigging. Now the men-of-war anchored in the harbor boom forth their welcome through the portholes.

So there are some Christians who are having an easy time. It seems to them smooth sailing all the way. When they get into heaven there will be no excitement, there will be very few people who will ever find out they are there; but those Christians who have gone through a thousand midnight hurricanes—storm to the right of them, storm to the left of them, storm all the way—when they come up the harbor of heaven, all the redeemed will turn out to greet them, and bid them hail and welcome.

I go further, and tell you that the Christian owns not only this world, but he OWNS THE NEXT WORLD.

No chasm to be leaped, no desert to be crossed. There is the wall; there is the gate of heaven. He owns all on this side. Now, I am going to show you that he owns all on the other side. Death is not a ruffian that comes down to burn us out of house and home, destroying the house of the tabernacle, so that we should be homeless forever. Oh, no! He is only a black messenger who comes to tell us it is time to move; to tell us to get out of this hut, and go up into the palace. The Christian owns all heaven. "All are yours." Its palaces of beauty, its towers of strength, its castles of love. He will not walk in the eternal city as a foreigner in a strange city, but as a farmer walks over his own premises. "All are yours." All the mansions yours. Angels your companions. Trees of life your shade. Hills of glory your lookout. Thrones of heaven the place where you will shout the triumph. Jesus is yours. God is yours.

You look up into the face of God, and say, 'My Father." You look up into the face of Jesus, and say, "My brother." Walk out on the battlements of heaven and look off upon

THE CITY OF THE SUN.

No tears. No sorrow. No death. No smoke of toiling warehouse curling on the air. No voice of blasphemy thrilling through that bright, clear Sabbath morning. No din of strife jarring the air. Then take out your deed, and remember that from throne to throne, and from wall to wall, and from horizon to horizon, "all are yours."

Then get up into the temple of the sun, worshippers in white, each with a palm branch, and from high gallery of that temple look down upon the thousands of thousands, and the ten thousand times ten thousand, and the one hundred and forty and four thousand, and the great "multitude that no man can number," and louder than the rush of the wheels, louder than the tramp of the redeemed, hear a voice saying, "All are yours!" See the great procession marching around the throne of God. Martyrs who went up on wings of flame. Invalids who went up from couches of distress. Toilers who went up from the workhouse, and the factory, and the mine. All the suffering and the bruised children of God. See the chariots of salvation; in them those who were more than conquerors. See them marching around about the throne of God forever and forever, and know that "all are yours!"

O ye who have pains of body that exhaust your strength and wear out your patience, I hold before you this morning and of imperishable beauty, and "all is yours!" O ye who have hard work to get your daily bread, hard work to shelter your children from the storm, I lift before you the vision of that land where they never hunger, and they never thirst, and God feeds them, and robes cover them, and the warmth of eternal love fills them, and all that is yours. O ye whose hearts are buried in the grave of your dead at Greenwood, Laurel Hill, or Mount Auburn—O ye whose happiness went by long ago—O ye who mourn for countenances that never will light up, and for eyes closed forever—sit no longer among the tombs, but look here. A home that shall never be broken up. Green fields never cleft of the grave. Ransomed ones from you parted long ago, now radiant with a joy that shall never cease, and a love that shall never grow cold, and wearing garments that shall never wither, and know all that is yours. Yours the love. Yours the acclaim. Yours the transport. Yours the cry of the four and-twenty elders. Yours the choiring of cherubim. Yours the lamb that was slain.

In the vision of that

GLORIOUS CONSUMMATION

I almost lose my foothold, and have to hold fast lest I be overborne by the glory. The vision rose before St. John on Patmos, and he saw Christ in a blood-red garment, riding on a white horse, and all heaven following Him on white horses. What a procession! Let Jesus ride. He walked the way footsore, weary, and faint. Now let Him ride. White horse of victory, bear on our Chief. Hosanna to the son of David! Ride on, Jesus! Let all heaven follow Him. These cavalry of God fought well and they fought triumphantly. Now let them be mounted. The pavements of gold ring under the flying hoofs. Swords sheathed and victories won, like conquerors they sit on their chargers. Ye mounted troops of God, ride on! ride on! ten thousand abreast, cavalcade after cavalcade. No blood dashed to the lips. No blood dripping from the fetlocks. No smoke of battle breathed from the nostril. The battle is ended—the victory won!

Oh, if there be any present who are yet enemies of the cross of Christ, I beseech them at once to be reconciled to God! Remember that if you are not found among that white-robed army who follow the Saviour in His victorious march, your part must be with those concerning whom it is said, "The Lord Jesus shall be revealed from heaven in flaming fire, taking vengence on those that know not God, and obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of His power, when He shall come to be glorified in His saints, and to be admired in all them that believe."

GOSPEL WORK AMONG THE HEATHEN.

INCIDENTS RELATED BY MISSIONARIES.

Penances and Agonies to Merit Salvation.—The Rev. Daniel Jones, the celebrated Baptist Missionary at Agra, India, says: "If Satan ever was successful, his success is in the system of religion in India; for in it he allows men to satisfy the cravings of their passions, and at the same time helps them to feel that they are still religious. I have seen a man who has held up his arm for twelve years, and now cannot bring it down again. I have seen a man who has held up his two hands for sixteen years, and he cannot now lower them. The nails have grown through the palms of his hands right to the back, and he thought that was an act of merit. He did it as a religious act, as a religious penance, believing that he would obtain salvation thereby. I have seen a man who would not speak to any one, and he regarded that as an act of merit. I have seen a man who was just beginning the performance of a great pilgrimage by stretching himself lengthwise on the ground, making a mark with his toes, stretching himself out and making a mark with his fingers, then rising and repeating what he had just done. In that way he was to do a pilgrimage of hundreds of miles. These things, however, are passing away in India, we are glad to say. Still they are there to testify to the tremendous hold this system has upon the minds of the people. And is it not the secret of every human system apart from that of the Lord Jesus Christ—a man doing something thereby to obtain salvation?"

Getting among the People.—"We go about preaching from village to village, and city to city, as far as we are able. The last time I was privileged to go about preaching in that way I left at home the tent I usually take with me, and thought I would do the best I could. I came to one station where the Rajah had prepared a resting-place for travellers, and as I was a bona fide traveller I thought I would occupy that place for the night. I slept on the ground, it is true, but I thoroughly enjoyed it. The next night I slept in a railway carriage, and another night in the waiting-room of a country station. Later on I stayed at a place where I was charged a penny a night, and which was used by the poor natives. After that I had to sleep in the open air when it was bitterly cold; but through all this I had the blessed testimony of God being with me. I encountered a fellow-worker in the cause, and we made our way together to a city given up to idolatry, sensualism, and sin. Some one said to us, 'You are not allowed to go there,' but we went in, for we were on the Lord's work. We came to the place the next morning with our books under our arms, for we are colporteurs, or anything that will aid us to spread the Word of God and the knowledge of the truth. At last we found one poor man in his shop who said, 'Will you sing the hymn you sang when last here?' and so we began, singing in Hindustanee a hymn, the first lines of which may be thus rendered in English:

"'Jesus, the Messiah, is the Saviour of my soul,
Deep was that river, old is the boat;
Jesus only can put me across.'

That is what we sang to the man, and we were simply delighted to find that there was one man there, in the midst of that great city, who knew something about the light and the truth. That night we got rid of an enormous number of Gospels in that town where Satan had his stronghold."

Physic as an Aid in Forming Churches.—The Rev. J. J. Fuller, of Cameroons, West Africa, says that "every missionary who goes to Africa is supposed to be a doctor, and if he tells the natives that he does not understand anything about medicine, they do not believe him. In my younger days I knew nothing about medicine, and when the people applied to me I used to give them a good deal of castor oil and Epsom salts. Having given them a considerable quantity of that, I soon established my celebrity, and the gift of such medicines, in several instances, brought about the formation of a Christian church. In one case I gave some medicine to a chief, and it did him so much good, that he begged and prayed to have a Christian teacher. One was sent, and a school was formed; a beautiful little house was built, and now there is a company of Christians worshipping in it. I look forward to the time when all the native churches will have their own native pastors, supported by the people, and I call upon Christians everywhere to remember the words of the Master, 'Ye shall reap if ye faint not.'"

REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S JUBILEE.

IN our issue of June 26th we published a brief report, sent by cable, of the meetings held on the occasion of Mr. Spurgeon's fiftieth birthday. We are now enabled to give from the English journals the following fuller report:

Mr. Spurgeon's birthday was on June 19th, and the event was marked by a demonstration of affection and appreciation on the part of the numerous admirers of the popular pastor. A meeting of the Tabernacle Church and congregation, which was characterized as "a sort of family party," was held on Wednesday. The Tabernacle, which seats over six thousand persons, was filled, and the proceedings were of a most enthusiastic character. Mr. Spurgeon presided, and when he appeared on the platform he was greeted with much applause, accompanied by waving of handkerchiefs. Three generations of the family were on the platform—the father, the Rev. John Spurgeon, a hale old gentleman, a retired Congregational minister; the brother, the Rev. J. A. Spurgeon, co-pastor at the Tabernacle; and the son, the Rev. C. Spurgeon, a pastor at Greenwich, all of whom made admirable speeches. Mrs. Spurgeon, now restored to health, occupied a seat in one of the platform pews. The platform was crowded with representatives of

in connection with the Tabernacle, which, according to a list read during the evening, comprise a ministers' college, an orphanage, almshouses, a ministers' book fund, a colportage association, an evangelistic association, and an array of missions and Sunday-schools. Mr. Spurgeon's address was brief, and was made early in the proceedings. He said he was overwhelmed in gratitude, and buried in mercy. The blessing which the Metropolitan Tabernacle had enjoyed for so many years must be entirely attributed to the grace of God, and God's Holy Spirit among them. They had believed in prayer up to the hilt; they had not prayed as they ought to, but they had so prayed as to prevail. He owed the prosperity he had had in preaching the Gospel of Christ to the Gospel he had preached. There were some who said there was but he begged to say that there was nothing particular about the man that could account for his long-continued success. The American critics, who were very acute, did not account for his success on the ground of oratory, asserting that they had scores of better preachers in America. He had tried to indoctrinate his dear friends with the doctrines of grace, whereof that of Substitution, or Christ dying in the stead of sinners to save them, was the root of the rest. His congregation had been fed with the pure Gospel of God. He did not believe that the dry dead Gospel of some men would have touched their hearts as had His Gospel. As to his preaching, Mr. Spurgeon humorously remarked that he would not go across the street to hear it; but in this, he said, he differed from both his wife and the congregation. A list was then read of religious bodies in various parts of Great Britain and also in Canada, the United States, and France, from which addresses, telegrams, and resolutions of congratulation had been received by Mr. Spurgeon. Addresses were presented to Mr. Spurgeon from the Church, the Pastors' College, and the Sunday-school, and from some French pastors.

THE GREAT MEETING ON THURSDAY EVENING.

The Metropolitan Tabernacle was filled in every part on Thursday, standing room not being obtainable. The Earl of Shaftesbury presided, and many clergymen and Nonconformist ministers were present, including Canon Wilberforce, Dr. Parker, and the Revs. J. P. Chown, Newman Hall, W. Knaggs, and many others from London, the provinces, and the United States. It was announced that a congratulatory letter had been received from the Premier (the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone), but as it was marked "private," it was not read to the audience. Telegrams and letters of congratulation were received from almost every part of the country, and also from the American continent. There was also a eulogistic address from the London Baptist Association, representing one hundred and fifty-three churches, and a fellowship of forty-two thousand persons. Canon Fleming also telegraphed his hearty congratulations, and stated in the words of the good Old Book, "Oh king! live forever." The meeting was enthusiastic throughout, and the demonstrations of approval, accompanied by the waving of handkerchiefs, betokened the unanimity of the great assemblage.

After the Earl of Shaftesbury had made a characteristic speech, Canon Wilberforce said he was exceedingly glad to be privileged to attend to celebrate the jubilee. They were not assembled to glorify Spurgeon, but the living God, who had used him in such a wonderful way in drawing souls to Himself, and to congratulate the pastor, recognizing in him and his work that which justified so beautiful a letter which, through being marked private, could not, unfortunately, be read, but which had been received from one who was filling one of the highest, if not the highest, position in the land. If they wanted a testimonial to Mr. Spurgeon they had but then to look round, and then to think of his weekly sermon translated into seven modern languages, going all over the world and bringing solace and comfort to the hearts of men, for he did preach the love of God. Of Mr. Spurgeon the reverse was true that was said of a great preacher that he preached so finely and lived so badly that it was a pity when once in the pulpit he should ever come out of it, or when out that he should ever again go in.

After addresses were given by several clergymen and members of Parliament, Dr. Joseph Parker, Chairman of the Congregational Union, said that as he appeared before that magnificent assembly that night he felt that some change had taken place somewhere. Some time ago a very distinguished minister had said that Mr. Spurgeon had gone up like the rocket and would come down like the stick. Well, he had not come down at all yet. A greater Baptist than Mr. Spurgeon had had to pass through all the stages that he had passed through in popular estimation. A reed shaken by the wind, a nine-days' wonder, a flash in the pan, a little momentary flutter, that was the first step. Then the man clothed in soft raiment, seeking for himself, feathering his own nest, making a good thing of it, that was the next step. But a prophet, yea, more than a prophet, that was the last step of the process, and to that last step Mr. Spurgeon had come.

THE TESTIMONIAL FUND WAS PRESENTED by Mr. T. W. Olney, one of the deacons of the Church and the treasurer of the fund, who announced that the money already raised toward the fund amounted to over $22,500. This sum had been contributed to by all classes of men—from the children's farthings and the workingmen's pence. He had much pleasure in handing Mr. Spurgeon a cheque for that amount, and he thanked God they were "not pensioning the old gentleman off." Mr. Murrell, the other treasurer, said that they gave Mr. Spurgeon the sum on account. They meant to keep the fund open as long as people would contribute to it. Mr. Spurgeon had many claims upon his private purse, and he knew he needed the money. Many contributors had stipulated that the pastor should have the money absolutely, or they would not give a penny.

AN OVATION.

On rising to reply, Mr. Spurgeon received an ovation, the audience rising en masse and waving their handkerchiefs for several minutes. Mr. Spurgeon, in responding, said that the kindness he received during the past two days would have melted the hardest heart. He did not wish anything of this kind, but he did wish that something should be raised for the building at the back of the Tabernacle for the purposes of the Church and other objects, which he named. Mr. Spurgeon added that he had not coveted men's silver and gold, but he should be able to appropriate all the money without help. He was the pipe through which the money ran. If people had a wish to see what the money did, let them come and inspect the agencies in which it was employed, and there recognize God's work. He heartily thanked all the donors, and prayed that God might return what they had done in every way.

GROUPING OF THE CHURCH IN RESURRECTION GLORY.

By Dr. Henry Meymott.

Two Characteristic Groups—The First Group of Elders—A Common Origin of the Groups—Their Dissimilarity—The Palm-bearing Group—The Distinction Typified in the Parable of the Talents—Two Other Groups—The Four Living Creatures—Duty on the Watch-tower.

IN this paper I propose to investigate one of those portions of the book of Revelations which is more tangible, from the accompanying interpretation, than many of the other portions. It is the account of two characteristic groups, one of which is described at the opening view of heaven, after the door, in vision, was opened, and before the breaking the Seals, and the other, between the opening of the 6th and 7th Seals. This portion is not only of extreme interest abstractedly, but it has a very important practical application to the walk of the Christian in every-day life, by encouraging him to "Keep himself unspotted from the world." It will be observed by comparing Revelation 5 : 12 and 7 : 9 that each group has a common derivation—viz., "out of every kindred tongue, people, and nation." Let me remark, en passant, that are in situ before the seals are opened, and represent the most favored portion of the Church, the component parts of which, when in resurrection glory (1 Corinthians 15 : 41, 42), are compared to the starry heavens, where, while one star differeth from another star in glory, there is presented to the astonished gaze of the observer a wonderful diversity, combined with the strictest unity in structure, and harmony in action.

A prophecy contained in a short paragraph may be partially fulfilled at one period, and such as the prophecy of Joel 2 : 28–32, quoted by Peter in Acts 2 : 16–21, and still more significantly in the prophecy of Isaiah 61 : 1–3, quoted by the Saviour in the synagogue of Nazareth, John 4 : 17, 20. In the one case, the predicted wonders in the heaven above, in conjunction with earthly signs, were not manifested at the day of Pentecost; and, in the other, the day of God's vengeance being still in abeyance, and being altogether incompatible with the Saviour's present mission of mercy, He judiciously closed the book rather than proclaim it.

Apply this reasoning to the investigation of the description of the two resurrection groups before us. There is both a similarity and a dissimilarity between them, and yet they are in harmonious action. They are both derived from the same earthly source, and both composed of the same material; but while one group is in the enjoyment of the reward for watchful and prayerful obedience, positively in being crowned and seated round the throne, and negatively in having escaped the terrors of the Great Tribulation, sometimes called the palm-bearing multitude, and popularly identified with the entire Church, are, in consequence of their unreadiness (Matthew 25 : 10) and unwatchfulness, left to pass through the Great Tribulation.

THE OTHER GROUP,

This distinction is typified in the parable of the talents, as detailed in Matthew 25 and Luke 19. While there is considerable similarity in the construction of the two parables of the talents, it will be observed that in only one—that in Luke—is any distinction made in the ultimate rewards. The difference in the state of resurrection glory in one portion of the Church over that of another, may also be traced in the graphic description (1 Cor. 3 : 12-13) of the essential difference between the two classes of objects subjected to the trial of the fire of God's judgment. The previous conduct of the elders entitles them to a crown and exemption from the Great Tribulation (Luke 21 : 36 ; Rev. 3 : 10), while that of the less favored portion of the Church, in consequence of their neglect of the warnings given to them, subjects them to the severity of and at their deliverance out of it, they are brought into the comparatively inferior position of servitors of the Temple (Rev. 7 : 15). For want of holding fast they have lost their crown (Rev. 3 : 11). It is worthy of notice that in several instances the Word of God adverts to the unexpected condition in which many, both of believers and unbelievers, will find themselves at the Day of Judgment. Thus, in Matthew 7 : 23, many will find that what they will then plead as meritorious works, will be pronounced works of iniquity, being only their own righteousness. So again of believers, in Matthew 25 : 37, "When saw we thee hungered, etc." Though spiritual workers, they had imperfect apprehension of Christ personally, and the like principle is shown in 5 : 44 of the expectation of certain workers of unbelief. The piteous exclamation of the foolish virgins in the same chapter, 5 : 11, is also of a similar character.

The position described of the group of elders may be clearly distinguished as a "kind of first-fruits of the resurrection," and there are two other groups which, in this respect, may be classed with the four and twenty elders. These are the four living creatures (vexatiously translated "beasts" in the Authorized Version) who are in close alliance with the elders in regard to the throne, and the 144,000 who do not come upon the scene till the 14th chapter. This last group, with a definite number, are not the same as the 144,000 of the twelve tribes of Israel of the 7th chapter who are seated immediately before the palm-bearing multitude. In the account of them they are distinctly stated to be unto God and the Lamb," and are called virgins, and might, in some measure, be identified with the wise virgins of the parable. They, like the elders and the living creatures, are seen in close proximity to the throne before God's judgments are poured out at the termination of the Great Tribulation. We have thus three distinct aspects of the first-fruits of the resurrection, or, as the Apostle James puts it (1 : 18), a "kind of first-fruits" for Christ Himself is the actual first-fruits. This figure is taken from the custom in the harvest fields of gathering a small portion of the ripest grain, before the bulk of the harvest is got in. In Leviticus 23 : 10, 1-115, it is called the wave offering. The three aspects of it are the twenty-four elders, the four living creatures, and 144,000 virgins.

THE FOUR LIVING CREATURES,

having a similarity to the living creatures in Ezekiel 1, may probably be taken as a figurative representation of the complete subjection of all created things to the Lord Jesus Christ (Eph. 1: 10-22). It is clear, then, that an important portion of the Church of Christ will be gathered into resurrection glory before God's judgments on His enemies are poured out, and before the great bulk of the harvest is gathered in.

By keeping himself "unspotted from the world," unhindered by its cares and anxieties, and being delivered from its snares (Proverbs 1 : 17), the intelligent Christian may take his consistent place as a "stranger and pilgrim," and so be better able to appreciate the words of the apostle, "Seeing that all these things are dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God" (II Peter 3 : 11-12). By being constantly

he will be in a favorable position to appreciate the closing words of the Divine witness of these preparatory events, so full of warning and instruction. "He which testifieth these things saith, 'Surely, I come quickly,'" and he will be able, with the beloved disciple, heartily to respond, in the strong confidence of faith, and in the face of apparently overwhelming emergencies, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Visit to a Starving Woman.—The Rev. Dr. Fergus Ferguson related at a recent meeting : "The late Rev. Dr. Guthrie, when once visiting, came upon a poor woman lying in bed, covered with a very, very light coverlet. Her features were pinched and wan. She looked what she was—a starving woman. The doctor began to preach the Gospel to her, but she interrupted him, saying, 'Oh, sir, I am very cold and very hungry. If I wasn't cold and hungry I would be glad to listen to you.' The doctor started with surprise. It had not struck him. But now he ran out of the house and bought some blankets, food, and coals. A blanket was put on the bed, a fire lighted, and a cup of tea soon made, and the starving woman was soon another person, and quite ready to listen to the message of peace. It was not long before she received Christ into her heart, and when death came she fell quietly asleep in Christ."

David's Home-Going.—Mr. McLachlan said: "A young man, twenty-five years of age, passed home to glory last night. During the last five years he has been a steady worker in the service of Christ, and he did good work for the Master. A few minutes before he died, a friend remarked, 'You will not be long now, David.' His reply was, 'Is this dying! Then I wish I had had the same joy always since my conversion. It is so pleasant to get home.' David was one of those who are anxious about many things before conversion, but after that great event, he left all his cares to God, his motto being, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you.' Of a truth his death makes us say, 'Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord.'"

A Cavilling Dragoon Saved.—Mr. Lee said: "I was addressing a meeting in an English town, where an old soldier who had been in the Dragoons said that I told a pack of lies, and that next Sabbath he would come and prove it out of the Bible. He took to reading the Word of God from a wrong motive, but the Spirit of the Lord is not confined by the intentions of men, and the soldier who went for ammunition to slay me with, was himself wounded to the heart by the sword of the Spirit. Conscience-stricken, he went for quietness to a stable and knelt in prayer. The curiosity of his wife made her follow him to see what he was going to do, as he seemed strange that day. Listening at the stable-door, she heard him wrestling with God for the salvation of his soul, and refusing, like Jacob, to let Him go until he received the blessing of eternal life. The same Spirit which had convicted him of sin brought him comfort and pardon by giving power to rest on Jesus. I saw this man die, and his death was that of a man trusting only in the Saviour. His last word was 'Jesus.'"

A Lost Sovereign Restored.—Dr. Cameron said : "A farmer's boy found a penny, which he took to his master and asked him, 'Is this your penny?' The farmer after feeling all his pockets said, 'No, my boy, it is not ; but as you are an honest lad you had better keep it to yourself.' This gave the boy a taste for wealth and made him long for more. One day he found a sovereign ($5) lying on the road wrapped in a bit of paper. The craving for wealth was still strong on him, and he thought, 'Now I am wealthy ; I'll keep this.' He hid the gold, but it was very heavy on his conscience. Those about wondered what made him so nervous and unhappy, but they could make nothing out. On another day a workman came to the farm-house to do some repairs. The farmer, being a genial sort of a man, asked him, 'How are you, Thomas?' 'Very well, but you will have heard of my loss?' 'No, what was it?' 'I got up from a sick-bed to do some work for Farmer White, your neighbor, who paid me with some silver and a sovereign, and I lost the sovereign.' 'Now,' thought the boy, 'is my time to confess ; I can stand it no longer.' So he produced the piece of gold, asking, 'Is this it?' 'Ay, that it is, and that is the very paper it was wrapped up in.' The farmer gave the lad a hearty slap on the back, saying, 'That's a fine fellow.' The words and the slap went straight to the boy's heart, and when any temptation came in his way again, he felt the slap and heard the kind voice of his master ringing in his ears. He never deviated from the path of rectitude again."

A Singular Experience for Livingstone.— The Rev. Dr. Bonar related : "When Livingstone was a young man, he had to address a large meeting in the open air. He was utterly exhausted, quite emptied of ideas and words ; he had nothing to say, and felt that he could not stop for the meeting, so he went off. He had not gone far when the Lord sent him the text, 'Was ever I a wilderness unto you?' (Jer. 3 : 31.) He at once returned, and faced the vast assembly. The Lord, however, kept the power in His own hands, till some drops of rain fell, which threatened to disperse the people. Livingstone then spoke, and when he was making some remarks on the rain, the power of God fell upon himself and the people. Some five hundred souls were savingly converted that day. If you want to be used by God, you must be emptied of self. I once said to a well-known evangelist, 'You need not be lifted up by your success in the Lord's work, and think that you are better than many others ; your success is because you are more prayed for than others.' He replied, 'It is perfectly true.'"

Maggie Jordan, the Jail Bird.—Mr. Smith said : "Away in the town of Pittsburg there lived a woman who, when in drink, was the terror of the police. One night a servant of God was sitting in his room when a decent well-dressed young woman entered. In asking her to sit down, he began to ask the usual question, 'What is your name?' 'Maggie Jordan, sir.' 'Maggie Jordan! Tell me how so great a change has taken place, and I will do anything possible for you.' This was her story : 'One night, after a heavy carousal, I was taken to the lock-up. My conduct was outrageous, so much so that the officers took me to the farthest-off cell, and threw me on the floor, telling me that they would keep me there till my spirit was broken, or till I died. I cursed, foamed at the mouth, and yelled, till nature at length gave way, and I swooned. While in that state I thought it was Christmas Eve, and that I was back in the Emerald Isle helping to decorate the church. The rector's daughter gave me a motto wrought in flowers. It read, "He brought me into His banqueting house, and His banner over me was love." I was roused out of the swoon, not with the cheerful Christmas chimes, but by the sullen clang of the prison bell. The motto and dream so worked on my spirit that I knocked for the warder, who came in a little time and gruffly asked, "What do you want?" "Let me out, I will never trouble you again," I said. The difference in my voice was so great that he was astonished, and by and by he let me go. The doctor tells me that I have not long to live ; as Jesus has saved me, I shall only be in heaven all the sooner ; but I want to see my mother before I die. She is living in Chicago. Please send me to her ; I have got no money.' She was so much in earnest that the minister sent her to Chicago, and has heard several times from friends there that 'All is well with Maggie Jordan.'"

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Nominations of the Democratic National Convention for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency have been favorably received by the bulk of the party. The only decided dissatisfaction manifested is that of the Tammany Hall section. An effort was made early in the proceedings of the convention, by John Kelly and his followers, to break the unit rule imposed on the New York delegation by the State Convention. The effort, however, failed, the convention by a majority of 131 affirming the right of a State convention to impose the unit rule. The chairman of the New York delegation consequently cast the seventy-two votes of the State as a unit throughout the proceedings. Colonel William F. Vilas, of Wisconsin, was elected Permanent Chairman of the Convention. The first name presented, when candidates for the Presidential nomination were called for, on Wednesday, July 9th, was Senator Bayard, of Delaware, whose name elicited loud applause. McDonald, of Indiana, Thurman, of Ohio, and Carlisle, of Kentucky, were proposed before New York was reached. The presentation of Governor Cleveland's name then precipitated the storm. State Senator Grady, by the magnanimous interposition of the friends of the governor, was allowed to state the reasons why he believed Governor Cleveland could not carry his own State. A reply was made to him, and then the convention adjourned. On the following day Governor Hoadly, of Ohio, and Randall, of Pennsylvania, were presented, and at midnight a ballot was taken, in which Cleveland received 392 votes and Bayard 170. The second ballot was taken on Friday morning, when Cleveland was nominated by 683 votes, which was 136 more than were necessary for a choice. It is evident, therefore, that even if Tammany had been allowed to separate the vote of New York, the governor would have been nominated without the Tammany votes. Mr. Thomas A. Hendricks, of Indiana, was nominated as Vice-President. He occupied the same place on the Democratic ticket of 1876. The issue in November will probably turn on the vote of New York State. In 1882 Mr. Cleveland carried the State by the unprecedented majority of 192,854, but since that time he has lost popularity with the workingmen by some of his vetoes, and has quarrelled with Tammany Hall. Against those facts is to be set that of the support he is likely to receive from discontented Republicans, who voted for him in 1882, who approve his conduct during his two years' administration, and have an additional reason for voting for him again in their dislike of Mr. Blaine. Whether the Democrats can carry New York with Independent Republican aid and without the Tammany votes is a matter of doubt, which will not be solved until November.

Grover Cleveland, the Governor of the State of New York, whom the Democratic National Convention has nominated for the Presidency, was born at Caldwell, N. J., on March 18th, 1837. His father, the Rev. Richard F. Cleveland, was at the time pastor of the Congregational Church in that town, and he named his son after his predecessor in the pastorate, the Rev. Stephen Grover, but the first name was afterward dropped. The candidate's grandfather and great-grandfather were also connected with the Congregationalists, the former as deacon, and the latter as minister of the church at Norwich, Conn. Rev. Richard Cleveland died in 1853 at Holland Patent, N. Y., leaving a widow and nine children, of whom Grover, the present candidate, was the fifth. After assisting his brother as teacher in a blind asylum for a year, Grover Cleveland determined to go West; but staying on his way at Buffalo, where he had friends, he was induced to settle there and study law. He was admitted to the Bar in 1858, and was made Assistant District-Attorney in 1862. He was nominated for District-Attorney in 1865, but was defeated. In 1870 he was elected Sheriff for a three years' term. In 1881 he was elected Mayor of Buffalo, and the next year Governor of New York. Mr. Cleveland is a bachelor, very methodical and democratic in his habits.

Thomas Andrews Hendricks, the Democratic candidate for the Vice-Presidency, was born near Zanesville, O., on September 7th, 1819. His uncle was the second Governor of Indiana, and during his administration the family removed from Ohio to that State, the father of the candidate becoming the founder of the Presbyterian Church in Indianapolis. Thomas A. Hendricks studied law, and was admitted to the Bar; but having contracted a taste for political life, he became a candidate for the Legislature, and was elected in 1848. In 1851 he was elected to Congress, but having voted for the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, he lost his seat in 1855, and returned to the practice of law. President Pierce, however, appointed him Commissioner of the General Land Office, which he held until 1859. He unsuccessfully ran for the Governorship in 1860, but in 1863 he was elected to the United States Senate for the full term. At the close of his term, in 1869, he again ran for the Governorship, but was again defeated. In 1872, however, he succeeded, chiefly by the help of Temperance votes, in carrying the election for Governor by 1200 majority. In 1868 and 1876 he was a candidate for the Democratic Presidential nomination, but in both cases he did not secure a united delegation from his own State. He received the nomination for the Vice-Presidency in 1876. He was opposed to Mr. Tilden's action after that election, and urged him, ineffectually, to present himself for inauguration, leaving the decision of the question to the Supreme Court. Mr. Hendricks is an Episcopalian, is married, but has no children living.

The Platform Adopted by the Democratic National Convention on July 10th is evidently the result of a compromise. It does not express the views of Mr. Randall on the one hand, nor of Mr. Carlisle on the other. There is considerable astuteness manifested in this method of dealing with the tariff question, on which the party is so widely divided. A platform pledging the party to sweeping reductions in the tariff would have alienated a large section of the party and would probably have alarmed the business interests of the country. Nevertheless the recent tariff debate in the House showed that about two thirds of the Democratic representatives were in favor of substantial reductions. The convention, however, shrewdly constructed the tariff plank in such a way as to avoid making the tariff the chief issue of the campaign. It pledges the Democratic party to "revise the tariff in a spirit of fairness to all interests," and declares that "in making reduction in taxes it is not proposed to injure any domestic industries." It recognizes that "taxes collected at the Custom House must continue to be the chief source of Federal revenue;" that "any change of law must be at every step regardful of the labor and capital involved" in the "industries which have come to rely upon legislation for successful continuance." It especially declares that "the necessary reduction in taxation can and must be effected without depriving American labor of the ability to compete successfully with foreign labor, and without imposing lower rates of duty than will be ample to cover any increased cost of production which may exist in consequence of the higher rates of wages prevailing in this country." It also opposes sumptuary laws; expresses the party's belief in honest money—gold, and silver, and a convertible currency; advocates the repeal of all laws restricting the free action of labor; believes that grants of public lands should be restricted to actual settlers; advocates the improvement of the Mississippi River and other waterways; and favors honest civil service reform. General B. F. Butler presented a minority report on the platform, but it was rejected.

The First Session of the Forty-Eighth Congress terminated on July 7th. It has been somewhat disappointing in results, a fact chiefly owing to the time consumed in the House by the discussion of the Tariff question. The most important of the measures passed at this session was the Dingley bill, for the relief of the merchant shipping trade, which removes some of the burdens that, with others still remaining, have almost driven the Stars and Stripes from the seas. A measure to prevent and punish the counterfeiting of foreign bonds, and the establishment of a bureau of labor statistics, with a few minor bills, formed the whole of the net results of the session. Among the measures that failed to become law were the Senate Bankruptcy bill, the anti-polygamy bill, the bill defining the succession in case of a vacancy in the offices of both President and Vice-President, and a bill for the extension of national aid to education. The River and Harbor bill passed, appropriates $13,909,200. The total number of bills and resolutions introduced was over 10,000, of which 170 became law.

The Affairs of Grant & Ward Appear to be in almost inextricable confusion. The assignee states that no proper books were kept by the firm, and that of many of the most important transactions he can find no entry in any form. The firm lent money on securities which it pledged with other firms as security for loans larger than it had advanced upon them, and there is likely to be a dispute as to the ownership of those documents. The total liabilities of the firm, so far as they can be traced, amount to $16,792,647, exclusive of a three million dollar claim in dispute. The nominal value of the assets is $27,000,000, the real value of which the assignee estimates at $57,000.

Will Subscribers, in Remitting their Subscriptions, kindly remember that Postal Notes, Post Office Orders, or currency are the best forms in which the money can be sent. If postage stamps are used, there is no need to wet them, as when that is done they are often spoiled in separating them from the letter. The mail is preferable to express, being as safe and far less costly.

The Ocean Grove Camp Meetings are now in full operation, and are well attended by those who go to the famous seaside resort for health and spiritual profit. The following is the programme issued by the association: National Temperance Society, Wednesday to Sabbath, July 23–27. George W. Bain and other distinguished speakers; New York Conference Temperance Society, Monday and Tuesday, July 28th and 29th; Memorial Day, Tuesday, July 29th; Ocean Grove Anniversary, on Thursday, July 31st; reunion of army chaplains, Federal and Confederate, Friday to Sabbath, August 1st–3d; lectures, Tuesday and Wednesday, August 5th and 6th; Bible readings, Rev. G. D. Watson, D.D., Tuesday to Friday, August 13th–15th; Women's Foreign Missionary Society, Saturday and Sabbath, August 16th and 17th; annual camp meeting, Tuesday, August 19th, to Friday, August 29th—ten days; meeting for the promotion of holiness every morning during the season at nine o'clock, led by Rev. Joseph H. Thornley and Mrs. Dr. Palmer.

The Eleventh Chautauqua Annual Assembly opened on July 12th. In spite of the rain there were nearly fifteen hundred persons present. The Rev. H. L. Hubbell, D.D., of Jamestown, lectured on the personal and moral element in teaching, making a plea for the development of the higher and immortal human faculties in the pupil. A telegram to the Times, from Chautauqua, says that at least ten thousand visitors are expected to be there in the two weeks. Twenty-five cents a day is now charged for admittance to the grounds and their attractions, which will be increased to forty cents on August 5th, when the eleventh Sunday-school Assembly opens. The management has spent several thousand dollars since last season in beautifying the grounds, which appear to decided advantage in contrast with former seasons. Both Blaine and Cleveland will be invited by the Chautauqua managers to visit the assembly in August. General Garfield was there in 1880, and met with a very cordial reception. The Baptists are making extensive preparations for their meetings, which open on the 22d of this month.

Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D., Delivers the address to-day at the Summer School of the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, of which he is president. As we stated in a previous issue, the sessions are being held at Key East, N. J. To-morrow the delegate from India to the Methodist Conference, Baboo Ram Chundra Bose, lectures on "The Contrast between Hindoo and Christian Philosophy." On Saturday Dr. W. K. Pendleton, President of Bethany College, Va., lectures on "Political Atheism." The August sessions will be held at Richfield Springs, N. Y. Richfield Springs is reached by rail from Utica on the New York Central Railroad. Information in regard to the American Institute of Christian Philosophy, its monthly meetings, its winter courses, etc., may be obtained from Mr. Charles M. Davis, Secretary, 4 Winthrop Place, New York City. After delivery, these lectures will appear in Christian Thought, published bi-monthly, at 4 Winthrop Place, New York. Yearly subscription, two dollars; single numbers, forty cents. The prevalence of scepticism and the certainty that young Christians will certainly hear the objections urged, of science, falsely so-called, to revelation, render it most important at the present time that all Christians should be armed with the weapons of Christian philosophy. There is no better way of gaining that armor than through the excellent school Dr. Deems has founded.

An Interesting Meeting was Held in the Westminster Presbyterian Church, New York, last week. The congregation assembled to welcome back their pastor, the Rev. Edward M. Deems, who has returned from his three months' trip to Europe, which was also his honeymoon excursion. One of the officers presented the pastor and his bride with a testimonial consisting of two handsome plush upholstered chairs on behalf of the Westminster Young People's Association, and a set of silverware and a library desk as the gift of the congregation. In accepting the presents Mr. Deems gave a sketch of the various points of interest he visited while abroad.

A Singular Death of a Child is Reported from Baltimore, Md. On June 27th a gentleman, accompanied by his four-year-old son, drove down to the landing at Deal's Island and out to the end of the wharf, which extends for a quarter of a mile into the Sound. Leaving his child in the buggy, he unhitched his horse and tied it to a post. Turning around he was horrified to see the wind blowing the carriage, with the child in it, over the edge of the pier. He sprang forward toward it, but too late. It had turned over as it fell, and, it is thought, stunned the child, as he did not come to the surface after sinking. It would have been so easy to secure the buggy so that the wind could not have moved it, that the father is naturally unable to forgive himself for his carelessness. It is much to be feared that parents often show similar negligence as to the spiritual safety of their children. They omit to inculcate Christian principles by precept and example, and when the children go out into the world and are left in dangerous places they have nothing to hold them to the truth, and are easily carried away by the wind of temptation (Prov. 22 : 6).

A Southern Senator Made an Amusing Mistake recently. He had occasion to travel from Washington to New York, and having purchased his sleeping-car ticket he went to the depot and boarded a train. Being exceedingly tired and sleepy, he undressed immediately, went to bed, and was soon in a sound slumber. He awoke in the morning much refreshed, and proceeded to make his ablutions and dress preparatory to crossing the ferry from Jersey City to the metropolis. When he issued from the car, however, he was overwhelmed with surprise. He could see neither Trinity spire, nor the Bridge, nor any of the familiar signs of New York. In fact, Washington's scenes were around him as they were when he went to bed the night before. On inquiry he learned that he had slept all night in the Washington depot, having entered a car which had not been attached to the New York train. Mortifying as the Senator's mistake was, it would have been far worse if, instead of remaining still, he had been carried in an opposite direction. That mistake in a more serious matter is being made by many who "hope" they are Christians, and who "expect" to go to heaven when they die. When they awake to the discovery of their blunder their despair will be unbearable (Luke 13 : 26–28).

A Brother's Devotion is Touchingly Described by a Georgia journal. It states that a short time ago a child named Belle Ferguson, the daughter of the night watchman at the Columbus and Rome Station, had both legs terribly lacerated in the turn-table, the skin being so far separated that her physicians told the family it would be impossible to make the parts heal unless fresh bits of skin were grafted on the ugly wounds. As soon as this was known to Belle's brother Reggy, a lad twelve years old, he stepped up to the physicians, and promised to be on hand at any time the next day and let them cut the necessary skin from his arm. At the appointed hour he met the engagement, bared his arms, and, by means of knife and scissors, four pieces of skin were taken from his arm and transplanted to his sister's wounds. It is gratifying to learn that the operation was entirely successful, and that the transplanted skin is now growing healthily. A boy who could endure such pain from love for his sister must be a noble little fellow, from whom, in after life, great things may be expected. If his sister, for whom he made the sacrifice, had displayed carelessness, or perversity in her subsequent treatment, and so rendered her brother's pain fruitless, she would have been an ingrate; yet it is precisely that kind of ingratitude which characterizes sinners who neglect to accept the salvation Christ purchased for them with His life (Heb. 10 : 29).

HUMILITY THE FRIEND OF PRAYER.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which Thou hast shewed unto thy servant; for with my staff I passed over this Jordan; and now I am become two bands."—GENESIS 32 : 10.

Jacob's Imperfections—God not Ashamed of him—A Princely Man—The First Prayer of its Character—Steeped in Humility—I. Humility the Fit Attitude of Prayer—Spoken before God—A Different Attitude toward Men—Merit Offensive in Prayer—Like Serving the Lord with a Writ—Foolishness of Perfection Boasters—II. Humility the Strength of Prayer—Flaws in Self-Made Men—Worshipping their Maker—A Clergyman's Divided Name—A Preserved Axle-Tree—III. Humility Supplies Arguments in Prayer—The Argument of Facts—Recognition of Increased Responsibility.

JACOB'S character was far from faultless, but equally removed from despicable. He possessed great strength of character and force of judgment, and this became somewhat a snare to him, so that he did not always move through life with the childlike repose of Isaac, or the royal serenity of Abraham, but was at times crafty and pettifogging, like his relatives on the mother's side. Yet I demur to that depreciation of Jacob's character which is so common in certain quarters, because he used the means, as well as prayed. Our God is the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob; and very frequently He is called the God of Israel, and even the God of Jacob. "He is not ashamed to be called their God;" and if He is not ashamed to be called Jacob's God, no fellow-believer has any right to be ashamed of Jacob.

Say what you will of him, he was a master of the art of prayer, and he that can pray well is

A PRINCELY MAN.

He that can prevail with God will certainly prevail with men. It seems to me that when once a man is taught of the Lord to pray he is equal to every emergency that can possibly arise. Depend upon it, it will go hard with any man who fights against a man of prayer. All other weapons may be dashed aside; but the weapon of All-prayer, invisible though it may be, and despised of the worldling, hath in it a might and majesty which will secure the victory. The sword of prayer hath such an edge that it will cut through coats of mail. Jacob was a prevailing prince when he came upon his knees.

Dr. Kitto, in his admirable "Bible Illustrations," has a chapter upon this chapter which is entitled, "The First Prayer." I take leave to differ a little from that title. This can hardly be said to be the first prayer that is recorded in Scripture. I admit that the excellent writer excludes the prayer of Abraham for Sodom as rather an intercession than a prayer; but there are other prayers of Abraham, and other instances of supplication. Yet it may be truly said that this is the first prayer in the Bible of a man for himself, which is given at full length; and being the first, it may be viewed in some degree as a pattern for succeeding pleaders. If you examine it carefully, you will find that it is a valuable model which may be copied by any child of God in the day of his trouble.

Jacob begins by pleading the covenant: "O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac;" what better plea can we have than the covenant of a faithful God, which He has already fulfilled to our fathers? He next pleads a special promise which had been made to himself. That promise was wrapped up in the folds of a precept which he was obeying: "Thou saidst unto me, return unto thy country, and to thy kindred, and I will deal well with thee." Next, he proceeded to plead his own unworthiness; by faith he turned even his faultiness into an argument, as I shall have to show you: "I am not worthy of the least of all thy mercies." Furthermore, he went on to plead with God, stating

HIS SPECIAL DANGER:

"Deliver me, I pray thee, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau." He also set the little children and their danger before God—a strong plea with such a God of love as we have: "Lest He will come and smite me, and the mother with the children." Then he concluded with what must ever remain a potent plea with God: "Thou saidst." He urged God's promise, and virtually cried, "Do as thou hast said." It is wise to spread the promise before Him who gave it, and to beg for its fulfilment. We may appeal to God's faithfulness, and cry, "Remember the word unto thy servant, upon which Thou hast caused me to hope."

The very first sentence of Jacob's prayer has this peculiarity about it, that it is steeped in humility; for he does not address the Lord as his own God at the first, but as the God of Abraham and Isaac. The prayer itself, though it is very urgent, is never presumptuous; it is as lowly as it is earnest. Throughout this prayer I see, with all its intensity, a loving remembrance of who Jacob is, and who Jehovah is; and the suppliant speaks in terms fit to be used toward the thrice holy God by a man of lowly heart.

This is to be the subject of our discourse—humility is the fit attitude of prayer. We will begin with that—"I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which Thou hast shewed unto thy servant." Then we will advance in the second place to remark that humility is promoted by the same considerations which encourage prayer—that I shall show you from the text; and thirdly, humility suggests and supplies many arguments which can be used in prayer. A proud man has few reasons to bring before God; but the humbler a man is, the more numerous are his prevailing pleas. Prayer is a suitable employment for a sinner, and a sinner is the best person to exercise prayer.

I. Our first observation is that humility is

THE FIT ATTITUDE OF PRAYER.

I do not think that Jacob could have prayed unless he had stripped off the robes of self-justification which he wore in his controversy with Laban, and had stood disrobed before the infinite majesty of the Most High. Observe that he here speaks not as before man, but as before God; and he cries, "I am not worthy of the least of all thy mercies." He had been talking with Laban—Laban who had made a slave of him, who had used him in the most mercenary manner, and who had now pursued him in fierce anger because he had quitted his service with his wives and children that he might go back to his native country. To Laban he does not say, "I am not worthy of what I possess," for, as far as churlish Laban was concerned, he was worthy of a great deal more than had ever been rendered to him in the form of wage. To Laban he uses many truthful sentences of self-vindication and justification. The same man who speaks in that fashion to Laban turns round and confesses to his God, "I am not worthy of the least of all thy mercies." This is perfectly consistent and truthful. Humility is not telling falsehoods against yourself: humility is forming a right estimate of yourself. As toward Laban it was a correct estimate for a man who had worked so hard for so little to claim that he had a right to what God had given him; and yet as before God it was perfectly honest and sincere of Jacob to say, "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which thou hast showed unto thy servant."

Now, whenever you go to prayer, if you have previously been compelled to say some rather strong thing as to your own integrity and industry; or, if you have heard others speak in your praise, forget it all; for you cannot pray if it has any effect upon you. A man cannot pray with a good opinion of himself; all he can manage is just to mutter, "God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are," and that is no prayer at all. A lofty view of your own excellence will tempt you to look down with contempt upon your neighbor; and that is death to prayer. God drives out of His temple all proud prayers; He cannot endure such provocations. Thou must put thy shoe from off thy foot when thou standest on holy ground—that same shoe which it is quite right for thee to wear when thou hast to tread upon the lion and the dragon—that same shoe which fits thee well, and which it befits thee to wear when travelling through this great and terrible wilderness. Put off before thy God even that which thou art forced to wear before churlish men.

Brethren, it would ill become any of us to use the language of merit before God; for merit we have none; and if we had any, we should not need to pray. It has been well observed by an old divine, that the man who pleads his own merit does not pray, but demands his due. If I ask a man to pay me a debt, I am not a suppliant, but a plaintiff claiming my rights. The prayer of a man who thinks he is meritorious is like it is not offering a request, it is issuing a demand. Merit in effect says, "Pay me that thou owest." Little will such a man get of God; for if the Lord only pays to us what He owes us, yonder place of torment will be our speedy heritage. Any other attitude but that of humility would be most unbecoming and presumptuous in the presence of the Most High.

Let me add, also, that in times of great pressure upon the heart there is not much fear of self-righteousness intruding. Jacob was greatly afraid and sore distressed; and when a man is brought into such a state the lowliest language suits him. They that are filled with bread may boast, but the hungry beg. Let the proud take heed lest while the bread is yet in their mouths the wrath of God come upon them. He that is brought to penury, he that is distressed in spirit, he that lies at death's door, is not a man to show the peacock's feather and display his finery. Then he looks about him to the loving-kindness of the Lord, and he pleads for mercy. This is his one cry—"Mercy, mercy." On thy face before the throne thou shalt prevail. If thou hast any righteousness of thine own, thou shalt never have Christ's righteousness. If thou hast no sin, thou shalt have no washing in the precious blood. If thou art strong, thou shalt be left to thine own weakness. If thou art rich and increased in goods, thou shalt be sent empty away. See, then, dear friend, how necessary it is that we should approach the Lord in the attitude of humility.

I call your attention to the present tense as it is used in the text—Jacob does not say, as we might half have thought he would have said, "I was not worthy of the least of all the mercies and of all the truth which Thou hast made to pass before thy servant," but he says, "I am not worthy." I cannot bear the man who, in his foolish talks as if he had become worthy of grace. The Lord have mercy upon such boasters, and bring them to the true moorings, so that they may own that they are not worthy. When you and I shall get to heaven, though God may say, "They shall walk with me in white, for they are worthy," yet it will never be right for any one of us to say that we are worthy of anything that God has bestowed upon us. Our psalm must be Non nobis Domine: "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory, for thy mercy, and for thy truth's sake." To assume for a moment that we deserve anything of the Lord God, is so vainglorious, so false, so unjust that we ought to loathe the very thought of it, and cry, like Jacob, "I am not worthy." Job, who had defended himself with vigor and possibly with bitterness, no sooner heard God speaking to him in the whirlwind than he cried, "I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth Thee. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." Prostrate before the throne is the proper attitude of prayer; in humility is our strength for supplication.

II. Secondly, the same thought will be kept up, but put in a somewhat differing light, while we note that those considerations which make toward humility are

THE STRENGTH OF PRAYER.

Observe, first, that Jacob in this prayer showed his humility by a confession of the Lord's working in all his prosperity. He says with a full heart, "All the mercies and all the truth which thou hast shewed unto thy servant." Well, but Jacob, you have immense flocks of sheep, but you earned them, and through your care they greatly increased; do you not consider that those flocks are entirely your own procuring? Surely you must see that you were highly industrious, prudent, and careful, and thus grew wealthy? No; he takes a survey of his great estate, and he speaks of it all as mercies—mercies which the Lord had shewed unto His servant. I do not object to books about self-made men, but I am afraid that self-made men have a great tendency to worship him that made them. It is very natural that they should. But, brethren, if we are self-made, I am sure we had a very bad maker, and there must be a great many flaws in us. It would be better to be ground back to dust again, and made over anew so as to become God-made men.

This may also yield us a hold upon God in prayer, for now we can say, "Lord, Thou hast done all this for me; it is plain that thy hand has been in all thy servant's happiness; let thy hand be with me still." Oh, self-made man, when you have made yourself, can you keep yourself and preserve yourself in being? And do you hope to get to heaven and throw up your cap and say,

"HOSANNA TO MYSELF"?

Do you reckon upon such vainglory? If you seek your own glory you shall find no place in that city where God's glory is the all-pervading bliss of the place. So, then, that which tends to keep us humble also becomes an assistance to us in our prayer.

The next point is a consideration of God's mercies. For my part, nothing ever sinks me so low as the mercy of God, and next to that I am readily subdued by the kindness of men. When the clarion rings out for battle I will stand foot to foot with him that dare encounter me, and all the man within me is aroused to the conflict; but when all is peace and quiet, and every one wishes me well, I wonder at their kindness, and I sink into my shoes with fear lest I should act in any way unworthily. The man who has a due sense of his own character will be laid low by words of commendation. Know ye not what it is to be weighted down with infinite goodness, oppressed with mercy, swept away by an avalanche of love? I, at least, know what it means, and I know of no experience which has made me so little in mine own eyes.

I feel less than the least of all His mercies; I shrink and tremble in the presence of His bounty. If even providential goodness does this, you may be sure that redeeming love will be even more effectual. Here is a proud sinner, boasting of his own righteousness; you cannot get his self-glorying out of him; but by and by he learns that the Son of God gave His life to redeem him, poured out His heart upon Calvary's cross, the just for the unjust, to bring him to God; and now he is of another mind. No man could ever think that he deserved that the Son of God should die for him! If he does think so, he must be out of his mind. I have a dear brother in Christ who is now sore sick, the Rev. Mr. Curme, the vicar of Sandford, in Oxfordshire, who has been my dear friend for many years. He is the mirror of humility, and he divides his name into two words, Cur me? which means, "Why me?" Often did he say, in my hearing, "Why me, Lord? Why me?" Truly I can say the same, Cur me? Oh, He is a great Giver! He is a glorious Giver! We are not equal to His least gift! We cannot estimate His least mercy, nor describe it fully, nor praise Him for it sufficiently. His shallows are too deep for us; His mole-hill mercies overtop us; what shall we say of His mountain mercies?

Again, a comparison of our past and our present will tend to humility and also to helpfulness in prayer. Jacob at first is described thus, "With my staff I passed over this Jordan." He is all alone, no servant attends him; he has no goods, not even a change of linen in a parcel, nothing but a staff to walk with; now, after a few years, here is Jacob coming back, crossing the river in the opposite direction, and he has with him two bands. He is a large grazier, with great wealth in all manner of cattle. What a change! I would have those men whom God has prospered never to be ashamed of what they used to be; they ought never to forget the staff with which they crossed this Jordan. I had a good friend who of the truck in which he wheeled home his goods when he first came to London. It was placed over his front door, and he never blushed to tell how he came up from the country, worked hard, and made his way in the world.

I like this a deal better than the affected gentility which forgets the lone half-crown which pined in solitude in their pockets when they entered this city. They are indignant if you remind them of their poor old father in the country, for they have discovered that the family is very ancient and honorable; in fact, one of their ancestors came over with the Conqueror. I have never felt any wish to be related to that set of vagabonds; but tastes differ, and there are some who think that they must be superior beings because they are descended from Norman freebooters. Nobodies suddenly swell as if they were everybody. Observe that Jacob does not say, "Years ago I was at home with my father Isaac, a man of large estate." Nor does he talk of his grandfather Abraham as a nobleman of an ancient family in Ur, of the Chaldees, who was entertained by monarchs. No, he was not so silly as to boast of aristocracy and wealth, but he frankly owns his early poverty: "With my staff, a poor, lonely, friendless man, I crossed this Jordan, and now I am become two bands." It humbles him to think of what he was, but at the same time it strengthens him in prayer. So again I say, that which humbled also encouraged him; he found his strength in prayer in those very things which furnished motives for lowliness.

III. And now, as time flies, we must dwell upon the third point, still hammering the same nail on the head: true humility supplies us with ARGUMENTS IN PRAYER.

Look at the first one, "I am not worthy of all thy mercies;" nay, "I am not worthy of the least of all the many mercies which thou hast shewed unto thy servant. Thou hast kept thy word and been true to me, but it was not because I was true to thee. I am not worthy of the truth which Thou hast shewn to thy servant." Is there not power in such a prayer? Is not mercy secured by a confession of unworthiness? The man whom Christ most of all commended, as far as I remember, was he who used this very language. The centurion came to Christ and said, "Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldest come under my roof;" yet this was he of whom the Lord said, "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel." Depend on it, if you want Christ's commendation you must be lowly in your own esteem; for He never praises the proud, but He honors the humble.

Since the Lord was thus gracious to him when he was unworthy, had not Jacob splendid ground to stand upon while he wrestled with God, and cried, Deliver me from Esau, my brother, though because of the wrong I did him I am not worthy of such deliverance? We are always afraid in our time of trouble that God will deal with us according to our unworthiness; but He will not. We say to ourselves, "At last the sins of my youth have come home to me; now I shall be dealt with according to my iniquities!" But Jacob virtually said, "Lord, I never was worthy of the least thing that Thou hast done for me, and all thy dealings to me are in pure grace. I stand still where I always must stand, a debtor to thy sovereign undeserved favor; and I appeal to Thee—since thou hast done all this for me, an undeserving one, I beseech thee, do yet more. I have not changed, for I am as undeserving as ever, and Thou hast not changed, for thou art as good as ever, therefore still deliver thy servant." This is mighty pleading with the Most High.

Notice, next, how he says

"THY SERVANT."

A plea is hidden away in that word. Jacob might have called himself by some other name on this occasion. He might have said, "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies and of all the truth which Thou hast shewed unto thy child;" it would have been true, it would not have been fitting. Suppose it had run—"Unto thy chosen," it would have been true, but not so lowly; or "unto thy covenanted one"—that would have been correct, but not so humble an expression as Jacob felt bound to use in this time of his distress, when the sins of his youth were brought to his mind. It may seem a small thing to be a servant, but it is a great thing to plead in the hour of need; so David used it: "Make thy face to shine upon thy servant." "Hide not thy face from thy servant; for I am in trouble." "O Thou my God, save thy servant that trusteth in Thee." These are but specimens of the ways in which men of God used their position as servants as an argument for mercy.

Jacob had yet another plea which shewed his humility, and that was

THE ARGUMENT OF FACTS.

"With my staff," says he, "I passed over this Jordan." "This Jordan," which flowed hard by, and received the Jabbok. It brings a thousand things to his mind, to be on the old spot again. When he crossed it before he was journeying into exile, but now he is coming back as a son, to take his place with loved Rebekah and father Isaac, and he could not but feel it a great mercy that he was now going in a happier direction than before. He looked at his staff, and he remembered how in fear and trembling he had leaned upon it as he pursued his hasty, lonely march. "With this staff—that is all I had." He looks upon it, and contrasts his present condition and his two camps with that day of poverty, that hour of hasty flight. This retrospect humbled him, but it must have been a strength to him in prayer. "O God, if Thou hast helped me from abject want to all this wealth, Thou canst certainly preserve me in the present danger. He who has done so much is still able to bless me, and He will do so."

"Can He have taught me to trust in His name,
And thus far have brought me to bring me to shame?"

Does God mock men? Does He encourage their hope and then leave them? No, the God that begins to bless perseveres in blessing, and even to the end continues to love His chosen.

In closing, I think I discover one powerful argument here in Jacob's prayer. Did he not mean that although God had increased him so greatly, there had come with it all the greater responsibility? He had more to care for than when he owned less. Duty had increased with increased possessions. He seems to say, "Lord, when I came this way before, I had nothing, only a staff; that was all I had to take care of; and if I had lost that staff I could have found another. Then I had thy dear and kind protection, which was better to me than riches. Shall I not have it still?" My brethren, at this hour I know how to use this self-same plea. To me every advance in position among men means more obligation to serve my Lord and bless my generation. I need more grace, or my failure will be the more shameful.

Come, dear friends, the Lord hath been mindful of us as a Church, and He will bless us. We have obtained, through our Lord Jesus and His Spirit, blessings so large that I can say in your name, we are not worthy of the least of all these mercies. Shall we not use them to God's glory? Yes, more than ever; for we are determined to pray more, and to believe more, and to work more, and to be more full of courage and dauntless resolve that the name and the truth of Jesus shall be made known wherever our voice can be heard. With a full heart I pray for you, beloved. God bless you, for Christ's sake. Amen.

THE METROPOLITAN TABERNACLE (a picture of which we give on page 460) was opened for public worship in May, 1861. The entire cost was $156,660, and it was opened free from debt. The measurements are: length, 146ft.; breadth, 81ft.; and height, 62ft. There are 5500 sittings of all kinds, with room for 6000 persons without excessive crowding. There is also a lecture-hall holding about 900, schoolroom for 1000 children, and numerous classrooms, vestries, and offices of various kinds. This place is the home of a number of religious agencies of various kinds, and continually being used in different ways for directing work for the advancement of the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. It was built specially for Mr. Spurgeon after various edifices in different parts of London had been tried and found too small to hold the crowds of people who came every Sunday to hear him preach.

It was in this building, thronged with people assembled to congratulate Mr. Spurgeon on his attaining the age of fifty years, that the following testimony of obligation was made by who was laboring under deep emotion: "Mr. Spurgeon has said to-night that he feels like weeping. I have tried to keep back my tears, but I have not succeeded very well. I remember seventeen years ago coming into this building, a perfect stranger in a foreign land, and here I lit anew my torch. I don't know that I should ever have been in England now had it not been for Mr. Spurgeon. Twenty-five years ago, soon after I was converted, I began to read of a young man preaching in London with great power, and a desire seized me to hear him. I never expected to be a preacher at that time, but everything I could get hold of in print which referred to him, I read with the deepest interest. I knew very little about religious things, but I knew I was converted. I did not have what Mr. Spurgeon has—a praying father; my father died before I was four years old. I was thinking to-night, when I saw his venerable father by his side, that he was a great deal better off than ever I was in that blessed possession. His mother I have not met, but most good men have a praying mother.

"In 1867 I made my way across the sea, and if ever there was a 'seasick man,' for fourteen days, I was that man. When I arrived in London, the first place to which I made my way was this building. I was told I could not get in because I did not possess a ticket of admission, but I determined to enter the interior, inasmuch as I had travelled four thousand miles for that purpose, and would not be baffled anyhow. I remember well the seat in this building in which I sat, it was just there (Mr. Moody pointed to it); and I wish I could take it back with me to America. I tell you, my dear friends, it is a hallowed spot, and will forever be deeply imprinted on my memory. I followed him up wherever I knew he was about to preach, and went to the Agricultural Hall to hear him there. I shall never forget the blessing I got from his utterances in that place, for they stirred the depths of my very soul. After I got back to America I went to work myself to preach. They asked me if I had seen the different cathedrals here. I told them I had not, for my time was spent in hearing Mr. Spurgeon.

"In 1872 I came over to learn a little bit more, and once more found myself seated in this building, and since then I have been here a good many times, but whenever I come I always get a blessing to my soul. I think I have got a great one to-night, and now, as I look down upon these little orphan boys in front of me, I think of the six hundred boys who have gone out from those institutes to fight the battle of life, and of the fifteen hundred or two thousand young men who have left here to preach the Gospel.

"As to myself, if God can use me He can use you. Why should not one of these orphan boys go out to be a blessing to the whole world? It is not Mr. Spurgeon, after all—it is God. Moses was nothing, but it was Moses's God. Samson was nothing when he was without his God. When he was without God he could not be used, but when God returned to him he was mighty again. I want to say to you—God bless you all—I love you a thousand times more than you can love me.

"Then, again, I have been a very little blessing to you (A voice—'Yes, you have'), but, dear friends, get into the kingdom of God. I pity right down deep in my heart any man or woman who has been in this Tabernacle time after time, and heard the Gospel without accepting it, and taking Christ as their Saviour. I think hell will be ten times more horrible to them."

Turning to Mr. Spurgeon, Mr. Moody continued: "I have read your sermons for twenty-five years, and they always impress me, for they contain no uncertain sound. My library is completely full of them. I don't know what I shall do with the last lot you gave me. God bless you. There is one thing I know, you are never going to die; John Wesley lives more to-day than in his mortal life. Whitefield lives more to-day than when he was in the flesh. John Knox exists to-day in the hearts of men more than he did in his era. Martin Luther has been gone four hundred years, but he still lives. Good-by. We may never meet again in the flesh, but we shall meet beyond the grave in our eternal home. God bless you all."

ESTHER HARRIS'S EFFORT.

"WHAT do you think of the Doctor's notion, Deacon?" said a well-to-do farmer, as he and Deacon Harris walked home together from a church meeting.

"I presume you mean his project of holding a service in Jones's Wood on Sunday afternoon for the men working on the new railroad. Well, of course, he asked my advice about it before he mentioned it to the church, and I gave it him. I told him I should not oppose it, because he said the Spirit had laid it on his conscience to do something for the men who, it appears, are grievously drunken and profane—a most ungodly set. I told him I did not approve of it, because there are the proper means of grace, and the church is open to the men. I think if any of God's elect are among the men they would be led to the church. Services in the open air are, to my thinking, sensational; they are a concession to the world, and the seemliness of divine service cannot be maintained. The apostle said, 'Let all things be done decently and in order,' and in such a place as Jones's Wood, with a lot of ungodly, jeering men around, there cannot be that order and reverence which ought to characterize the worship of God. But I would not oppose it, as the Doctor believed he saw the leading of the Spirit in it."

"Just my opinion, Deacon, just my opinion," said the other. "I think we ought to keep to the means of grace God blesses. If people will not attend them, the responsibility is theirs. We support a church, and you know I pay my share of the expenses; and when we have provided a preached gospel and sent a good contribution to the Foreign Mission Board, I believe we've done our duty. Shall you go to the service, Deacon?"

"No; the Doctor did not ask me, seeing it did not commend itself to my judgment; but Esther here will go. She hath a sweet voice, and the Doctor thought if she and a few others went with him to sing a hymn or two it might attract the men. They might be drawn together by the singing, and then he could address them. Esther, my dear, you promised to go, did you not?" said the pious Deacon, addressing his comely daughter, who had walked silently by his side during this conversation.

"Yes, father, I shall be pleased to go, and I told the Doctor so. It is like going out into the highways and hedges and compelling them to come in. If I can help, I shall be glad to do it. I'm not afraid of the men."

"No, no, they'll not harm thee, Esther. I'm not expecting there'll be violence. But there'll be unseemly jokes, and the holy things may be brought into ridicule; but I do not oppose it, though I should not like to be there to hear."

The Deacon was right in his prediction. The service was not a success. The Doctor found the men he sought in the woods, some playing cards, some wandering listlessly about, and others lying on the ground smoking, with cans of their favorite liquor within easy reach. He addressed some words of reproof to them for breaking the Sabbath, which was not quite the way a man of more tact than the good Doctor possessed would have opened the acquaintance with the men. Then some hymns were sung, to which the men listened attentively and applauded. Then the Doctor offered a prayer for the men, whom he described in terms which, however true they were, could not be considered complimentary. Then another hymn was sung, and then the Doctor proceeded to deliver the sermon he had carefully prepared on Sabbath-breaking.

The first words of the sermon were all that the men would hear. "Dearly beloved brethren," said the Doctor, and a shout of laughter was the response. The idea of a man who had never seen them before, calling them "brethren," and "dearly beloved," too, seemed to the rough fellows too absurd. "Dearly beloved brother," one of them said, "loan me a dollar; very pleased to have met you. He cannot refuse a dollar to his dearly beloved, can he, mates?" It was of no use trying to get on any further with the sermon. The Doctor was taunted with being an unbrotherly brother, and was summarily voted mean and unworthy of being considered a relation. More singing was vociferously demanded, and one of the men, who was something of a politician, and followed the proceedings of Congress pretty closely, proposed that "the preacher be given leave to print." The proposal was carried by acclamation, and the men, like their Representatives, regarded the leave given as an escape from a tiresome speaker. The Doctor and his few companions retired before the tumult very crestfallen, and when Deacon Harris and his pastor next met, the latter had to confess that he had "mistaken the leading of the Spirit."

Esther said nothing to her father or any one else on the subject, for she was deeply grieved by the result of the effort. She would have had her pastor make another attempt, had she dared advise him. But she was quiet and modest, and did not think herself qualified in such a case to give advice. But all that week she dwelt upon the affair, and finally resolved, after praying for direction, to go herself alone to the woods next Sunday. At the worst, the men would hear her sing, and that would be a gain, and perhaps they would let her read a chapter. All day Saturday, as she went about her work, her silent prayer was for strength and wisdom, and at night she felt less trepidation at the prospect of her ordeal than ever. But the next afternoon, when she was setting out for the woods, she felt so weak and timid she was near turning back. But she went on until she came upon the men—engaged as they had been last Sunday. There was, however, this difference, that the card-party seemed too absorbed in their game to notice her.

Esther Harris among the Railroad Men.

There was one cluster of half-a-dozen men, she noticed, doing nothing. Two of them seemed to be clerks, and one of those was distinguished by wearing a plug hat. Another, clad in his working dress, but with a clean white blouse and a black silk scarf knotted sailor-fashion around his neck, was known by the men as "Scotch George," and was much respected for his working capacity and his readiness to drink, or smoke, or fight, or sing, and was a man of some influence accordingly. The other three were of the ordinary dull, heavy type of laborers.

"Here's one of the singing ladies," said Scotch George. "Glad to see you, lady," he said, taking off his soft felt hat and removing his pipe from his mouth, but quickly replacing it after his greeting. "Will you give us some music? Glad you've left our 'brother' at home to-day. You're welcome without him."

"Thank you," said Esther, quietly; "I shall be glad to sing for you, if you'll let me."

"Yes, we'll let you; it's kind of you to come. Gentlemen, you'll please come to order," he said, seating himself and addressing his companions.

Esther sang several hymns, and the men were evidently moved. "I cannot sing any more now, but I will read a little story to you if you'll listen," she said, diffidently.

"Why certainly," said Scotch George, who had constituted himself chairman of the meeting. "Or one of the boys will sing a song for us if you're tired, lady."

"Oh no," said Esther; "I should so like to read to you."

"Then we'll listen with pleasure," said George, with rough gallantry.

Esther opened her Bible at Luke 15, and read the parable of the Prodigal Son. She was about to read another parable, when George insisted on taking the sense of the meeting on the story. There was, it appeared, a difference of opinion as to the old gentleman's way of treating the scapegrace, and a disposition on the part of some to sympathize with the elder brother, who was "angry and would not go in." Various opinions were expressed, and then Esther was requested to state her view. Such an opportunity she had not hoped for, and, looking up to God for help, she told the men of God's infinite patience, forbearance, and unfathomable love. Not a jeer, not a joke, not a rude word was spoken. The idea of God as a loving Father, ready to receive penitent men and forgive them, was so new to the men that they were amazed. A quiet, "Thank you, lady," was the only response. Esther asked if she might offer a prayer, and permission was readily accorded. The simple, sublime words of the best of all prayers, "Our Father who art in heaven," were the most appropriate, and Esther uttered them with the sweet tenderness a woman's voice sometimes has in it.

When Esther rose from her knees she noticed on all faces a look of quiet, sobered thoughtfulness. As she bade her little congregation good-by, Scotch George turned to the others and said, "What do you say, boys?" There were a few words spoken in an undertone, and then he came up to Esther and, addressing her respectfully, he said, "Madam, preaching and religion are not much in our line; we are a rough lot, but we've enjoyed your visit. If so be as you think we're worth the trouble of talking to, we should like to, see you again. Anyway, the boys give you a unanimous vote of thanks for to-day's pleasure." All heads were uncovered in token of approval.

Esther did go again and again as long as the men were working on that section of the line, and she had the gratification of seeing the same faces regularly, though her congregation was continually increasing. She received the confidences of some of the men, notably of Scotch George, who was himself an unrepentant prodigal; and it was with sincere pleasure she heard that after her first Sunday's service he had sat down and written a letter, with a ten-dollar note in it, to his old mother in Scotland, to whom he had not written before in seven years. Esther was able to give the men good advice, and she saw that God had used her for good. When the men removed to the next section she received from them a promise that they would give a welcome to her brother, who resided in that location, and who, as she afterward heard, continued the good work she had begun in much diffidence, but in faith and prayer.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

Hester's Visit to Aston Court.

HESTER'S new melancholy was rather a soft and tender sadness than the old, hard, gloomy monotony of the continual weight of dejection. There is a moment in the early dawn when the growing light seems to tremble and draw back a little, as if it would fain linger longer in the dark mantle of the night. Such a moment had come to Hester. Her eyes had caught a light brightening on the horizon, and her heart had felt a glow of warmth reaching it; and for a moment or two longer she wished to keep her eyes closed, and take back the familiar chill to her heart. She knew herself no more. Caprices, foreign to her hitherto, had gained the mastery over her. Sometimes a passion of tears shook her; at others a vehement desire to exhaust herself by action, when the binding-press in the attic seemed like a refuge to her. The shrewd old Frenchwoman fancied she could read the girl's heart like an open book; and a hundred cunning little wrinkles netted themselves about her eyes and lips. She assured milord Robert that before long it would be quite safe to tell Hester of his love.

It was the hope, both of Mr. Waldron and Robert, that Grant's marriage might open the way naturally for once more inviting Hester to visit at Aston Court. The small festivities attending it might include her. When, therefore, Miss Waldron announced her opinion that it would be but a graceful courtesy to invite Grant, his bride, and Carl to dinner, with something of ceremony and state about it, Mr. Waldron gently insinuated that Hester, also, might be induced to join them, or rather that John Morley might listen to the invitation. Miss Waldron would probably have scouted the idea with indignation, had not Robert warmly seconded his father. She knew exactly how far she could venture in opposition to her brother; and it was very plain that he had so set his heart upon this as to make contradiction dangerous.

In consequence, Mr. Waldron was permitted to introduce the subject to John Morley, which he did in an informal manner at the close of a Sunday evening service, judging it best to take him utterly by surprise. Mr. Waldron had shaken hands with Hester, and looked into her face with one of his half-fatherly glances of affection, when he turned to John Morley with an air as if he had but just thought of the matter.

"By-the-by, Mr. Morley"—he had dropped the epithet, brother, some time ago—"Grant and our young minister, with Mrs. Grant, dine with us to-morrow. I think you ought to let my little friend Hester come with them. She wants some young society. Give me your promise that she shall come to-morrow."

He waited with ill-concealed anxiety for the answer, and John Morley looked keenly but silently at him, longing to inquire whether Robert was at Aston Court, for he knew nothing of his movements, yet unable to pronounce his name.

"Should you like to go, Hester?" he asked.

Hester's heart had bounded with mingled surprise and pleasure at Mr. Waldron's invitation. For the last week or two time had been very monotonous and irksome to her, and she felt a girl's natural desire for some change.

Besides there was no shock to her in the idea of meeting Robert Waldron, whom she had seen so often of late.

"I should like it very much," she answered, "if you would not be grieved, father."

"No, no," he said, hurriedly. "She shall come, Mr. Waldron, she shall come."

John Morley drew his daughter's hand through his arm, as they passed through the chapel porch, and looked down upon her questioningly by the light of the lamp hanging over the entrance.

"Hester," he said, with a new tone of tenderness in his voice, "Hester, they invite you now to their parties. Is it that you are grown up into a woman?"

"I suppose so, father," she answered, half gayly and half sadly.

"How old are you then, child?" he asked.

"I am nearly twenty," she replied.

"Twenty!" echoed John Morley. "And I have taken no count of the years! Your mother was older than you when I married her; and she has been dead these nineteen years. Have you any thought of being married, Hester?"

The question was put in simple seriousness, but in the tone rather of a friend than of a father, who might expect to have a voice in the matter. Hester's hand trembled a little upon his arm, but he did not perceive it.

"How should I, father," she said.

"Ah! how should you?" he repeated. "You see no one, and know no one. Yet, my child, I should like to know that you were happily married. When I think of it I feel that I have done you a great wrong. But you shall go this once to Aston Court. Have you any pretty dress you can wear, child?"

It was so extraordinary a thing for John Morley to concern himself in so frivolous a subject as dress—his own or any one else's—that Hester could scarcely believe she had heard him aright. Her wardrobe was scanty, for money was scarce, and becoming more so every month; but she assured him that she should do very well.

"Hester," he said, when they had reached a dark part of the street, and she could not see his face, though she could detect a sharp anguish in his voice, "do you know if his son is at home?"

"Yes," she answered softly, and pressing his arm to her side.

"You will see him, and speak to him," he resumed. "I cannot. God forgive me in this, if I sin in it. I believe it would kill me to meet either of them; and I am not fit to die yet. But they say he is contrite and repentant. I give you my consent to see him."

The confession that she had already seen him trembled upon Hester's lips; but the recollection of his prolonged agony of despair sealed them. If she had had anything definite to tell him about Rose she would have had the courage to do it; but to say only that she was lost would be simply to awaken the sharpness of his grief again. She resolved to pursue her course of concealment, and to hide everything from him that could add to his sorrow. It was a perilous path for a young girl to choose.

Robert heard that Hester was positively coming to Aston Court, with a delight which he could scarcely disguise. Ever since he had come to the conclusion that she, and she alone, could satisfy his fastidious notions of what his wife must be, he had longed to avail himself of the advantages his position and surroundings gave to him. Hitherto she had met him only in Madame Lawson's garret; and he wished her to see him in his own sphere—the master of a position which must dazzle her young mind. He contrasted with self-gratulation the sumptuous elegance and costly taste which he had introduced into his father's mansion, with the bareness and poverty of her own home.

All the next morning he sauntered about the handsome rooms, and the terraces, where still lingered much of beauty, even in the later days of autumn. He pleased himself with picturing Hester at his side, expressing more by looks than words her shy pleasure in this loveliness and luxury. By a curious perversity of reasoning, he had begun to regard a marriage with her as a fitting compensation for the wrong he had been guilty of toward her family. He felt sure that he could make his father acknowledge the strength of his arguments; but how could he convince John Morley? He must secure Hester's love first.

The evening came, and the hour when Hester should arrive. Miss Waldron had sent a carriage to Grant's house, for Carl was suffering from a cold, which made it necessary to load him with most gentle attentions. She had, however, let Hester slip out of her mind; and as Annie Grant and Carl had no knowledge of her accepted invitation, they had, of course, come without her. Mr. Waldron himself was keenly disappointed. The night was dark and foggy, and Hester had no one to escort her through the lonely park. Miss Waldron said she was sorry with a lurking smile of satisfaction, and busied herself to see that Carl had the warmest seat by the fire. Robert made no complaint, but went out quietly to order the carriage back to Little Aston, and at the moment that he passed through the hall, the large doors were thrown open by a servant, and Hester herself appeared upon the threshold.

She stood still for an instant, with a glance, half frightened, into the great hall, which was brilliantly lit up. Her lips were slightly parted, and her breath came flutteringly with the speed at which she had been walking, and her large gray eyes were still deep and dark with the darkness through which she had come. The night, with its thick fog, looked black behind her, while the colored pavement of the hall and the stained glass of the lamp over her head, made the foreground rich in tone. The strong contrast of light and shadow, with Hester standing on the line which separated them, looking lonely, embarrassed, and timid, formed a perfect picture to Robert's eyes. He hurried forward to welcome her, and the servant drew back respectfully.

"Is it possible you have come all alone?" he asked.

"I had no one to come with me," she replied. "I went to Mrs. Grant's, but she was gone. I was obliged to walk on alone or return home."

"Did you wish to come so much?" he said, lowering his voice. "Are you, then, glad to be here again, Hetty?"

Her answer was not ready, and her eyes drooped till he could see the nervous quivering of the long eyelashes.

"I think I am," she said at last; "I am not sure. In some things it seems scarcely right to be here; but still I am a little glad."

The gladness was so qualified, and the qualification so conscientiously expressed, that Robert did not know what to reply.

"Go and take off your shawl," he said, touching it lightly with his hand; "I will wait here for you to take you in the drawing-room."

He watched her intently as she followed his sister's maid up the broad low steps of the staircase with a subdued and quiet grace which was perfectly in tune with his matured taste. He paced up and down the hall, chafing at every moment she was away. There were twenty minutes yet till the hour for dinner, and he would keep her all to himself for that short period. Impatient as he was, he did not see her descend the staircase, and did not know she was close beside him, so noiseless was her approach, until she spoke in tremulous accents, and then he started violently. There was a scarcely-mastered excitement in herself which lent a color to her cheek, and when she placed her hand upon his offered arm, he felt that it was trembling.

"We will not go into the drawing-room just yet," he said; "I have a painting or two to show you."

He led her into a room which had been built especially for his own use, since his return to Aston Court. It was lofty and spacious, and wainscotted throughout by carved panels of some light wood which had a pleasant lustre upon its surface. There were a few good pictures, and here and there a handsome cabinet or book-case. At one end was an organ which he had ordered to be made for this particular place, that the volume of sound should suit the space exactly; for he had become almost a master of music. A piano stood beside the organ. There was nothing of beauty or luxury lacking which his heart could desire; and over all a soft light was shed by shaded lamps.

He led Hester to the hearth, and placed her in a low chair before the fire. There he stood, with his arm resting on the mantel-piece, looking down upon her drooping head and shy, almost awkward, attitude of embarrassment. How poorly she was dressed, in her gray stuff gown, with her sole ornament, a little silver brooch, fastening the collar round her graceful throat. There was not a maid-servant in the Court who could not have put on a smarter dress to go out on a visit. It would form an odd contrast with his sister's toilet and the unfaded finery of the young wife. But he liked it well. The very poverty and simplicity of Hester's appearance was charming to him. Perhaps she guessed partly what he was thinking about as his downward gaze scrutinized her, for she glanced up to him with a smile of singular archness and sweetness.

"I am not very fit for such a grand place," she said.

Not fit for such a grand place! Robert's heart bounded, and the blood tingled through his veins. What did Hester mean, wont as she often was to betray her thoughts with innocent frankness? Has she been thinking of herself as—as—. Robert could not finish the sentence in his own mind. What should he say to her? It would be something excessively significant, or excessively commonplace. How much dare he say to her?

The opportunity of saying anything was snatched from him; for, while he hesitated, the door opened, and Mr. Waldron made his appearance. He did not see Hester until she rose from her low chair, and then he arrested himself with an exclamation of astonishment.

"Why, Robert! Why, Hester!" he ejaculated.

Robert was never at a loss as to what to say to his father, and now he found himself able to speak fluently.

"I found Miss Morley just come in," he said; "and as she was both cold and agitated by her lonely walk through the park, I brought her in here for a few minutes before taking her into the drawing-room."

"Oh!" was all that Mr. Waldron could at first reply. He knew that his son must have seen Hester at the time that he was lying ill in John Morley's house; but he had no idea that any intimacy could have been founded upon that ill-omened introduction. He recovered, however, from his profound amazement enough to give Hester a most cordial welcome; and then he conducted her himself to join the rest of the party.

It was a more than usually pleasant evening both to Miss Waldron and Robert. She kept possession of Carl, and paid him every possible attention; while Robert scarcely quitted Hester's side. This devotion did not escape his sister's observation, but it served her purpose well; and she could not descry any danger in it. It kept Carl away from Hester, and threw him solely upon her blandishments. Robert's delight in Hester increased hour after hour; and when the evening was ended, and she had gone away, this time in the carriage which also contained Carl, he resolved to ask his father's counsel and consent to his marriage with John Morley's daughter before many more days had passed.

For several months past Mr. Waldron's first earthly wish had been, as we know, to see his son married. He was satisfied for his daughter to remain unmarried, as she adorned a single life by so much zeal and devotion; and perhaps he was reconciled to it the more readily as his family name would not be transmitted through her to posterity. But already Robert had attained an age when a man grows more difficult to please, and more discriminating as to feminine perfections. Hester ought to have been a hundred-fold more flattered by his preference than she could have been by the love of Carl Bramwell. Mr. Waldron's search after a daughter-in-law, whose price should be above rubies, was becoming an almost despairing pursuit; and Robert gave him no assistance. On the contrary, he appeared to be settling down into an indolent, self-indulgent, bachelorhood.

EARLY FRIENDSHIP REMEMBERED.

S. S. Lesson for July 27, II Sam. 9. Golden Text, Prov. 27 : 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Original Covenant—Extended to Jonathan's Descendants — David Respecting his Vow—His Inquiries for Saul's Family—His Desire to Show Kindness to them—Not a Grudging Kindness—A Cordial Welcome to Jonathan's Son—Mephibosheth's Low Estimate of himself—Acceptance of David's Kindness—His Place at the King's Table.

"THINE own friend, and thy father's friend forsake not." Although written by Solomon, these words are such a keynote to our chapter, and so completely the practice of David himself, that we cannot but conclude that Solomon learned them of his father. Between Jonathan and David a covenant had been made in the time of their early friendship, not exacted on either side, but made by Jonathan as his own soul" (I Sam. 18 : 3). And this covenant was renewed when Saul's wicked jealousy made him seek David's life, and David was obliged to flee. Jonathan said, "Thou shalt not only while yet I live shew me the kindness of the Lord, that I die not: but also thou shalt not cut off thy kindness from my house forever; no, not when the Lord hath cut off the enemies of David every one of them from the face of the earth. . . . And Jonathan caused David to swear again, because he loved him; for he loved him as he loved his own soul" (I Sam. 20 : 14–17; see also I Sam. 23 : 16–18).

The time had now come when the enemies of David were cut off; should he keep his covenant? Saul was dead and Jonathan was dead. The Lord had given David the land; the hearts of the people were his; why, then, be so scrupulous as to regard a covenant made in all the heat and ardor of youthful enthusiasm? Would it not be very impolitic to revive any interest in the house of Saul? Might it not have very mischievous tendencies for the welfare of his own house? All these arguments might have influenced a man who lived for himself. David, however, lived for God; his friendships were formed for God and not for self-satisfaction; his interests were in the hands of God; the Lord was his Shepherd, he could not want. Thus we find David seeking in no way to shirk his obligations. He knew the law, "When thou shalt vow a vow unto the Lord thy God, thou shalt not be slack to pay it: for the Lord thy God will surely require it of thee; and it would be sin in thee. . . . That which is gone out of thy lips, thou shalt keep and perform" (Deut. 23 : 21). David thus walked before God, knowing that in following Him his own interests were perfectly safe.

The king did not even wait until he should hear by chance of any descendant of Jonathan, but made active inquiry, not simply for his children, but even Saul's; "Is there yet any that is left of the house of Saul, that I may shew him kindness for Jonathan's sake?" It was not long before a servant of the house of Saul, named Ziba, was discovered. And the king inquired of him whether any were yet left of the house of Saul, "that I may shew unto him." David's measure in all things was God. When he met with the Philistine, he measured the strength of God, not his own strength against him; it was the same with the lion and the bear. When Saul pursued him, he would not lift his hand against the Lord's anointed, but said, "the Lord be Judge, and judge between me and thee, and see and plead my cause" (I Sam. 24 . 15). And now he would no more exercise his own kindness than his own strength; it was the Lord's strength which had succored him, it should be the Lord's kindness which he would show to the house of his enemies. Ziba answered, "Jonathan hath yet a son, which is lame on his feet. And the king said unto him, Where is he? And Ziba said unto the king, Behold he is in the house of Machir, the son of Ammiel of Lo-debar." It would be no ornament to David's court that a man lame on both his feet, walking on crutches, should appear there, but "the kindness of God covers our infirmity;" and this was no hindrance to David.

"Well, I suppose we must do something for young Smith," says a very rich man; "his father and I were close friends, and he has asked me to look after the lad. I can't have him here at the house, of course; it couldn't be expected! I wonder if he is good at figures? I think I'll put him to board at my head clerk's, and turn him into the office; he may turn out very useful, and I may as well get what I can out of him, as he is left on my hands." Is this the kindness of God? "What is one to do with poor relations?" says another; "one can't ask them to the house; one doesn't know who might call and meet them, and I'm sure I wouldn't like to say that that awkward, gawky girl was my first cousin, or that rough, unmannerly old man, just come from England, was my uncle." Is this the kindness of God?

David sent and fetched the lame Mephibosheth, and when he was come, "he fell on his face, and did reverence. And David said, Mephibosheth. And he answered, Behold thy servant. And David said unto him, Fear not: for I will surely shew the kindness for Jonathan thy father's sake, and I will restore thee all the land of Saul thy father; and thou shalt eat bread at my table continually." This is "the kindness of God;" David treated him as a friend and an equal, and dealt with him as he would have dealt with his father. Mephibosheth was overcome, and in the depth of his grateful surprise said, "What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am?" And David engaged Ziba as Mephibosheth's landsteward to farm on his account, and bring all the revenue to his master; but Mephibosheth himself was to be

"AS ONE OF THE KING'S SONS."

There is precious typical teaching in this history. Mephibosheth was the representative of Saul (the grave), the type of self, which is God's rival. David, not Saul, is God's king. Saul has been rejected, and is slain. What a type of us is this lame representative of the house of Saul! Saul's blood within us, self our life by nature, yet, by the reign of our David, lame on both feet, lame in soul and lame in body, as far as any power to serve God is concerned. Mephibosheth's refuge was with Machir, son of Ammiel of Lo-debar. Machir means "sold;" Ammiel "people of God;" Lo-debar "without pasture." Sold under sin, although of the people of God, and without pasture! Such is the position of every lost sinner and of every child of God who is not under the direct sway and care of our David, God's Beloved. None can take us out from such a position but Jesus only, and every one of us is either eating meat at His table, holding continuous intercourse and communion with Him, taking our position as "one of the King's sons," "heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ," or—we are yet in ourselves, sold under sin, or under self, in bondage, without pasture, barren in our spiritual life. We have the call, as Mephibosheth had, to leave all the past behind and the provision of grace which is offered to us. When Mephibosheth saw David, he said, "What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead dog as I am?" And yet he did not for an instant, on account of his unworthiness, think of refusing the grace of David. Satan has two ways of snaring us, and self is at the bottom of both. On the one hand, he says, "You have advantages of nature which stand you in good stead; you are so amiable, and then you are so patient, and you are so gentle; you are so full of energetic zeal, that the Lord has something to work upon in you; and then, too, you are such a student of the Word, and that goes for something; and you are so consistent in your conduct; and then you have such a name, and so, of course, you are of more value in the eyes of God than anybody who has none of these advantages." Thank God, Paul vanquishes Satan on this ground with one blow. "Who maketh thee to differ from another? and what hast thou that thou didst not receive? now if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory, as if thou hadst not received it (I Cor. 4 : 7)? The other plan Satan has is to watch for the moment when, in the presence of Jesus, we find out what we are; when we call ourselves dead dogs, as Mephibosheth did; and then, to occupy us so much with what we are, as to hinder us from accepting and living in the fulness of the grace which is in Christ Jesus.

Mephibosheth did not return to the house of Machir because he was so lame and useless; he dwelt in Jerusalem (the city of peace), the true dwelling-place for a child of God, "for he did eat continually

AT THE KING'S TABLE."

Just as for Jonathan's sake he got his place there, so it is for Jesus' sake that our loving heavenly Father gives us our place at His table. He does not want us to be occupied with our lameness or our leanness, but with the meats of His table. Not with our lack, but with His fulness; not our unseemliness, but His beauty. It is not His will that His children should be banished from His table, or partake sparingly, for He says, "All that I have is thine." For soul, or body, or circumstances, "All that I have is thine." For every need which may arise in any relation of life, "All that I have is thine" (Luke 15 : 17).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Conflict between the two Houses of the British Parliament continues the most prominent topic in that country, eclipsing even the Egyptian question. Mr. Gladstone appears anxious to reach a compromise with the Lords on the Franchise bill, and has made proposals to that end through his foreign secretary. The more Radical section of the Liberal party, on the other hand, hopes that the Lords will refuse to compromise and adhere to their present position of hostility to the bill. An agitation against the Upper House will then be commenced in the country with some probability of success, having for its object the abolition of the House of Lords as a legislative House. It is reported that the Peers already have shown signs of fear, and are disposed to recede if they can do so honorably. The project some of them offer as a basis of compromise, is that if Mr. Gladstone will undertake to prepare a bill removing the present anomalies in the representation, and submit it to Parliament at an autumn session, they will reconsider their decision not to admit the agricultural laborers to the Franchise. The anomalies referred to are glaring, as the English have no system of apportionment such as we possess. In some parts of the country three hundred voters elect a member of Parliament. In others a member has a constituency of a hundred thousand. Mr. Gladstone announces that if the Peers remain firm he will summon an autumn session and pass the bill in the Commons a second and even a third time, and send it to the Lords until they do accept it.

A Grave Scandal has Occurred in Ireland. Mr. Cornwall, the Secretary of the Irish Post Office, who has been in office more than thirty years, and a few other officials were active, during the recent troubles, in causing the imprisonment of the leaders of the Land League party. Among those cast into prison was Mr. O'Brien, the editor of United Ireland. When O'Brien recovered his liberty he employed detectives to watch Mr. Cornwall and his associates. As the result of their investigations he charged the officials with odious immoralities, publishing his charges in his journal. Thereupon Mr. Cornwall brought an action for libel against O'Brien, which has been recently tried in Belfast, resulting in O'Brien's acquittal. The verdict substantially affirmed the truth of his charges. Mr. Cornwall and his associates have since fled to the continent, an act which is accepted as an admission of their guilt. Mr. Trevelyan, the Irish Secretary, announces that the Government will prosecute the culprits.

The Egyptian Conference Held no Formal meeting last week. There were, however, frequent consultations among the representatives of the Powers. It is stated that the demands of the opposing interests have been reduced to writing and form two protocols, which will be the basis of discussion. They are described as widely divergent, but not absolutely irreconcilable. No trustworthy intelligence has been received from General Gordon, though there is an abundance of disquieting rumors. Last week the report was in circulation that Khartoum had fallen, and that the General had been murdered by his mutinous soldiers. Other reports represent him as still holding the city. The absence of reliable news shows that his communications are still completely severed, and that he is consequently in extreme danger.

The Cholera Panic in Europe Increases. Dr. Koch, the cholera expert, insists that the disease is Asiatic cholera, that it will spread throughout Europe, and only extreme vigilance will prevent its introduction to America. In an interview recently published, he said that in the post-mortem examinations he had made on the bodies of persons who had died of the disease in Toulon and Marseilles, he had "recognized the presence of the Indian microbe which he had found in Egypt, but had there always seen it mixed with others; whereas in post-mortems that he has made in France the Indian microbes outnumbered the others immensely." "The microbe," he said, "is rarely met with in the stomach. The disorders of the digestive organs and the gastric disorders are not favorable to it, so it takes refuge in the small intestines, where it can easily multiply." Dr. Koch considers the presence of the microbe a decisive proof that the disease is Asiatic cholera, and earnestly advises the government to take prompt measures by prohibiting public meetings and in other ways to check its progress. Meanwhile the exodus from Marseilles and Toulon continues, and it is feared the refugees will carry the cholera germs with them. At the close of last week the deaths in Marseilles from the disease had risen to sixty-five in a day and at Toulon to seventeen. One case occurred at Lyons.

An Ultimatum has been Presented to China by France and an answer demanded within a week, or war will be proclaimed. It would reach Pekin on July 11th. Private advices from China indicate the character of the reply that the government of that country will probably make. The council claims that it had no intention of invalidating the Convention signed at Tien-Tsin, and maintains that the note signed by Li Hung Chang and Captain Fournier, fixing the date of the evacuation of Tonquin, never received the Imperial sanction. The French press adopts a bellicose tone, but the attitude of the Chinese being now conciliatory, hopes are entertained that war may be averted by the payment of an indemnity.

Destructive Floods have Occurred in Galicia. Many of the small towns were completely submerged. The inhabitants applied for military aid. In Grobla the Vistula broke the dykes surrounding the great forests, and swept away all the timber. The inhabitants took refuge on the tops of their huts. In Russian Poland twenty-five villages were submerged. Near Warsaw, also, the Vistula caused much damage. Several steamers were employed in saving the people and their property, and in taking food to the sufferers. In some parts of Poland, especially around Cracow, typhus fever has appeared, and hospitals have been established.

The Revisers of the Old Testament have completed the work on which they have been engaged twelve years. The new revision, with the notes of the American committee, will be submitted to the convocation, and afterward the complete Bible, as revised, will be issued to the public, probably in the summer or fall of next year. Of the English company, which at the beginning of the work numbered twenty-seven, twelve have died during its progress. The alterations, as in the case of the New Testament, have been kept secret, but it is reported that they are still more numerous and important than in that book.

A New Temperance Organization has been founded in England. It is known as the Society for the Study and Cure of Inebriety, the President being Dr. Norman Kerr, F.L.S. Its promoters hold that drunkenness is not in all cases a vice or a crime, but frequently the result of a depraved or defective organization, transmitted by self-indulgent and vicious progenitors. While recognizing the immense value of religious and moral efforts to arrest the progress of inebriety, and desiring to help their progress, they declare that the evil baffles all efforts yet made, and point to the alarming increase of female intemperance, which undoubtedly prevails. Dr. Kerr regards as conditions favorable to inebriety, hereditary nervous shock, overwork, lack of healthy stimuli, injuries to the brain, and dyspepsia. The object of the society is to investigate these various causes, and to educate the professional and public mind in reference to them. The society is welcomed even by those who do not indorse the doctrines of its promoters.

FIVE NEWLY ELECTED M. E. BISHOPS and the PRESIDENT of the WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

REV. WILLIAM X. NINDE, D.D., LL.D.

AT the election of Bishops at the recent General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the first minister to receive the requisite number of votes was Dr. Ninde, President of Garrett Biblical Institute. On the first ballot taken, May 15th, no choice was made; but on the second ballot Dr. Ninde and Dr. Walden each received a majority of the votes cast.

Dr. Ninde is a native of New York State, having been born at Cortlandville, N. Y., in 1832. He is therefore fifty-two years old. He had the advantage of a Christian home and early religious training, his father being a minister of the Methodist Church. The future Bishop was one of many exceptions to the rule that young men are averse to following the profession of their fathers, which is said—though without foundation—to apply especially to ministers. Young Ninde was drawn while a youth to the work of the ministry, and entered Wesleyan University to receive the necessary training for its duties. He graduated from that institution in 1855.

The first sphere of labor to which Dr. Ninde was attached was that of the Black River Conference, with which he was connected for six years. At the end of that time he joined the Cincinnati Conference, and spent the following nine years working in that city. During that period he presided successively over four churches. From Cincinnati Dr. Ninde removed to Detroit, Mich., where he labored so successfully and with so much blessing that after serving his full term he was urged to return at the earliest period permitted by the rules of the Church, which invitation was accepted in 1873. In the interval Dr. Ninde occupied the chair of Practical Theology at the Garrett Biblical Institute at Evanston, Ill., of which institution he was, in 1879, elected President.

The Christian Advocate thus sketches the character of the new Bishop: "Bishop Ninde is in excellent health, possesses a deep and musical voice, heavy without being harsh, rich and full. His vocabulary has been enriched by reading, and furnishes him with a flow of elegant and expressive language in harmony with his pure and elevated thought. Few men have lived more blamelessly than he; few have won from all with whom they have mingled more willing tributes of respect and affection; few have exerted a more religious influence over those who have mingled with them. An atmosphere of unworldliness, of devout contemplation, and of unobtrusive modesty, has accompanied him through his entire career. As a preacher he is chaste, clear, and, if not terse, cannot be charged with being diffuse. Excellent taste characterizes all that he does. In the turmoil of life, the excitement of debate, the struggle of opposing factions, he has seldom mingled."

REV. WILLIAM TAYLOR,
M. E. Bishop of Africa.

IT is given to few men to lead a life so full of activity and widely extended usefulness as that Bishop Taylor has on record. Other men have covered as wide a field by their writings, but Mr. Taylor's work has been a personal one; and it has been by his presence and by his spoken words that the Holy Spirit has used him in the Lord's service. Twice he has journeyed around the world, preaching as he went, and making longer or shorter stays at the places visited, as opportunities of usefulness presented themselves.

William Taylor was born May 2d, 1821. He is therefore now sixty-three years of age, but his manly, upright figure, his quick, nervous energy, and his elastic step give the impression to a stranger that he is still in his prime. It would be difficult to find a better example than he of the fulfilment of the promise, "They that wait on the Lord shall renew strength" (Isa. 40 : 31). The place of his birth was a city at the base of North Mountain, Rockbridge County, Virginia. His father was a tanner, and until he was twenty years of age the future Bishop spent his working hours in the tannery. The family were Presbyterians; but the father, having attended a camp-meeting at Cold Sulphur Springs, in 1833, profited so much under the preaching of a Methodist minister that he resolved on joining a Methodist church.

William Taylor was converted while a youth, and it became his highest ambition to preach the Gospel, especially as an evangelist. He applied for and received an exhorter's license from the Baltimore Conference, and was subsequently licensed as a preacher and appointed missionary to San Francisco, Cal. His work, "California Illustrated," published by Messrs. Phillips & Hunt, New York, gives a vivid picture of his life in that State. He evidently entered upon his duties in an apostolic spirit, and devoted himself without reservation to the service of his Master. What that work must have been, and what was the courage needed for its performance, only those can realize who remember the California of that time. The gold fever had attracted there a set of wild and desperate characters from every quarter of the globe. They were eager to get gold, and not a few were as reckless in squandering it as they were earnest in seeking for it. Gambling and every form of dissipation flourished, and it was there, in the midst of riot and debauchery, that William Taylor raised the standard of the Cross. There were thousands of reputable, law-abiding citizens even then in California, but Taylor's mission was not to them; it was to those who were lost that he went to proclaim the way of salvation. So earnest was he, and so widely did God bless his labors, that the name "California" Taylor is that by which, even at this day, he is best known.

At the close of his San Francisco work Mr. Taylor entered upon the career of a travelling evangelist. Five years he labored in different parts of the United States, and during the camp-meeting season he worked incessantly, and with remarkable success. His style of preaching in those days was an uncommon one. It was without any pretence of eloquence, but it arrested and held attention by its force and earnestness. None could doubt that the preacher felt deeply the truths he uttered, and believed in their efficacy. He spoke slowly, distinctly, and deliberately, in a strong, well-modulated voice. His sermons were full of logical argument, and now and again the strained attention of the audience was relieved by the narration of some strange incident which he had witnessed himself among the California miners. Like a flash of light those narratives would illumine the rugged path over which he had led his hearers, and show them the truth in life.

In 1862 Mr. Taylor commenced his first foreign evangelizing tour. His destination was Australia. Dr. Buckley, writing of Mr. Taylor's labors in that country, says that at the Ecumenical Council he inquired of the Wesleyan ministers there from Australia as to the success of the different American and European evangelists who had visited the scene of their labors, and without exception they stated that the permanent effects of the evangelistic labors of William Taylor in Australia were greater than those of any other man who ever visited that country.

From Australia Mr. Taylor went to Africa, and labored in Cape Colony, Natal, and Caffraria, where great additions were reported, both among foreigners and natives, 1200 colonists and 7000 Kaffirs professing conversion under his preaching.

India is probably the land nearest to Mr. Taylor's heart. For that country he has labored and prayed incessantly since the first time he set foot in it, in 1870. To see that fair land stretching around him in every direction, with its teeming millions, and to realize that their national religion was idolatry, was to have his spirit stirred within him. He had no salary, but he set to work in faith, believing that God would feed him as long as He had need of him. He had written one or two books, which were selling well in America, and they supplied him with funds for travelling expenses. He preached throughout Southern India, opening preaching-stations everywhere, and where churches already existed doubling and trebling the number of the worshippers. He left India in 1875, to assist Mr. Moody in England; but the condition of India has always been a burden on his heart. Wherever he found a young man moved by a spirit of self-sacrifice akin to his own, and with faith enough to trust God for food and clothing, he has laid the claims of India before him and urged him to go there and work for Christ. No less than forty missionaries have thus gone out under Mr. Taylor's guidance, making no stipulation for themselves, but relying upon God for all their needs.

Space will not permit a description of his work in Palestine, Ceylon, Canada, and South America. The Bishops' address at the General Conference at Cincinnati thus referred to his work in the last-named sphere: "The western coast of South America was visited a few years since by the Rev. William Taylor, and under his influence several young men and women have gone to that region chiefly as teachers, risking their support among the people and also endeavoring, where there is opportunity, to preach the Gospel of Christ." This shows that the plan he adopted for the evangelization of India was applied to South America with success.

At the recent Conference, in May last, Mr. Taylor was present as a delegate from Southern India, and when it was resolved to elect a Bishop for the African field he was chosen for the office. The Christian Advocate, reporting the scene at his ordination, describes it as one never to be forgotten. He was presented to the Bishop by the Rev. Dennis Osborne, a Eurasian, one of the fruits of his work in India, and by the Rev. Marshall W. Taylor, a justly honored and eloquent brother of African descent. When the Bishop exhorted William Taylor to stir up the gift that was in him, a peculiar impression was produced upon the people. All felt that this had been his one work through his whole life.

REV. JOHN M. WALDEN, D.D., LL.D.

DR. WALDEN, who was elected to the Bishopric on the same ballot with Dr. Ninde, was born at Lebanon, Ohio, on February 11th, 1831. He is consequently in his fifty-fourth year. He received his education at Farmer's College, Ohio, where he was invited after graduating to remain as tutor, which invitation he accepted, holding the position for two years. He took a deep interest in public affairs, and at one time was strongly attracted to political life. He was converted while at college, but the political questions which at that time were stirring the minds of men were such as powerfully moved the hearts of Christians. In the questions of the abolition of slavery and the best measures for checking the spread of intemperance especially he took a deep interest, and when he resigned his professorship he removed to Kansas, where he saw opportunities for making his principles felt with effect.

In Kansas the young tutor threw himself into public life with characteristic energy, became an able and accomplished platform speaker, and took a prominent part in social and political agitations. He also established and edited a newspaper devoted to the cause of those who were working to make Kansas a free State. Subsequently he was elected to the Legislature, and for some time held the post of State Superintendent of Public Instruction, for the duties of which office his previous experience in Farmer's College had prepared him.

In 1858, at the age of twenty-seven, when his political prospects were brightest, and when the prizes of the political career would, to many young men, have been most alluring, the young politician retired from the field and devoted himself to the work of the ministry. His course is a revelation of the character of the man. It was not with him a question of social advancement, nor was the ministry regarded in the light of a profession. He deliberately chose to spend his life in preaching the Gospel rather than in seeking earthly honor and reward.

His subsequent career is thus sketched by the organ of his Church: "His first position in the Church, apart from the pastorate, was that of Corresponding Secretary of the Western Freedmen's Aid Society. In less than ten years after his entering the Cincinnati Conference he became Presiding Elder, and in 1868 was elected one of the Agents of the Western Book Concern. To this position he was re-elected in 1872, in 1876, and again in 1880. In 1872 Dr. Walden received a very large vote for the Episcopacy. Again, in 1880, he received the largest number of votes of any of those who were not elected. In 1881 he attended the Ecumenical Conference in London, and read a paper, which attracted marked attention, on 'Civil Measures to Suppress Intemperance, and the Relation of the Church to such Movements.'

"It will be seen from the above that Bishop Walden has had a diversified experience—tutor, journalist, legislator, Superintendent of Public Instruction, pastor, presiding elder, Corresponding Secretary of the Freedmen's Aid Society, Assistant Book Agent, and Senior Book Agent. He is in the prime of life, of vigorous health, and is regarded by those who know him best as an excellent business man. It is predicted that he will particularly excel in attention to the details of his new position and as a presiding officer."

REV. CHARLES H. FOWLER, D.D., LL.D.

DR. FOWLER, the fourth Bishop elected at the Conference, was formerly the editor of the New York Christian Advocate. We cannot do better than transfer to our columns the following sketch of him which appears in the journal with which he was so long and honorably connected:

"Dr. Fowler is a native of Canada, where he was born August 11th, 1837. He is nine years younger than Bishop Mallalieu, six years younger than Bishop Walden, and five years younger than Bishop Ninde. In 1859 he was graduated at Genesee College, with the highest honors of his class. Selecting the profession of law, he began the study thereof in Chicago, but soon became an active Christian, entered the Garrett Biblical Institute, began to study for the ministry, and was graduated in 1861. As soon as he entered the ministry he was in great demand. He entered the city of Chicago immediately, and spent four pastoral terms of three years each in the largest churches of that city. In 1866, before he was thirty years old, he was elected President of the North-western University, but declined the appointment. In 1872 he was re-elected, and accepted the position. He was a member of the General Conference of the same year, and, though a very young man, had a large vote for the office of Bishop. He was afterward nominated for the position of the editorship of the Christian Advocate, and received a large vote, but was not elected; but in 1876, when he appeared as a member of the General Conference at Baltimore, he was elected Editor, and the number of his enthusiastic friends and admirers became very large.

"In 1880 he was elected one of the Corresponding Secretaries of the Missionary Society, to which he has devoted four years of hard, steady, and useful work, visiting Conferences, preaching, speaking upon platforms, writing elaborate appeals and letters, and attending to the business of the office. The writer, as one of the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society, has had opportunity to observe an increasing mastery of the details of the work from year to year on the part of Dr. Fowler during the past four years. After his active, diversified, and public career his election to the Episcopate so early in life is an indorsement seldom received.

"If intellectual ability, energy, personal force, strong will, clear perception, and an untiring pursuit of the ends which his judgment approves, together with great gifts in the pulpit and on the platform, in conjunction with the modifying influences of his new position, can give promise of success therein, the Church has reason to hope that its choice will be increasingly vindicated during a long course of years."

THE REV. THOMAS M'CULLAGH,

The President of the British Wesleyan Conference.

WITH the portraits of these prominent leaders of the Methodist Church in America we give that of the chief of the denomination in England. The Rev. Thomas M'Cullagh, the President of the British Wesleyan Conference, was born at New Inn, in the county of Galway, Ireland, in 1822, and is now sixty-two years of age. He received the elements of education in a good day-school near Woodlawn, established under the patronage of Lord Ashdown. Several years afterward he was removed to a school at Athlone, where he obtained instruction of a more advanced character. While at Athlone, where he had made considerable progress in his studies, he one day, quite accidentally as it then appeared, had an interview with a lieutenant of the Royal Engineers, engaged in making the Ordnance Survey in Ireland, who, discovering that the boy was an expert in Euclid and in other branches of useful knowledge, offered to employ him in his division of the work. The offer was accepted, and he was engaged as an assistant surveyor, till he entered the ministry, in planning and drawing maps.

He was resident at Kilkenny in the year 1839, and while there he was invited by an acquaintance, a young man, to go with him to the Methodist chapel. The preaching of the late Rev. Robert Huston had such an attraction for the young man that he became anxious about the salvation of his soul, and joined the class led by Mr. Thomas Little. While spending an evening with Mr. Huston and other friends at Mr. Little's house, prayer and religious entreaty occupied their attention, and that evening Thomas M'Cullagh found the peace of mind which he was seeking. He gave his heart to God in his eighteenth year, and at once devoted his leisure hours to work in the Sunday-school, in prayer-meetings, and as an exhorter.

Soon after his conversion Thomas M'Cullagh was removed to Mallow, Cork County, where, acting as an exhorter, he ventured to exceed his commission, and took a text occasionally. His first sermon was preached at Ballyclough, in a private house, a few miles from Mallow.

When the Irish Survey was completed in 1841 Mr. M'Cullagh was transferred to the English Survey, and located at Skipton, Yorkshire. He carried with him a note of removal in which he was described as "an exhorter, and had even preached." Soon afterward he was invited to preach anniversary sermons at the village of Embsay, near Skipton. He was advertised as "from Ireland." The Baptists, Independents, and Primitives in the village gave up their services to hear a specimen of Irish oratory. On arriving at the chapel, he found the place crowded out, so that it was with the greatest difficulty that he could make his way to the pulpit. What a trial it was to the nerves of a man who had hitherto only exhorted behind a kitchen chair may be imagined. Thus he preached his first sermon from a pulpit, and in a chapel, and the success then inaugurated has not been on the decline now for more than forty years.

In 1844, without offering himself as a candidate for the ministry, he was proposed, examined before the May district meeting at Huddersfield by the Rev. John Rigg (father of the Rev. Dr. Rigg), sent up to London to be examined in July, and, with fifty-six other candidates, he was accepted on probation by the Conference.

The Conference of 1845 appointed him to his first circuit, Workington, which comprised Cockermouth and Maryport, and where he found work enough to test his courage and patience. To the adjoining circuit of Whitehaven, William M. Punshon was sent to begin his ministry in Methodism, and the two young preachers formed a friendship ardent and lifelong. Mr. M'Cullagh, surviving his friend, preached a funeral sermon and wrote and published his recollections of their early friendship in a small volume. Occupying the first and second years of his probation at Workington, Mr. M'Cullagh spent the two concluding years of his probation at Hexham, where he had for one of his hearers a youth named Joseph Parker, now Dr. Parker, the minister of the City Temple in London and Chairman of the Congregational Union.

Mr. M'Cullagh has travelled in twelve circuits since his ordination, and in each he has had a three years' location, with repeated invitations back to the same town. He has spent six years in Sheffield, nine years in London, and ten years in Liverpool, where he is now stationed. He went to Bishop Aukland in 1852. The work of God so prospered there that additional help was required, and there the popular Peter Mackenzie began his useful career as a hired local preacher.

Mr. M'Cullagh himself has always been a patriotic Irishman in the best sense. He has regarded Popery as the great bane of Ireland, and has believed and declared, both in writing and in speech, that the prosperity of Ireland is not to be found in the maintenance of a tribal life and feeling, but in the closest possible union and assimilation with English life and character.

REV. WILLARD F. MALLALIEU, D.D.

DR. MALLALIEU comes of a Huguenot ancestry, but the family has had many conspicuous Puritan members. He possesses in a marked degree the excellences of both stocks—the firm, rugged, resolute character of the one, with the vivacity and geniality of the other. He was born in Massachusetts in 1828, being now fifty-six years of age. The future Bishop was converted while only a boy. He attended a religious service in a kitchen, which a godly widow, anxious to do all she could in her Master's service, had opened for worship. There the boy was deeply impressed, and his anxiety did not subside until he found peace in Jesus. If, as we hope, the dead are permitted to know the events taking place on the earth, that pious widow must be supremely grateful to God for having put it into her heart to put her kitchen to that use, as she sees the eminence attained by one who looks back to that humble room as his spiritual birthplace.

A personal friend of Bishop Mallalieu thus sketches his subsequent career: "Having determined to devote himself to the ministry, young Mallalieu prepared for college at East Greenwich, R. I., and at Wilbraham, Mass., and was graduated from Wesleyan University. At that institution the writer met him in the year 1856, and took part with him in making addresses in the Presidential campaign in October of that year. Since that time an acquaintance formed under such pleasant circumstances has continued without an unpleasant incident. He entered the ministry in the New England Conference in 1858. He has been very popular in the pulpit and on the platform, has been pastor of large churches in Boston and other parts of New England Conference, and has never been out of the pastorate, unless the position of presiding elder, which he has occupied for the past two years, is considered other than a pastoral position.

"Bishop Mallalieu was a member of the General Conference of 1872. He was a special friend of the late Bishop Gilbert Haven; he was again a member of the General Conference of 1876, and strenuously promoted the election of Gilbert Haven to the episcopacy. He was also a member of the General Conference of 1880, and read the memoir of his life-long friend."

MUSIC IN WORSHIP.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"And they had two hundred forty and five singing men and singing women."—NEH. 7 : 67.

Music the Offspring of Trouble—The Duet in Prison—What God Means us to Do with the Throat—Musical Echoes of the Creative Voice—The March of the Judgment-Day—The Instrument Broken down—The Music of the Ancients—The Music of the Bible—The Oratorio in the Temple—Genius Given to Sacred Music—Present Improvement—Characteristics of Church Music—Should be Adapted to Devotion—Should be Accurate—Should not be Dull—Not be Left to the Choir—A Member's Silence Requested—The National Airs of the Kingdom—Cromwell's Battle Song—The Dedication of the Organs.

THE best music has been rendered under trouble. The first duet that I know anything of was given by Paul and Silas when they sang praises to God and the prisoners heard them. The Scotch Covenanters, hounded by the dogs of persecution, sang the psalms of David with more spirit than they have ever since been rendered. The captives in the text had music left in them, and I declare that if they could find, amid all their trials, two hundred and forty and five singing men and singing women, then in this day of Gospel sunlight and free from all persecution there ought to be a great multitude of men and women willing to sing the praises of God. All our churches need arousal on this subject. Those who can sing must throw their souls into the exercise, and those who cannot sing must learn how, and it shall be heart to heart, voice to voice, hymn to hymn, anthem to anthem, and the music shall swell jubilant with thanksgiving and tremulous with pardon.

Have you ever noticed the construction of the human throat as indicative of

with it? In only an ordinary throat and lungs there are fourteen direct muscles and thirty indirect muscles that can produce a very great variety of sounds. What does that mean? It means that you should sing! Do you suppose that God, who gives us such a musical instrument as that, intends us to keep it shut? Suppose some great tyrant should get possession of the musical instruments of the world, and should lock up the organ of Westminster Abbey, and the organ of Lucerne, and the organ at Haarlem, and the organ at Freeboor, and all the other great musical instruments of the world—you would call such a man as that a monster; and yet you are more wicked if, with the human voice, a musical instrument of more wonderful adaptation than all the musical instruments that man ever created, you shut it against the praise of God.

"Let those refuse to sing
Who never knew our God;
But children of the Heavenly King
Should speak their joys abroad."

NATURE'S MUSIC.

Music seems to have been born in the soul of the natural world. The omnipotent voice with which God commanded the world into being seems to linger yet with its majesty and sweetness, and you hear it in the grainfield, in the swoop of the wind amid the mountain fastnesses, in the canary's warble and the thunder shock, in the brook's tinkle and the ocean's pæan. There are soft cadences in nature, and loud notes, some of which we cannot hear at all, and others that are so terrific that we cannot appreciate them.

The animalculæ have their music, and the spicula of hay and the globule of water are as certainly resonant with the voice of God as the highest heavens in which the armies of the redeemed celebrate their victories. When the breath of the flower strikes the air, and the wing of the firefly cleaves it, there is sound and there is melody; and as to those utterances of nature which seem harsh and overwhelming, it is as when you stand in the midst of a great orchestra, and the sound almost rends your ear because you are too near to catch the blending of the music. So, my friends, we stand too near the desolating storm and the frightful whirlwind to catch the blending of the music; but when that music rises to where God is, and the invisible beings who float above us, then I suppose the harmony is as sweet as it is tremendous.

In the judgment-day, that day of tumult and terror, there will be no dissonance to those who can appreciate the music. It will be as when sometimes a great organist, in executing some great piece, breaks down the instrument upon which he is playing the music. So, when the great is played under the hand of earthquake, and storm, and conflagration, the world itself will break down with the music that is played on it. The fact is, we are all deaf, or we should understand that the whole universe is but one harmony—the stars of the night only the ivory keys of a great instrument on which God's fingers play the music of the spheres.

Music seems dependent on the law of acoustics and mathematics, and yet where these laws are not understood at all the art is practised. There are to-day five hundred musical journals in China. Two thousand years before Christ the Egyptians practised this art. Pythagoras learned it. Lasus, of Hermione, wrote essays on it. Plato and Aristotle introduced it into their schools; but I have not much interest in that. My chief interest is in

THE MUSIC OF THE BIBLE.

The Bible, like a great harp with innumerable strings, swept by the fingers of inspiration, trembles with it. So far back as the fourth chapter of Genesis you find the first organist and harper—Jubal. So far back as the thirty-first chapter of Genesis you find the first choir. All up and down the Bible you find sacred music—at weddings, at inaugurations, at the treading of the wine-press.

The Hebrews understood how to make musical signs above the musical text. When the Jews came from their distant homes to the great festals at Jerusalem they brought harp, and timbrel, and trumpet, and poured along the great Judæan highways a river of harmony, until in and around the temple the wealth of a nation's song and gladness had accumulated. In our day we have a division of labor in music, and we have one man to make the hymn, another man to make the tune, another man to play it on the piano, and another man to sing it. Not so in Bible times. Miriam, the sister of Moses, after the passage of the Red Sea, composed a doxology, set it to music, clapped in on a cymbal, and then sang it. David the psalmist was at the same time poet, musical composer, harpist, and singer, and the majority of his rhythm goes tingling through all the ages.

THE INSTRUMENTS.

There were in Bible-time stringed instruments—a harp of three strings played by fret and bow; a harp of ten strings, responding only to the fingers of the performer. Then there was the crooked trumpet, fashioned out of the horn of the ox or the ram. Then there were the sistrom and the cymbals, clapped in the dance or beaten in the march. There were four thousand Levites, the best men of the country, whose only business it was to look after the music of the temple. These four thousand Levites were divided into two classes, and officiated on different days.

Can you imagine the harmony when these white-robed Levites, before the symbols of God's presence, and by the smoking altars, and the candlesticks that sprang upward and branched out like trees of gold, and under the wings of the cherubim, chanted the one hundred and thirty-sixth Psalm of David? You know how it was done. One part of that great choir stood up and chanted, "Oh! give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good!" Then the other part of the choir, standing in some other part of the temple, would come in with the response: "For His mercy endureth forever." Then the first part would take up the song again, and say: "Unto Him who only doeth great wonders." The other part of the choir would come in with overwhelming response, "For His mercy endureth forever," until in the latter part of the song, the music floating backward and forward, harmony grappling with harmony, every trumpet sounding, every bosom heaving, one part of this great white-robed choir would lift the anthem, "Oh! give thanks unto the God of heaven," and the other part of the Levite choir would come in with the response: "For His mercy endureth forever."

But I am glad to know that all through the ages there has been great attention paid to sacred music. Ambrosius, Augustine, Gregory the Great, Charlemagne, gave it their mighty influence, and in our day is throwing itself on the altars of God. Handel, and Mozart, and Bach, and Durante, and Wolf, and scores of other men and women have given the best part of their genius to Church music. A truth in words is not half so mighty as a truth in song. Luther's sermons have been forgotten, but the "Judgment Hymn" he composed is resounding yet all through Christendom.

I congratulate the world and the Church on the advancement made in this art—the Edinburgh societies for the Swiss singing societies, the Exeter Hall concerts, the triennial musical convocation at Düsseldorf, Germany, and Birmingham, England, the conservatories of music at Munich and Leipsic, the Handel and Haydn, and Harmonic and Mozart societies of this country, the academies of music in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Charleston, New Orleans, Chicago, and every city which has any enterprise.

Now, my friends, how are we to decide what is appropriate, especially for church music? There may be a great many differences of opinion. In some of the churches they prefer a trained choir; in others, the old style precentor. In some places they prefer the melodeon, the harp, the cornet, the organ; in other places they think these things are the invention of the devil. Some would have a musical instrument played so loud you cannot stand it, and others would have it played so soft you cannot hear it. Some think a musical instrument ought to be played only in the interstices of worship, and then with indescribable softness; while others are not satisfied unless there be startling contrasts and staccato passages that make the audience jump, with great eyes and hair on end, as from a vision of the Witch of Endor. But, while there may be great varieties of opinion in regard to music, it seems to me that the general spirit of the Word of God indicates what ought to be the great

CHARACTERISTICS OF CHURCH MUSIC.

And I remark, in the first place, a prominent characteristic ought to be adaptiveness to devotion. Music that may be appropriate for a concert-hall, or the opera-house, or the drawing-room, may be shocking in church. Glees, madrigals, ballads, may be as innocent as psalms in their places. But Church music has only one design, and that is devotion, and that which comes with the toss, the song, and the display of an opera-house is a hindrance to the worship. From such performances we go away saying, "What splendid execution! Did you ever hear such a soprano? Which of those solos did you like the better?" When, if we had been rightly wrought upon, we would have gone away saying, "Oh! how my soul was lifted up in the presence of God while they were singing that first hymn! I never had such rapturous views of Jesus Christ as my Saviour as when they were singing that last doxology."

My friends, there is an everlasting distinction between music as an art and music as

A HELP TO DEVOTION.

Though a Schumann composed it, though a

Mozart played it, though a Sontag sang it, away with it if it does not make the heart better and honor Christ. Why should we rob the programmes of worldly gayety when we have so many appropriate songs and tunes composed in our own day, as well as that magnificent inheritance of Church psalmody which has come down fragrant with the devotions of other generations—tunes no more worn out than they were when our great-grandfathers climbed up on them from the church pew to glory?

Dear old souls, how they used to sing! When they were cheerful, our grandfathers and grandmothers used to sing "Colchester." When they were very meditative, then the boarded meeting-house rang with "South Street" and "St. Edmond's." Were they struck through with great tenderness, they sang "Woodstock." Were they wrapped in visions of the glory of the Church, they sang "Zion." Were they overborne with the love and glory of Christ, they sang "Ariel."

And in those days there were certain tunes married to certain hymns, and they have lived in peace a great while, these two old people, and we have no right to divorce them. "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder." Born as we have been amid this great wealth of Church music, augmented by the compositions of artists in our own day, we ought not to be tempted out of the sphere of Christian harmony and try to seek unconsecrated sounds. It is absurd for a millionaire to steal.

I remark also that correctness ought to be a characteristic of Church music. While we all ought to take part in this service, with perhaps a few exceptions, we ought at the same time to culture ourselves in this sacred art. God loves harmony, and we ought to love it. There is or yelp. In this day, when there are so many opportunities of high culture in this sacred art, I declare that those parents are guilty of neglect who let their sons and daughters grow up knowing nothing about music. In some of the European cathedrals the choir assemble every morning and every afternoon of every day the whole year to perfect themselves in this art, and shall we begrudge the half-hour we spend Friday nights in the rehearsal of sacred song for the Sabbath?

Another characteristic must be spirit and life. Music ought to rush from the audience like the water from a rock—clear, bright, sparkling. If all the other part of the Church service is dull,

DO NOT HAVE THE MUSIC DULL.

With so many thrilling things to sing about, away with all drawling and stupidity. There is nothing that makes me so nervous as to sit in a pulpit and look off on an audience with their eyes three fourths closed, and their lips almost shut, mumbling the praises of God. During my recent absence I preached to an audience of two or three thousand people, and all the music they made together did not equal one skylark! People do not sleep at a coronation: do not let us sleep when we come to a Saviour's coronation.

In order to a proper discharge of this duty, let us stand up, save as age or weakness or fatigue excuse us. Seated in an easy pew we cannot do this duty half so well as when upright we throw our whole body into it. Let our song be like an acclamation of victory. You have a right to sing: do not surrender your prerogative. If in the performance of your duty, or the attempt at it, you should lose your place in the musical scale, and be one C below when you ought to be one C above, or you should come in half a bar behind, we will excuse you! Still, it is better to do as Paul says, and sing "with the spirit and the understanding also."

Again: I remark Church music

MUST BE CONGREGATIONAL.

This opportunity must be brought down within the range of the whole audience. A song that the worshippers cannot sing is of no more use to them than a sermon in Choctaw. What an easy kind of a church it must be where the minister does all the preaching, and the elders all the praying, and the choir all the singing! There are but very few churches where there are "two hundred and forty and five singing men and singing women." In some churches it is almost considered a disturbance if a man let out his voice to full compass, and the people get up on tiptoe and look over between the spring hats, and wonder what that man is making all that noise about.

In Syracuse, New York, in a Presbyterian church, there was one member who came to me when I was the pastor of another church in that city, and told me his trouble—how that as he persisted in singing on the Sabbath day, a committee, made up of the session and the choir, had come to ask him if he would not just please to keep still! You have a right to sing. Jonathan Edwards used to set apart whole days for singing. Let us wake up to this duty. Let us sing alone, sing in our families, sing in our schools, sing in our churches.

NATIONAL AIRS.

I want to rouse you to a unanimity in Christian song that has never yet been exhibited. Come, now! clear your throats and get ready for this duty, or you will never hear the end of this. I never shall forget hearing a Frenchman sing the "Marseillaise" on the Champs Elysées, Paris, just before the battle of Sedan in 1870. I never saw such enthusiasm before or since. As he sang that national air, oh! how the Frenchmen shouted!

Have you ever in an English assemblage heard a band play "God Save the Queen?" If you have, you know something about the enthusiasm of a national air. Now, I tell you that these songs we sing Sabbath by Sabbath are the national airs of Jesus Christ and of the kingdom of heaven, and if you do not learn to sing them here, how do you ever expect to sing the song of Moses and the Lamb? I should not be surprised at all if some of the best were made up of some of the best songs of earth. May God increase our reverence for Christian psalmody, and keep us from disgracing it by our indifference and frivolity.

When Cromwell's army went into battle, he stood at the head of them one day, and gave out the long-metre doxology to the tune of the "Old Hundredth," and that great host, company by company, regiment by regiment, battalion by battalion, joined in the doxology:

"Praise God from whom all blessings flow,
Praise Him, all creatures here below;
Praise Him above, ye heavenly host,
Praise Father, Son, and Holy Ghost."

And while they sang they marched, and while they marched they fought, and while they fought they got the victory. O men and women of Jesus Christ, let us go into all our conflicts singing the praises of God, and then, instead of falling back, as we often do, from defeat to defeat, we will be marching on from victory to victory.

"GLORIA IN EXCELSIS"

is written over this organ, written over many organs. Would that by our appreciation of the goodness of God, and the mercy of Christ, and the grandeur of heaven, we could have "Gloria in Excelsis" written over all our souls. "Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen!"

MR. D. L. MOODY'S ARRIVAL IN NEW YORK.

"LET me see," said Mr. Moody, the evangelist, in a tone of deep reflection, on Sunday morning, as he stepped on to the Cunard Pier in New York; "it wants just ten minutes to eight o'clock. I'm in time for service. Last Sunday I preached at Queenstown. Wonderful, truly wonderful, isn't it?

"I've returned to my native country to stay—yes, to stay for good," he remarked slowly, as though fearful of breaking the good news too suddenly. "I find there is no need to seek for fresh fields and pastures new. Charity begins at home, they say, but with me it shall end there."

"Do you mean to say you have finished with England?" asked the Times reporter.

"I do, indeed. I went over there with the intention of remaining away two years. I stayed there three years. I shall return no more."

"Are you not satisfied with the success of your work over there?"

"Satisfied—no," replied Mr. Moody, in a tone which his name best expressed; "pleased—yes. Some men are never satisfied, you know. I am one of them. But don't run away with a wrong impression," he added, somewhat unnecessarily, for his listener showed no signs of departing. "I have been very much encouraged with the state of things in England. Everything is far more satisfactory than eight years ago. London is now the most religious city in the world. In fact, the Church of England has had a great lift somehow or other, and got a firmer grip on the people. It has adopted the excellent policy of adapting itself to the people—you know the story of Mohammed and the mountain. Well, the consequence of this has been that dissenting bodies have been gaining wonderful ground, especially the Wesleyans, and, in a word, spiritual life in England is in a more flourishing state."

"Do you mean that the Church of England has become less exclusive?"

"I mean this: in London there is a society for every conceivable object. There is a society for the police, for sailors, for soldiers, for factory girls, and for shop girls. The whole of the city seems to be divided up into different classes, and the Church of England has become as aggressive as any Church can be, and reaches into the midst of each of these classes. Its method is goodly in the extreme."

"How is England situated at present with regard to the temperance question?"

"Very comfortably indeed—exceedingly so, thanks. There is not nearly as much intemperance as there used to be among the upper classes. Why, ten years ago, when I was in England, I could hardly go into a house—a Christian house, mind you—where I did not find ten kinds of wine on the table. That is never the case now," he said in what might have been considered a regretful tone, only his countenance shone so brightly with genuine satisfaction. "I attribute this unmistakable sign of spiritual progress (you know what I mean by spiritual) to the church and to the judicious interference of the leading men of the dissenting bodies. The blue ribbon movement has achieved wonderful results, and so has good Sir Wilfrid Lawson's movement. Between these two parties the country has been agitated, and agitation was good for its soul."

"Is England more intemperate than America?"

"I have no statistics on that point, and they are necessary before I could answer your question. But I think that of the two countries England takes the palm, or rather the bottle. I am, however, satisfied that the seeds of temperance are planted in that country, and will doubtless bear good fruit."

"Shall you lecture in America now?"

"Yes, sir; there lies my future field of action. I am going now to my home in Northfield, Mass., there to remain until the fall, when I shall at once commence work."

A Letter from Mr. C. H. Spurgeon has been received by the pastor of the West Troy Baptist Church in reply to the congratulations the church sent to Mr. Spurgeon on his fiftieth birthday. Mr. Spurgeon writes: "I thank you and all your church for their hearty words of love. The Lord bless you all, and send you abounding prosperity. I am greatly gratified by the cordial letters of American friends; and I value greatly the prayer that you have sent up to heaven on my account."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Persecuting Husband Subdued.—Mr. Crow related at a recent meeting: "A fortnight ago, I spoke to a poor woman who had remained behind the first meeting for the purpose of being spoken to by some worker. In a very short time she decided to cast in her lot with Jesus, and going to her home she told her husband, who was very angry, and annoyed her greatly. In much anxiety she asked a Christian friend to call at her house and speak to her husband. When the friend called, the man got angry, but soon cooled down and listened, with some eagerness, to the Word of God. Before the visitor left, the Holy Spirit blessed the message of salvation to his soul."

What Two Good Women Did.—A Member of a Mizpah Band testified: "It is my firm belief that I have been prayed into the kingdom of heaven by a godly mother and a trusting wife. For fifteen years my wife prayed for me without once losing hope, or her faith becoming dim. The night of my conversion my mother had a dream, which assured her that the son, for whom she had prayed for so long, was converted. When she awoke her heart and voice rose in grateful feeling and accent to God for His goodness to her and myself. I never was a drunkard, but I was what some think worse, a mocker, even though I was a church member. On the Sabbath I have sat down at the Lord's table, and on Monday I have trampled Him under foot. The Lord Jesus opened my eyes, so that I saw the error of my ways, and in answer to my heart-felt cry gave me strength to turn into the straight and narrow path."

Caught at the Door.—The Rev. Mr. Carstairs said: "At one of our Saturday night meetings, a friend of a young man, who was going away on a distant voyage, said to me, 'Try to speak with that young man; he will never be here again.' An opportunity was given to those who desired prayer for themselves to rise. I noticed the struggle in his mind, but he did not rise, though he knew, and I knew, that he should have done so. He was among the first to rise to go away at the conclusion; evidently he wished to avoid being spoken to, but I went round by another way, and caught him at the door, and greeted him with, 'You are going away?' 'Yes, the meeting is over,' he responded. 'I mean, you are going out of the country?' 'Yes.' 'Are you taking Jesus with you?' 'I am going to do so, I hope.' I got him to sit down on a bench, and soon learned that he knew the Bible well, but he had learned it with his eyes shut to its true meaning. He left, trusting in Christ as his Saviour, and came back every night till he was forced to start upon his journey."

A Brother Returned from America.—A Christian friend, who is busy seeking the welfare of others, recently gave the following interesting testimony: "It is seven years since my conversion, which occurred in this way. I had a brother in America who was a Christian man, he sent us word that he was coming home. I was not over well pleased when I heard the news, as I knew that he would give me no peace in my sleep of death when he came. Sure enough, my foreboding was fulfilled, for the first night, when we were going to bed, he asked me, 'Are you a Christian?' 'I don't know,' or some other put off, was my reply. He would not be put off, but insisted on talking the matter over with me. Turning up his Bible at Isaiah 53, verses 4, 5, and 6, he explained the whole Gospel to me, and concluded by asking me, 'Do you really think that God will punish you when Jesus has already borne your sins?' It was so plain and easy, that I could hardly believe it. I was always looking for some great difficulty to be cleared away, some great feeling come, and, so to speak, carry away all my previous life and sins to oblivion, or that I would have to do a lot of thinking, and deciding between this doctrine and that creed, this church or that church. The very simplicity of the way was my stumbling-block; but thanks be to the Father of all mercies, He gave me grace to humble myself before His Son Jesus, who redeemed me with His own precious blood."

Saved from the Opium Fiend.—Mr. Jack related: "A friend who was prayed for by us three weeks ago, has obtained complete deliverance from a cruel craving for opium, in answer to our prayers. I was much affected when he told me of the awful struggle through which he had passed before he finally conquered his appetite. For a few days after prayer was made on his behalf, he was strangely calm, and was able to abstain without much trouble; thus his faith was made strong as he rested for a while. So little desire had he during these few days for the deadly drug that he thought he was entirely free from any wish for it. It was, however, merely the calm before the storm; when he had time to recruit his mental and physical energies to meet and nobly withstand the evil, there occurred such a burst of temptation as he had never experienced before. He was much exhausted by the fight, but now he is able to thank God through Jesus Christ, in whom he trusted, that he has gained the victory."

Tearing up a Bible at Court.—Mr. Micking said: "Two or three months ago three Christian Chinese gentlemen had an interview with the Emperor of Japan, for the purpose of presenting a Bible to him. It is the custom in Japan to exhibit in a public place any present made to the Emperor, and it would be a great point gained, these gentlemen thought, to get the Bible received by the Emperor; but God has different ways of thinking than we have. The Christians were introduced to the court by the Chinese Admiral, and they presented the Bible in the usual way. As Christianity is illegal, the Emperor was rather in a difficulty, which his Prime Minister solved by taking the Bible, tearing it into pieces, saying, 'It is wrong to sanction this religion, and it is illegal to present this book.' This rude action, instead of pleasing the Emperor, seemed rather to cause him great annoyance. The news of the sensation which the Bible caused at the court is spreading all over Japan and Corea, and there is likely to be a great demand for it from all classes of society."

Waiting for the Steamboat.—The Rev. Mr. Douglas said: "God has many ways of sending His messengers to preach the Gospel. One way is to send them without their own knowledge that they are sent. An instance of this kind occurred to myself some years ago. I intended to take the steamer from the port at which I was staying for Glasgow, but instead took the one going in the opposite direction, and I soon found myself landed at Dunoon, much to my own chagrin. I had to wait some time for a steamer for Glasgow, and while sauntering about the pier I noticed a number of young men waiting for the same boat. At once I entered into conversation with them, and took the first chance I got to preach the Gospel to them. There were no results apparent at the time, but years afterward I was stopped in the street by a respectable man, who greeted me warmly. I did not know him, and told him so, when he replied, 'Don't you remember taking the wrong boat and being landed at Dunoon?' 'Yes, of course I do,' I said. 'I am one of the young men to whom you preached on the quay. That address was the means of leading me to become a Christian, and I have often wished to meet you so that I might tell you of my conversion.'"

A Soldier Finds Christ in Prison.—Mr. Gilbert Forbes related: "Some years ago, a young soldier, out with his regiment in India, was punished for insubordination. He was the son of Christian parents, who trained him to respect all that was true, and holy, and pure, but the evil influence of corrupt men, with whom he associated, had, for the time being, caused him to despise the precepts and teachings of his parents, and he was now reaping the fruits of his conduct. As he lay in prison, his heart was filled with bitter hatred against the officers who sentenced him, and, in fact, he was angry with all the world, and looked upon himself as an ill-used man. This mood passed away one night, and gentle thoughts of the friends whom he had at home filled his mind; then bit by bit the old verses of Scripture and the hymns which his mother had taught him came back; then he thought of God, whom he was even then rebelling against. At first, terror to face such a holy Being filled his soul, to the exclusion of all other thoughts, but soon the loving promises recurred to his mind, and he was enabled to cling to them and to plead for pardon of his sins for Christ's sake. The Lord graciously heard and answered him in peace, besides giving him grace and strength to testify to the saving power of God, amid much persecution, for many years afterward."

THE COMING KING OF ISRAEL.

By Rev. Dr. Brookes, of St. Louis, Mo.

Part of an Address at Mildmay Conference.

The Prophets' Glowing Anticipations — The Throne of David—The Announcement of James —The Purpose of the Present Dispensation— A Dying Jew's Confession of Christ.

IF we assume, which we ought to do, that the Holy Ghost knew what He wanted to communicate, and that He meant what He said, there can be no controversy about the personal coming of the Lord Jesus Christ to reign over Israel. It is not a question for us to speculate upon. It is a question to consult God's Word about, and to be subject to it.

I would simply ask any one who has read the Old Testament prophets, for example, whether every one of them does not dwell with glowing anticipation upon the coming of the Lord Jesus, to lift up the fallen banner of Israel, and to reign over His ancient people in power. Our Lord's Second Coming is

THE CRISIS OF THIS WORLD'S HISTORY.

Some of the events predicted in prophecy, perhaps, have been fulfilled, still they are only stepping-stones, so to speak, on which the Holy Ghost stands for a moment as He goes on toward the supreme moment in the world's history when Christ will come back to be glorified on the theatre of His sufferings and death. Everything points to that.

Look for a moment at the well-known passage in Isaiah 9 : 6: "Unto us a child is born. . . . Of the increase of His government there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." It is not a question of the faithfulness of Israel; it is the unconditional sovereignty of the Almighty God that is going to bring it about. See also Psalm 89 : 34. There are other like passages in the 110th and 132d Psalms (see verse 11), where we have most explicit promises, in which the faithfulness of God is pledged to the restoration of Israel and the reign of Jesus Christ. Psalm 45, too, is a celebration of the coming of Jesus to reign over Israel. Jerusalem will be

THE METROPOLIS OF GOD'S MILLENNIAL EARTH.

In the New Testament we find these Scriptures confirmed. "He shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto Him the throne of his father David; and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke 1 : 32, 33). What can that mean if it does not mean that Jesus is to sit upon the throne of David? Is David's throne in our hearts, or in heaven? David's throne was in Jerusalem.

Acts 15 : 14–18 is to my mind a most conclusive passage if there were no other. The question came to be discussed in the only college of the apostles we know of, whether those who had been Gentiles previous to their conversion could be required to observe certain ceremonies of the Mosaic law. Paul and Barnabas were sent from Antioch to consult the apostles at Jerusalem upon this important subject. Peter took the ground that they were not to be put under the ceremonial law. When he had finished his address, James, who was evidently a pillar of the Church, makes an authoritative announcement upon the whole subject: "Simeon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, to take out of them a people for His name." Is there one intimation, from the first chapter of Genesis to the last of Revelation, that God ever had any other purpose in this dispensation? I have asked, in the presence of five hundred ministers, to be shown such a passage. I have taken my seat and waited patiently until they could bring forward one text to prove that the world is to be converted by the agencies now employed. I have never found the text yet, and nobody has ever pointed it out to me. His purpose is "to take out a people for His name." James goes on to say: "And to this agree the word of the prophets, as it is written: After this I will return, and will build again the tabernacle of David, which is fallen down, and I will build again the ruins thereof, and I will set it up." After what? After I have taken out of the Gentiles a people for my name,

AFTER THE TIMES OF THE GENTILES

have been fulfilled, when the fulness of the Gentiles shall have come in—"I will return." What for? "That the residue of men might seek after the Lord, and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things."

What, then, is the order during this dispensation of God's Spirit? A people is being taken out of the Gentiles for God's name. There was a time when all believers were Jews; but God's grace overflowed the boundaries of Israel, extending to all the other nations. When Christ comes back, what do we find? This grand work of restitution begins with Israel. The ruins shall be built up, and the desolations removed; then Israel shall be the chosen vessel for the communication of God's grace to all the unsaved nations of the earth.

If God's people would but keep their eye fixed upon the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ as their hope, what a blessing it would be in preserving them from all other expectations. If we look to such things as human progress, the advance of civilization, the power of earthly governments, etc., as the hope of the Church, we are distracted in ten thousand ways. How blessed it is to be ever gazing through the encompassing darkness for the rising of the Sun of Righteousness, which is promised to us in the return of Jesus Christ! The cherishing of this hope will also keep us holy and waiting for Him.

What about the Jew? I feel humiliated and ashamed of our neglect and evil treatment of this people, so dear to the heart of Jehovah. They ought to be dear to us too. If we went more among them, not to blame them, not to remind them of the fact that they crucified the Redeemer, but to pray for them, as our Lord Himself did on the Cross, when He said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" not to heap reproaches upon them, but to take them by the hand, as belonging to the most ancient—if you choose to say it, most renowned—people, how much more we should accomplish! A friend in Boston told me several years ago about by a Christian lady. She talked with him, and at first he was disposed to be surly, thinking she had come to reproach him. I do not wonder at their suspicions and distrust of us Gentiles. I believe we should be worse than they, if we had been treated all these centuries as they have been. This lady conversed with the old man, and asked my friend to go and see him. He went, and told him the story of the Redeemer, pointing out many passages in the Old Testament that had all been fulfilled in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ. It pleased God in the sovereignty of His grace to cause the light of the Gospel to break into his heart. My friend was with him when he died. He raised his hand, and looking up as though gazing into the opened heavens, like another Stephen, he cried out, in faltering accents: "O my God, not Barabbas, not Barabbas, but this Man I take to my heart!" Many of them are ready to say, "Not Barabbas!" Are you ready to go to them with the precious tidings of redeeming love?

TYPES OF CHINESE CONVERTS.

By the Rev. J. W. Stevenson, of the China Inland Mission.

A Talk with a Widow—Her Conversion and Abduction of her Boy — A Mother Converted through Love for her Son—An Agnostic Praying as an Experiment—He and his Wife Accept Christ.

I RECOLLECT a woman whose life had been very cheerless, who had been ill-used by her husband and by her mother-in-law. She believed in the idols, she believed in the superstitions; she dreaded the gods. She passed through sorrow; her husband died and left her with a little boy, to whom she clung. She came up to the town where I was living seeking employment, and entered our service. One day she was sitting with her boy at table, and near her was a young man who had been converted only a few months. Before he ate his rice he bowed his head and asked God's blessing. She noticed this with interest. Then, his heart being full of Christ, he began to speak to her about the Heavenly Father. She said, "Will you explain that?" He replied, "You have a son by your side; you love him very much; you would like him to be grateful to you, and would be hurt if he slighted you. Well, think of God, the Maker of heaven and earth, as your Father. He has kept you, fed you, cared for you all these years, and you have never once thought of it! And I have to tell you He sent His only-begotten Son into the world to save you." Now this thought of a Heavenly Father took possession of the woman, and she stepped out of the gloom and darkness of heathenism into the glorious

LIGHT AND LIBERTY OF GOD'S CHILDREN.

Her life now manifests that God is her Father. She seems to have unbounded faith and trust in Him. She went back to her village with these truths, and began to speak to her friends and neighbors. Her father-in-law was very angry, and threatened to kill her; and if friends had not interfered he would have done so. She bore it all patiently, and then her friends dragged her son from her, and this was a great trial; but still she trusted in her Heavenly Father. She went a long journey to seek her boy, without any money, and preached the Gospel wherever she went. God provided friends; some gave her lodgings, some gave her food, and she was able to tell her simple story. She could not read a word, but her heart was full; and at some of the houses they got a teacher to write down her prayers at her dictation, that they might be able to use them when she had gone. That woman has now been a most devoted Bible-woman for some years, and the one characteristic of her life is—trust in her Heavenly Father.

A YOUNG CHINESE WORKINGMAN heard the Gospel; he was naturally quick—a fiery, enthusiastic youth. He believed in the Lord Jesus Christ with all his heart, and he was a Christian all over. When he went about his business he talked about Christ; he could not help speaking of Christ and His great love. He had a great desire to see his mother saved. He spoke to her with tears, prayed with her, and entreated her to come to the Lord that she might share in the joy and peace that filled his heart. She said, "I am too old; you young people may take up this new religion; the religion of my ancestors will do for me." This distressed his heart; and when he was talking to others he often thought of his own mother. The young man was burdened with the fact that his mother was quite indifferent to the claims of Christ, and he cried to God for her. God was sure to hear such prayers. How did He do it? He laid that young man on a bed of sickness with typhus fever. The mother went to the doctor, she went to the temples; she did all she could, but it was of no avail—the young man got worse, till all hope was gone. Then, in her despair, she came to the chapel, and said, "Oh, sir, will you

COME AND PRAY FOR MY SON?

He is dying." We went, and knelt down by the bedside, and we prayed to God there and then. The woman rose with tears streaming down her cheeks, and said, "If your God will save my son, I vow that I will serve Him in future." We still prayed for him; God did graciously restore him, and this woman became a regular attendant at the services. She became an inquirer, then a candidate for baptism; was duly received, and is to-day a consistent member of the Church. Though this woman's spiritual nature was dead, there was a tender chord in her heart, and God put His finger on that chord. Through her love for her son an entrance was found for the Gospel of Christ, and she was saved.

A CHINESE GENTLEMAN OF POSITION

received the truth. After a very long illness of eight months I visited an out-station, and I met this Chinese gentleman there. He came to me, not to inquire about the truth, but about foreign science, railways, and telegraphs, etc. After I had satisfied his curiosity, I took the opportunity to speak to him about spiritual things. He said he did not believe in anything. He was one of those refined gentlemen who in England call themselves "Agnostics." He said he did not believe there was a God, and if God did exist, he did not think it was possible He would hear and answer prayer. He had tried to read the Word of God, but had found it very uninteresting. I told him, "If you wish to read and to understand it you must pray to God, you must have the Holy Spirit. Then you will be able to understand that Book; and I can tell you that you will find it the most wonderful book that you have ever read." I urged him very earnestly to come to Christ. I felt a special responsibility, and as he went away I said I would pray for him. He said to himself, "This is very strange; here is a foreign devil, as we call him, who is so interested about my salvation and my eternal welfare that he will pray for me—it is very odd, to say the least of it." He thought it over, and the more he thought of it the stranger it became. He said,

"I WILL PRAY AS AN EXPERIMENT."

He went to his room and prayed—he had no idea that anything would come of it, it was a mere experiment—and then he read a few verses of Scripture. He kept on for months, and he found the Word of God become more and more interesting, until he found that he was a new creature in Christ Jesus, and that light had come into his soul. He was afraid to tell his neighbors about it, or even his wife, because he expected it would expose him to a great deal of persecution. But he kept on reading and praying, and at last he decided to speak to his wife. He seized a suitable opportunity, and said to her, "Do you know I have changed my religion—that I do not believe in ancestral worship, or in the idols now? I am a follower of the Lord Jesus Christ." She asked to be informed about this religion. He explained to her all the main features of the truth, and she listened attentively. He expected that she would be angry; but instead of that, what did she say? "Do you know that is exactly what my heart has been longing for all my life. I have had a desire for something, and what you tell me exactly suits my case. I could not have put it into such words, but I should like to hear more of it." She became an inquirer, and by and by a true Christian, and is to-day maintaining her profession.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Mr. Blaine's Letter of Acceptance was Published on Saturday last. It is a lengthy document, which would fill twelve columns of this journal. Mr. Blaine commences by expressing his sense of the honor conferred upon him and the responsibilities it involves. He then proceeds to enumerate the issues on which the Republican party appeals to the country for popular support in the campaign. The first he mentions is the tariff. He admits that the Revenue laws need frequent revision, but contends that the Republican party has "maintained the policy of protection to American industry," while the Democrats have advocated "a revision" which practically destroys that policy. He then quotes a long array of statistics to prove that the wealth and prosperity of the nation have increased since 1860. That is a fact which no one disputes; the dispute is as to the cause of the prosperity. Mr. Blaine contends that the cause is the protective duties; the advocates of reduced duties contend that the prosperity is due to the opening up and cultivation of virgin land, and the energy and enterprise of the people, which have resulted in increased wealth and commerce in spite of a prohibitory tariff. The question, in the election of a President, is not, however, so important as Mr. Blaine's letter would imply, as the Democratic platform does not make free trade an issue; and, although the Democrats were in control of the House last session, they could not pass a moderate tariff bill. The next question dealt with is our Foreign Relations, which Mr. Blaine believes will continue to be peaceful. He advocates a policy tending to draw us into closer relations with the nations of the Western Hemisphere, and advises that we invite them to enter into an agreement with us to settle international disputes by arbitration instead of by war. As to the South, Mr. Blaine believes that it has suffered injury from Democratic efforts to consolidate it politically, which efforts, he says, have tended to "quench the rising instinct of patriotism in the heart of the Southern youth." He thinks the South should no longer "lend its electoral votes to destroy its own future." Mr. Blaine approves of the system of Civil Service Reform now in operation, providing there is a rigid observance of the law giving preference to soldiers in cases of equal competency. As to the Mormon Question, he is opposed to the admission of Utah as a State until polygamy is relinquished. The Public Lands, he holds, ought not to be granted to any but actual settlers, either citizens or those who will become citizens. Our Shipping Interests should, he thinks, be encouraged by the Government. Mr. Blaine concludes by declaring that a free ballot is the safeguard of republican institutions. The Irish dynamiters, who are now enthusiastically shouting for Mr. Blaine, will do well to notice that the candidate promises protection to those only who go to foreign countries on a lawful errand.

Ex-Governor St. John, of Kansas, Declines in advance the Prohibition nomination for the Presidency. The New York Witness, in which the announcement is made, states that one of his reasons is that he "can do more good fighting in the ranks as a private." The decision of the ex-governor is received with general disappointment and regret among Prohibitionists in the Eastern States, where he is extremely popular, as he is in the West. Strong hopes were entertained that his clean record and his strong common-sense would have made his name at the head of the ticket a tower of strength. Senator Colquitt, of Georgia, and General Clinton B. Fisk, of New Jersey, are now spoken of as the most prominent candidates. It may be hoped that the Prohibition Convention, now in session at Pittsburg, Pa., will be wisely directed, and that the ticket will be such as all Prohibitionists can support. A large number of votes were lost in 1880 through the ridiculous selection of General Neal Dow as a Presidential candidate.

The Rescue of the Survivors of the Greely expedition was the welcome intelligence telegraphed through the country on Thursday last. Unhappily the joy with which the news was received was alloyed by the announcement that of a company of twenty-eight, only six were living to return home. On June 22d the relief expedition found the survivors near Cape Sabine. Lieutenant Greely left his station at Lady Franklin Bay, as ordered, last August. The whole party were then well and strong after more than two years of existence in the severe climate of the Arctic Circle. They travelled southward, and arrived safely at the point of the coast opposite Nettleton Island, where the Government had promised Lieutenant Greely, before he started, that they would caché provisions for his use. There the party learned, from a record deposited, that by a fatal and inexcusable blunder the provisions he needed were at the bottom of the sea, in the Proteus. The party then looked about for a suitable camping ground, and having selected Cape Sabine, they encamped there on October 21st, 1883. They examined their store of provisions, and found it would be necessary to economize them. The men were at once placed on half rations. Subsequently that amount was again reduced one half, and at length all was consumed, and they tried to support life on strips of their sealskin clothing. Under those privations one after another succumbed, until twenty-one brave fellows died, the victims of a blundering and incapable official bureau. Two others appeared to be dying, and Lieutenant Greely had just finished reading beside them the prayers for the dying, when the relief expedition appeared. One of the sick men recovered, but it was too late to save the other, who died delirious. Lieutenant Greely and five others were all that were left of the gallant party. They were almost dying, and could not have lived forty-eight hours longer. If success had attended Senator Ingalls and the twenty-one Senators who supported him in his efforts, last February, to delay the despatch of the relief expedition, not a single member of the Greely party would have been saved. While the twenty-two Senators were sitting in their sumptuous Senate chamber, obstructing the appropriation for the relief of the party, the brave explorers were dropping, one by one, into the grave for lack of food.

The Results of the Greely Expedition will not be fully known until the Government receives the records which Lieutenant Greely has happily been able to preserve. A brief summary has, however, been sent by telegraph. From this it appears that the expedition has transferred the laurels of Arctic exploration from the head of England to that of the United States. The man who has gone farther north than any other was an American. Lieutenant Lockwood, of the Greely expedition, dragged his sledge two hundred miles north-east of Discovery Harbor, four miles north of the highest latitude previously reached. From that point he sighted land, which he named Cape Robert Lincoln, about three hundred and eighty-five miles from the North Pole. The most important discovery was that made as to the nature of the region north of that cape. It is now clear that the disputants who contended that an open sea flowed around the pole were in error, as were also those who argued that it was a region of perpetual ice. It is neither, but a sea of floating icebergs of vast size. The indomitable resolution and marvellous skill displayed during the progress of the expedition, and especially in the passage of Smith's Sound, an achievement unparalleled in the records of Arctic exploration, reflect credit on all engaged.

The Largest Money Vault in the World is approaching completion in Washington, D. C. It is being built for the reception of the silver dollars which Congress insists on the Government coining, but which the people persistently refuse to use. Notwithstanding its immense size, it will hold only two years' accumulation, or forty-five million dollars. The Government has now on hand 135,560,916 of these cumbrous coins, which it is unable to force into circulation. It has recently made a discovery, that in the efforts to get the silver dollars into use it has been outwitted. A Boston bank has saved itself the heavy cost of expressage at the expense of the Government. Having to send money to New York, it deposited its funds with the United States Treasurer in Boston, and instructed him to send the amount to its New York correspondent in silver dollars from the Philadelphia mint. That was done, and the New York bank promptly sent them to the Treasury to be exchanged for paper, the Government performing gratuitously the work of expressage.

Precautions against the Introduction of cholera have been taken by the Government. In a proclamation issued July 19th the President calls upon all persons intrusted with the quarantine regulations to be diligent and on the alert, and directs the consuls at infected ports to exercise vigilance in carrying out the instructions given and in notifying the Government of the progress of the disease. The President also advises the cities and towns of the United States to be prepared to resist the disease by sound sanitary regulations and thorough cleanliness.

The Death of Prof. Alpheus S. Packard, Acting President of Bowdoin College, closes a remarkably long and useful career. He died suddenly on July 13th in his eighty-fifth year. He entered Bowdoin College in 1812, and after his graduation became a tutor there, and then a professor. A contemporary says of him: "He had been teaching for years when Nathaniel Hawthorne, Henry W. Longfellow, Franklin Pierce, Sargent S. Prentiss, John P. Hale, Henry B. Smith, and William Pitt Fessenden came under his care as students. Class after class left Bowdoin, and the children, and even the grandchildren, of his early pupils sat before him in the lecture-room. His record as an instructor is without a parallel in this country."

Mr. Moody Arrived in New York on Sunday morning by the Oregon of the Cunard Line. The passage was made from Queenstown in less than seven days. Mr. Moody preached in Queenstown on Sunday, July 13th, and was in New York on July 20th, in time to attend morning service. Mr. Moody was interviewed on his arrival by a reporter of the New York Times and related some of the results of his observations in reference to his views of English social progress. We reproduce on page 469 some interesting observations the evangelist made in the course of the interview.

Mrs. Sarah F. Wells, M.D., whose Portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 22d, this year, arrived in this city from Europe on July 16th by steamship Queen. She will stay a short time in New York. Any temperance associations desiring to secure her services in Gospel Temperance work may address her at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office.

A New Organization of Churches has been founded. A circular was recently issued by the clergymen of Pittsfield, Mass., to the ministers of the different Protestant denominations, in response to which a meeting has been held in that place. The meeting appointed a committee, composed of the Rev. Dr. J. H. Seelye, the Right Rev. Thomas Clark, D.D., and the Rev. Joseph Anderson, D.D., to consider the best manner of carrying into effect the intentions of the meeting. They agreed on a report, recommending that an organization be formed to be named "The American Congress of Churches," and that its object be to promote Christian union and the advancement of the kingdom of God by the free discussion of the great religious, moral, and social questions of the time, and that it should assemble at intervals of two years. Arrangements were made for future meetings of the committee.

A Bank Failure at Indianapolis has Caused serious trouble in that city. On July 15th Messrs. Fletcher & Sharpe's Bank, the oldest financial institution in the city, was not opened, and a notice in the window stated that, owing to an inability to realize on their securities, the firm had decided to suspend payment. As the firm had between four and five thousand accounts, the suspension caused widespread distress. The ultimate loss is not likely to be heavy, as the partners and their wives have made a full surrender of their property, which will, it is estimated, cover the liabilities, which are nearly two millions. There has been no defalcation, but the bank had been more or less hampered since the panic of 1873, on account of being compelled to take a large quantity of real estate as security for debts. There was a continual drain upon its resources, but by good management it was kept in a safe condition until the recent tightening of the Eastern money market made necessary the provision of additional security for loans.

The Adelphi Theatre Services in Chicago are attended with much blessing. Mr. William E. Catlin writes of them: "Through the kindness of some of our wealthy citizens money was furnished for the purpose of hiring this old theatre and converting it into a Gospel mission, and Brother Kirkland, evangelist of Brooklyn, N. Y., was put in charge of the work. There has scarcely been a day passed since the opening of this place for God but that from one to a score of souls have resolved to leave the path of sin and live for God."

A Strange Depository for Children's Temperance pledges has been secured at Concord, N. H. The United States authorities have granted permission to the New Hampshire State Temperance Union to deposit in the corner-stone of the new Government building, to be erected in that city, the names of all the children in New Hampshire who will sign the temperance pledge. The pledge will be printed on the thinnest bank paper, so that when the pledges are all gathered together from the two hundred and thirty-six towns and cities of the State, they will occupy little space. The pledge which the children and youth will be expected to sign is as follows: "I promise, the Lord helping me, to abstain for life from the use of all beverages which can intoxicate." A small engraving is to be made of the building, and printed on a card with the temperance pledge, and furnished every child that signs the pledge. There is a significance which should not be overlooked in identifying the corner-stone of the Government building with the temperance principles of the rising generation. It may be hoped that the children will, by their fidelity to their pledges, have no reason to fear the stone in the wall crying out against them.

A Southern Soldier's Obituary, Published in the Lynchburg Virginian last week, renders a striking testmony to his intrepidity and fidelity. It says that on July 4th Wyatt J. Markham died after a lingering illness. He was a member of the first volunteer company which left his county, and from Bull Run to Vicksburg was always ready to answer "Here!" After the fall of Vicksburg he was placed in charge of the remnant of his command, all of whom were either sick or wounded, and piloted them via New Orleans and the Gulf of Mexico, finally reaching their homes in safety. He was an unassuming Christian soldier—only a private in the ranks—and yet his record merits this notice at our hands. Private Markham's record may be studied with advantage by soldiers of the Cross. The want of the Church is for men "always ready to answer 'Here!'" when the Saviour's service demands workers (Isa. 6 : 8).

A Sexton was Fined for Omitting to Pass the collection plate to a man in church by a Canadian judge recently. The sexton in collecting the offertory at the church of St. Laurent passed by a prominent member of the church, giving him no opportunity of contributing. Thereupon the slighted member sued the sexton for damages, and the man was fined five dollars. It is probable that this is the first case of the kind on record. The common experience is that the anxiety to make contributions is not so intense as to produce litigation over a missed opportunity. In this case, however, it was shown that the sexton intended a deliberate and public insult by his conduct, and the judge took cognizance of his motive. Scoffers at the Bible often complain of the hardness of God's law in requiring purity of heart as well as of life; but this lawsuit shows that questions of motive are regarded as pertinent by human judges (Prov. 23 : 7).

A Curious Case of Spontaneous Combustion occurred at Lowell, Mass., on July 16th. An old logroller used in a washing machine in the dye house of the Merrimack Manufacturing Company had been condemned because it was worn from age. The iron rod running through the centre of the log, by means of which the roller revolved upon its bearings, was surrounded by sulphur, to make the parts of the roller hold firmly together. When the roller was condemned it was taken out into the yard and split open, to separate the wood from the iron. The parts were not removed, but were left in the sun. Some chips among the refuse were discovered burning about an hour afterward. It created no little surprise at first that wood should take fire by simply being exposed to the sun. An explanation was subsequently arrived at. In splitting the log pieces of sulpher were also broken from the rod. A chemical action, made easy by the long and intimate connection of the sulphur with the iron rod, had been partially completed, and needed only the burning rays of the sun to produce perfect combustion. The contact of the sulphur with the oxidizing iron formed sulphide of iron, afterward changing to sulphate, which is very sensitive to igniting agents. The fire came from the changed conditions of the materials. It has sometimes happened that an analogous result has been developed in human character. Men who have been preserved from falling while in poverty have been unable to bear the rays of the sun of prosperity (Prov. 30 ; 8, 9).

THE PROOF OF OUR MINISTRY.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me, which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty in you. For though He was crucified through weakness, yet He liveth by the power of God. For we also are weak in Him, but we shall live with Him by the power of God toward you. Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith; prove your own selves. Know ye not your own selves, how that Jesus Christ is in you, except ye be reprobates?"—II CORINTHIANS 13 : 3, 4, 5.

The Nurse of the Churches—A Church with More Gifts than Grace—The Results of Faithful Reproof—The Rejoinder—I. God's Chosen Mode of Operation—Power in Weakness—The Saviour's Strength in Death — Paul's Deliberate Renunciation of Means—II. The Sure Proof of Power—In Conversions Resulting—In Every Comfort and Correction—The Conduct of Converts—III. A Needed Proof of Ourselves—An Impudent Boast—The Lord will Come.

THE apostle had much joy in being the founder, the father, and the fosterer of so many churches, but this joy brought with it constant and heavy trial. Care pressed heavily upon him, for he mentions it as the crown and crush of all his burdens: "That which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches." He was not simply as a father among them, but he was as a nurse, continually on the watch, and in all tenderness anxious for her little ones. He was deeply grieved when he saw anything wrong, lest he should have labored in vain, and should see any perish who appeared to be hopeful converts. He always had in his mind's eye the account which he would have to give at the last, and his prayer was that he might render that account with joy and not with grief, for he adds, "That is unprofitable for you." His whole soul went after the people of his charge, and his heart sank within him when he observed sin prominent among them.

The Corinthian church was enriched with many gifts, but impoverished by slender grace; this church had elected to conduct its arrangements upon the principle of everybody speaking who had something to say; moreover, it chose to be and order, not caring to appoint officers who should be shepherds of the flock. That church seems to have been a frequent trial to the apostle, and after writing to them once very earnestly, he wrote to them a second time with equal tenderness and energy; and then he said he should have to visit them in person, and when he did come he should by discipline among them make them know that Christ would not endure sin in His Church. Whatever they had to say about Paul personally he meant to be faithful to God and to the truth, and he was sure that the power of God would be with him to support him in the work of reformation. He writes in a sorrowful strain, and yet one cannot help seeing how calm and judicious he is; how deliberately he inquires into evidence, and how impartially he judges the case.

On account of Paul's having put his finger upon the mischief that was among them, the Corinthians turned round upon him, and disparaged him; his letters might be weighty and powerful, but his personal presence was weak; and his speech—well, it was contemptible. Whether he was an apostle at all they questioned. Had he lived with Christ? had he sat at Jesus' feet? No; it was apparent to everybody that his conversion took place after the departure of the Lord, and you could never be quite sure that he had been supernaturally called, as he said he had been. Thus they murmured among themselves. From this ordeal Paul does not shrink for a moment, but he answers all their evil speeches in the language before us.

I. The Apostle Paul teaches us in these verses of operation. The rebellious Corinthians had spoken ill of the apostle as lacking in power; his personal presence was not commanding, his speech was not fascinating, and so forth. Paul does not deny the charge, nor endeavor to exalt himself, but he glories in his infirmities because the power of God rests upon him. He admits anything they may have to say about his deficiency in natural dignity and elocution, but he declares the general principle of power in weakness, by which the Lord conducts the matters of the Gospel dispensation. Power in weakness is the great secret of the Gospel mode of working. Life, born of death, is the life of our souls; a life which would never have been in us at all if it had not been for the most cruel death on record, when men crucified the ever-blessed Lord.

Because He died in weakness He has become mighty to save by the putting away of sin. Hath He not already finished transgression, made an end of sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness? By this sign He conquered; the ensign of His bloody cross is

THE SEAL OF VICTORY.

It is Himself wounded, Himself hung up as a malefactor, Himself dead as a victim on the altar before the most high God; it is Himself thus slain which is His power to pardon and to save. You know, brethren, that our Lord's power over our hearts comes by His great love, and the matchless manner of His showing it. Stooping so low to save such unworthy ones He conquers our hearts. His dying love has begotten living love within us. It sends a spear into the heart of sin that Jesus yielded His heart for our sakes; this nails up the hands and feet of our rebellious lusts, to think that Jesus was crucified for us; this leads us in golden fetters, the happy captives of His mighty grace, when we behold how His love stooped to the curse for us. The weakness of Christ is stronger in its power over our hearts than all His strength could have been. It is by weakness that Christ hath achieved His mighty purpose.

Why did Paul interject this teaching? It was to show us that this great principle runs through all God's work in the saving of men. He does not save men to-day by the strength of His ministers, but by their weakness; and it is not the power of the Gospel, judged after the manner of the flesh, that is to conquer nations; but, as in our Lord's case, the victory is to be

WON BY WEAKNESS.

Look at Paul himself—he came among these Corinthian people, and I dare say when they were first converted they felt like the Galatians, that they could pluck out their own eyes and give them to him; but after a while, when he was very faithful, they turned against him, and said he was no orator, he had no great force of conception, or majesty of diction.

The Apostle was willing enough to admit that he was devoid of such showy gifts. Though you and I at a distance think very greatly of Paul, and very rightly so, yet among those cavillers he was lightly esteemed. He did not give himself the lofty airs of the great teachers of the day, and hence foolish persons despised him. Some liked Apollos better, and others preferred Cephas, and thus they formed parties, agreeing in opposing Paul, but agreeing in nothing else. Paul was willing to lose all personal honor, though, in truth, not a whit behind the chief of the Apostles. He said, "We have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us." He cheerfully sank that his Lord might be exalted.

Moreover, in those days there was a great liking among the people, especially those who thought themselves educated, for the Greek philosophers. They said to one another, "Have you studied Solon? Have you accepted the teaching of Socrates? Have you drank in the doctrines of the divine Plato? That is the man! In him there is depth of reasoning and breadth of thought. As for this Paul, he does not seem to care for the great masters of thought." "No," says Paul, "I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ, and Him crucified." They looked for philosophy and did not get it, and he did not mean they should. "But at least," they said, "what he has to say ought to be delivered with all the graces of oratory, after the best manner of the schools." "No," says Paul, "my speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom; that your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God."

Those things which were looked upon in those days as the chief instruments of power by which orators swayed human minds, Paul deliberately renounced, and relied on HIGHER FORCES.

He kept to the preaching of the cross, which was to them that perish foolishness, but to the saved the power of God. He put forward that side of the Gospel which was most objectionable, so that to the Jews it was a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness; he did this of design: for so the Lord worketh evermore, making His divine power more glorious in the absence of that which is thought to be power among men. The apostle as a Jew was full of ceremonial teaching, which was very powerful with Jews, but to this he died. As a man he was well trained and deeply educated in philosophy; but to that he died also, knowing nothing but the cross and the scandal thereof. As his Master saved men by His weakness on the cross, so did he save men by his word spoken in the apparent weakness of Paul.

And yet again I believe the apostle meant this; that though he might have come among them if he had liked and said, "I am an apostle; I have supreme power over churches; out of this church I shall eject offenders without any question; for I am among you as your spiritual director," yet he never used such authority; on the contrary he was the servant of all, patient to the last degree, gentle, humble, condescending, unselfish, fully consecrated. Thus he was a power among them; his evident self-sacrifice made him have more influence at Corinth than all their proud leaders of division. By laying aside authority he became mighty to influence them for good. I desire to practise this lesson to perfection.

All of you, my brethren, who desire to be useful must learn that in self-sinking your usefulness will be found. Do not seek to be great; try to grow less and less. He who becomes least is greatest of all. The way to rise in the peerage of the church is to go down. Do not take what you have a right to take; do not covet the position which you feel you might righteously assume; but take the lowest room, do the meanest service, be willing to be anything or nothing so that God is glorified. Be ready to be stuck in any corner, or stowed away in any lumber-room, if such should be the will of God; and then the probability is that you will be largely and honorably used.

II. I come in the next place to a very important matter, and that is the indisputable evidence of any minister's call from God to preach the Gospel.

Notice, the apostle says, "Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me." He did not care about what they thought of his own speaking; they might throw that to the dogs if they liked; but he was greatly concerned that they should not think lightly of the Lord Jesus who spoke in him. Then, says Paul, "If you want a proof of Christ's speaking in me with power, look at yourselves." Paul says to his own Corinthian converts, "Ye are our epistle." If anybody inquires whether Paul can write, he does not exhibit his hand or his pen, but he points to their lives—epistles "written not with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God." Beloved, you who are our flocks are the evidences of our being good shepherds. Ye are God's husbandry, and the test of how far our husbandry has been the Lord's husbandry must be found in your fruitfulness.

If you want to know whether Christ has spoken in me, I reply, "Since ye seek a proof of Christ speaking in me, which to you-ward is not weak, but is mighty in you, examine yourselves." Our witness is in your hearts. I feel constrained to say to you, beloved, that if the outside world demands a proof of my call from God, I must refer them to you for it; you to whom God has spoken by me, must be the witnesses whether it is of God or not, and if you fail me my commission will have lost its seal.

which establishes our right to our holy office will be found in the influence of the Gospel upon your characters. Listen then a moment with such sympathy with me as your love will inspire.

If ye seek any proof of Christ speaking by me, ye have it, first, in your own conversion, many of you. You will have no doubt of the minister's call if his testimony has brought you life in Christ. After I had heard a poor plain man preach the Gospel, and had been brought to the Saviour's feet by his testimony, if I had been met outside by a High Churchman, who thought that a working-man had no right to preach, I should have had small patience with him. Suppose he had said to me when I was just converted, "the man is not qualified to preach, he has never been to Oxford or Cambridge, he has never been ordained, God cannot have sent him," I should have smiled at such nonsense, for I was sure God sent him, since by his means I had been brought up out of the horrible pit, and out of the miry clay. You never doubt the validity of the orders—that, I think, is the cant phrase—of the man who has led you to the Saviour. How could you? Whatever he may be to others, he is to you assuredly a messenger of mercy, a servant of the living God. "Give God the praise," they said to the man whose eyes had been opened by Jesus, "we know that this man is a sinner." "Ah," said the shrewd, ready-witted man, "whether He be a sinner or no, I know not; one thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see." Was there any answer to that fact?

Further, God proves that He has sent a man by the comfort which he gives to true believers by his ministry. Oh, the riches of divine consolation! Have you tasted them? Then there is no disputing against taste; of all arguments, that of experience is the most conclusive. Further, when Christ, speaking in His servants, brings to us correction, it is an equal proof that it is of the Lord. You did not know it, but you had lived in the omission of a certain duty; light flashed into your soul by the hearing of the word as to that omission, and with that light came love, so that you wept over your sin and ceased from it at once. Surely that was a proof of Christ's speaking in the minister. Then, dear friends, the general conduct and conversation of members of a church must always be of the ministry which feeds them. My heart sinks within me when I hear of those who have been numbered with us, and have shared our love and esteem, and yet have behaved inconsistently. Is this to be laid at my door? I confess I cannot help blaming myself, and growing sad. Did I not hear of an earnest Temperance man in public, drinking in private? Is this the fruit of my ministry? Ah me! Did I hear of another professor whose household is a scene of constant strife? Did I observe coldness and indifference creeping over others? Did I find a brother censorious and bitter? Is this the result of my labor? I could weep and break my heart. Do we hear of some that they are not upright and truthful in their dealings? Do people say, "These are members of Spurgeon's church"? I do not blame the world for so saying. It is only just that men should estimate our ministry by its results. Oh, dear sirs, by the love you bear to us, who labor for Christ among you, let your conversation be such as becometh the Gospel of Christ. I cannot say this in words so emphatically as I desire to do. I should like to coin my heart in order to pass it round to you in living medallions, bearing each one this inscription—for Jesus' sake be holy.

Unless you are a holy people, it were better for me that I had never been born. Unless you follow Christ, and exhibit His spirit wherever you dwell, what is the good of all our preaching? We might as well have stood upon a mountain and whistled to the wind as have pleaded with you unto tears. Unless there is a purity of life and a holiness of conversation in you as a church, I shall have sown dead seed. I think I can say faithfully that there is holiness among you; but oh, watch and pray that ye enter not into temptation! Let each one among you be upon his guard lest in some evil hour he should bring dishonor upon the cause he loves, upon the Christ by whom he lives. Men do not read the Bible, but they read us—do let us give them a good version of the Scriptures in our lives. They will not study our doctrinal opinions, but they will examine our practical examples; and if we are not what we ought to be we wound the Saviour afresh, stab at the heart of His Gospel, and impede the progress of His kingdom.

There is one more operation of God's Word about which I can speak with very great comfort to my own self, and that is the operation of the word in the completion of the Christian character, and in the display of it in the last hours of Christian men and women. I have come down many times from the sick chamber of those members of this church who are now in the upper house, and I have done so with faith confirmed and joy increased. Those beloved ones have given me more strength and assurance than I ever derived from the study of the ablest works in my library. They were sometimes very poor, but I remember well the glory of the little room wherein they were disrobing for

THE BEATIFIC VISION.

No dying man has looked me in the face and said, "Sir, you did not preach a religion which a man can die with; you taught me doctrines which are not substantial enough for the dying hour." No, I feel even now their death grips, as they have clasped my hand and told me of their overflowing joy. They have said to me, "Bless the Lord that ever I stepped into the Tabernacle to hear of justification by faith, of the divine substitution, of atonement made by blood, and of a faithful God who cast not away His people!" Such expressions I have heard from those upon the borders of Immanuel's land. These are our seals and the tokens that Christ has spoken by us.

I hope you will bear with me in thus speaking of what has so plain a relation to myself; but truly these many years God has wrought among us great marvels of grace, and I am overwhelmed when I imagine even for a moment what we should do if the Spirit of God were to withdraw. O church in this Tabernacle, "hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown!"

III. To each one of us there is of ourselves. Hence the text says, "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith." It is something to have our ministry attested, but it is much more to have your salvation attested. Dear fellow-believers, observe that you can know whether you are saved or not; assurance, ay, full asurance is within your grasp; but it is only to be obtained by a simple faith, and by a sincere and thorough examination of yourselves. Observe, the apostle says "examine yourselves;" therefore you are not to take it for granted that you are saved; if you do, you may be sadly mistaken. "Examine yourselves." In London years ago every shop had its sign, and they had a saying that the house which had the sign of the sun in a certain street was darker than any other; all their sun was outside; it had the sun for a sign, but no sign of the sun. So there are some who have grace for their sign, but no sign of grace. God grant we may not be such. To have a name to live is a wretched thing if we be really dead. In such a case we are nothing but living lies, devout deceits, bastard professors, in a word "reprobates." To pretend to be other than what we are in the sight of the heart-searching God is despicable and damnable.

The Spirit of God by the mouth of the Apostle bids us "examine ourselves." Supposing you have done this, then do it again; for the next sentence is, "Prove your own selves." Pry deeper, thrust the lancet in further. You have already given yourself a good sifting; take a finer sieve and go to work again. You have already been in the crucible; go in again, and become as silver tried in a furnace of earth purified seven times. A man cannot make too sure work about his own salvation. "Oh, but," some one says, "I never doubted my own safety." Remember,

"Who never doubted of his state,
He may, perhaps he may, too late."

One stands up and has the

to say, "I never sin." Sit down, sir, do not dream that you are among fools; we know better. You may hold your fond conceit if you please, but meanwhile we pray for you; the Lord open your eyes to see the sin in you, for pride is blinding you, its scales are upon your eyes. "In many things we offend all." "Enter not into judgment with thy servant; for in thy sight shall no man living be justified." What man is he that doeth good and sinneth not?

We must again and again examine ourselves. But can we not be certain of our safety? Yes, we can; but certain because we have not shunned the most rigorous self-examinations. If you do not test yourself you may sit down and say, "Oh, I am all right." Yes, but you may be fostering within your spirit a peace which will end in your final ruin, and you may never open your eyes to your deception till you lift them up in hell. Be ready to be searched. It is well when a man likes a heart-searching ministry, when he says, "Cut deep, sir; do not spare me; if I am a hypocrite let me know it." I like a man whose prayer is, "Lord, let me know the worst of myself, that I may be upright before thee. Search me and try me, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." This is what we want. This is the age of shams, sham preaching, and sham hearing, and sham professors; we must strive after realities. There are such things as common graces, which will not save, and, worse still, such things as counterfeit graces, which will destroy; therefore, let us see to it that we first examine and then prove ourselves.

And what is to be the point of search? "Whether ye be in the faith," whether what ye believe is true, and whether you truly believe it; whether your faith is the faith of God's elect; the faith that is of the operation of the Spirit of God, or mere nominal, notional, temporary faith. "Examine yourselves, whether ye be in the faith."

Within a short time, and none of us know how soon,

OUR LORD WILL COME;

quick ears can hear the rolling of His chariots. Perhaps before that you and I may be called away; are we ready? I do not often enter this place without being told, "So-and-so is gone." I cannot help looking upon this vast congregation as moving along in procession to the tomb; I am also myself marching with you. We are all going together, and we shall meet together at the judgment-seat of Christ. I would not have you say in that day, "We came to hear you, and you did us no good, for you tickled our ears, and tried to play the orator." I never did anything of the sort. I do protest it before the living God I never thought of such a thing. I have striven to strike straight at your hearts and consciences. You shall not say that of me either here or hereafter. But when we meet in the judgment you will say, "It was power in weakness; Christ spoke in you, we were converted, comforted, and sanctified by Him." Ah, we shall meet, brothers, we shall meet on the other side of Jordan, in the land of the hereafter, in the city of the blessed; we shall meet and sing together to the praise and glory of His grace, wherein He hath made us accepted in the Beloved! The Lord be with you all for His name's sake! Amen.

MR. SPURGEON'S ORPHANAGES.

THE history of the Stockwell Orphanage, a picture of which appears on page 476, contains some of the elements of a romance, and cannot fail to be read with interest. Having its origin in Christian benevolence, and not in mere philanthropic impulse, it has grown to be one of the most remarkable monuments of modern times to the goodness and faithfulness of "the Father of the fatherless."

Burdened with the anxieties of the largest Nonconformist church in the world, and the responsibilities of a college in which about one hundred young men are supported and trained for the ministry, Mr. Spurgeon was not disposed to tempt Providence by originating a scheme for the maintenance of fatherless children. He had long felt the necessity and importance of such a work, however, but in his zeal to do good he had exercised the discretion of a prudent man of faith and prayer.

In his magazine, the Sword and the Trowel, for October, 1866, the following announcement occurs: "A sister in Christ has requested us to take the care of $100,000, which she desires to consecrate to the Lord's service, by putting it in trust for the maintenance of orphan boys, with a special view to their godly education, in the hope that, by divine grace, they may be converted and become ministers and missionaries in future years. Being weighed down with cares, we still hesitate in this business, but dare not do other than follow the intimations of the divine hand." Here we have the genesis of the Orphanage and the object with which the work was undertaken clearly defined.

The donor of this munificent sum was the widow of a clergyman, and an entire stranger to Mr. Spurgeon. Her letter, in which the offer was made, fairly took him by surprise, and he was doubtful as to its genuineness. It seemed too good to be true. A friend, however, said he had better go and see. An interview being arranged, he went, and the abode of the writer not being suggestive of wealth, he said he had called respecting the two hundred pounds she wished to place at his disposal.

"Dear me," said the lady, "did I write two hundred? I meant twenty thousand pounds!" Assuring her that she had actually named in her letter the larger sum, he accounted for the discrepancy by saying, "Concluding there might be a nought or two too many, I thought I would avoid giving offence by being on the right side, and saying two hundred." The securities for twenty thousand pounds were soon forthcoming, and Mr. Spurgeon was fairly committed to the task of founding and directing an Orphanage for fatherless boys.

For the information of our readers, to whom, perhaps, Mr. Spurgeon's Orphanage is little more than a name, we cannot do better than enumerate with as little detail as possible the principles embodied in the institution, and which, by the blessing of God, have made it what it is.

I. It was decided that the institution should be placed within an easy distance of the Tabernacle, so that it might secure the personal oversight of Mr. Spurgeon and the committee of management, and be accessible to visitors at all times. The difficulty in finding a suitable site in a healthy locality seemed at the outset to be insurmountable, but it happened—and that it should so happen just then marks the hand of an overruling Providence—that a plot of land to the rear of the houses in the Clapham Road was offered for sale. This was secured, and the money subscribed for its purchase in response to an appeal from the pen of Mr. Spurgeon.

II. Bearing in mind the fact that he was founding a home for the residence and training of children deprived of parental oversight, it was decided to divide the children into family groups and, as far as practicable in an institution, to surround them with what we may call a home atmosphere. The barrack system may do for soldiers, but it is ill-adapted for children, who need personal culture, and not regimental discipline. In the case of the Orphanage, Mr. Spurgeon soon discovered an advantage attending the Cottage Home system, which lessened the difficulty of its erection, distinct sections of the buildings being subscribed for by friends.

The first house in the terrace on the left-hand side of the picture is called "The Silver Wedding House," from the fact that the cost was defrayed by a member of his congregation with the amount given to her by her husband to commemorate their twenty-fifth wedding day.

A city merchant defrayed the cost of the second house, which is called "The Merchant's House."

One of the deacons of the Tabernacle, being a builder, promised all the material for one house provided his work-people would give the labor. The challenge was accepted, but the terms of the contract not admitting of such an arrangement, the necessary amount was contributed, and this house is called "The Workmen's House."

As a fitting memorial of their sainted mother, the sons of the treasurer of the church presented a sum for the erection of the fourth house, and this is called "The Unity House," from the Christian name of the lady.

The Baptist churches of Great Britain, wishing to present Mr. Spurgeon with a testimonial in recognition of his valuable services to the denomination and the community at large, and as an expression of personal esteem, raised a sum sufficient for the erection of two houses with school-rooms above, and "The Testimonial Houses" form the central block in the terrace.

Toward the cost of the next two houses, which complete the terrace, the scholars of the Tabernacle Sunday-School and the students trained in the Pastors' College collected subscriptions, and these houses are called respectively, "The Sunday-School House" and "The Students' House."

Thus far Mr. Spurgeon's personal friends provided the houses, but all sections of the community cheerfully subscribed for the necessary furniture and for the erection of the dining-hall and kitchen, in the foreground of the picture, and for the infirmary, recreation-hall, and laundry, to the rear, and also for roads and drainage, and for laying out the grounds.

III. The third principle decided by Mr. Spurgeon placed the institution upon a catholic basis. No one section of the community has any preference over others. Fatherless children, between the ages of six and ten, are eligible for admission so long as there is room, without reference to class, sect, or locality.

IV. Another important principle determines the true method of Christian philanthropy—selection by merit, and not election by favor. The trust deed requires that the committee of management shall receive the most needy from among the applicants from time to time.

V. The last feature of this most benevolent institution will commend itself to the judgment of our readers. The children are not dressed in a uniform to mark them as the recipients of charity. Their clothing is of the best material and make, and no two boys are dressed exactly alike.

The favor of God has rested upon the institution from its opening, and it is with gratitude Mr. Spurgeon mentions the fact that the few children who have died while inmates of the Home gave the most satisfactory testimony to the power of Christ to save the young and to sustain them in prospect of the dying hour. In a charming series of little books, written by Mr. Charlesworth, the head master, the story is told of the faith and triumph of these folded lambs. Of the old boys, three are ministers of churches, others are engaged in works of Christian usefulness, and, with but few exceptions, the rest are honorably pursuing their calling in life.

We have left but little space for any reference to the second branch of the Orphanage, for fatherless girls. At a meeting held at the Tabernacle, May 19th, 1879, when the sum of £6000 was presented to him in commemoration of the twenty-fifth year of his public ministry, Mr. Spurgeon said, "Here is a point of a new departure. Listen, and consider it. A day or two ago the lady who founded the Boys' Orphanage sent me £50 for the Girls' Orphanage. I answered somewhat to this effect: 'I am very grateful for the proposal, but, at the same time, I am not very well, and the times are not very hopeful, and therefore I had rather not begi any new work just yet.' I proposed to kee the £50 in case we did build a Girls' Orphanag and if not, to put it over to the boys. 'No said our friend, 'you are right in your jud ment, but take the £50 as the first brick, for am fully assured that many more bricks wi shortly be added.' Now, I propose that £50 c the testimonial should be placed with my de friend's £50, that we may found the Girls' O phanage together. This is a good note of ou present page of history—second twenty-fiv years of pastorate commenced by the inaugur tion of project of Girls' Orphanage." That th movement was well timed is evident fro the fact that the adjoining property was avai able, so that the two departments of the Orphar age could come under one management. Th buildings on the right-hand side have bee erected at a cost of £11,000, and the money re quired has been subscribed. The first fou houses are occupied, and the rest will shortly b opened.

It only remains for us to say that the shadov of debt has never fallen upon the institution Two hundred and fifty boys have been main tained in comfort year by year, by the freewil offerings of many who rejoice to act as stewards of the Lord's bounty. Now that the numbe will be increased by the addition of two hun dred and fifty girls, it remains to be seen wha responses the appeal for their support will re ceive. Of one thing we are certain, an increas of responsibility will stimulate an increase o faith and prayer,

"And He who feeds the ravens
Will give His children bread."

In a circular recently issued, Mr. Spurgeon writes, "It is for our Lord Jesus' sake that we have undertaken this labor. And in His name we ask His disciples to remember us and our large family of little ones."

THE GERMAN LAWYER'S SON.

"I ONCE knew," writes the worthy German Pastor Harens, "a lawyer who was a fine specimen of worldly honor; but he did not know the Lord Jesus. Among his fellow-men he stood in universal esteem, for he was friendly and amiable in social intercourse, and had something turally noble in his whole anner. Prayer was never eard in his house, neither ace before meals nor orning and evening fam- worship, neither was the ible read, yet the man d a Bible which he had herited from his pious other; it had the best ace in his bookcase, but was never used, only ken down now and then be dusted.

"The fact was that the wyer had been prejudiced gainst religion by the con- uct of its professors. In e practice of his profes- on men had come to him ho, while making a pro- ssion of religion, had ask- him to act dishonorably nd in some cases dishon- tly in their behalf. He as wont to say that he ever met a man, never ad a client who refrained n account of religion from aking a dishonorable ad- antage of an opponent, if n opportunity occurred. Sir,' he would say, 'religi- n has no power. The re- gious man will cheat and e like other men if he can ain anything by it, and re- gious men do it more fre- uently than others, be- ause being religious they re not so closely watched. have always found that a nost particular villain, one f the men who robs wid- ws and orphans and is eady to do anything es- ecially mean, always prepares the way by mak- ng a profession of religion, and the holier they rofess to be the meaner they are. I have had good reason to suspect any man who comes to me as a religious man.'

A Christian Son's Ordeal.

"This lawyer was already advanced in years, when one of his sons, whom, on account of his superior talents, he particularly cherished, and who was then studying the law, learned at the University to know and trust in the Saviour, and turned to Him with his whole heart. And now when the heart of this son was filled with such fervent love to Christ, nothing was more natural than that he should ardently desire that his parents, brothers, and sisters might also learn to know his Lord; and he poured out his whole heart to them in his letters, and told them without reserve what had taken place in himself, and how happy he was in the assurance of the forgiveness of his sins, and in the certain hope of everlasting life. 'Oh, that all men were as happy as I!' he said, in one of his letters.

"For a long time he remained without any answer to his letters. At last there came one from his father, which ran thus: 'My son, formerly your letters were a comfort and a joy to me; your present letters, on the contrary, are an affliction and bitter sorrow to me. I perceive that you are on the high road to become like one of those professing Christian hypocrites of whom I have so often told you. I must request you either to write as you did before, or to give up writing altogether.'

"Soon after came the vacation, and the son journeyed home to spend it with his parents. When he entered the house his mother received him with tears, and looked at him very thoughtfully, as if she feared that he was not quite right in his mind; but he fell upon her neck, kissed her, and pressed her tenderly to him, whispering, 'Mother, do not make such a serious face; I still have all my senses.' Next, he went to his father in his study, and was going to embrace him too, but he refused. Then the good son asked him, 'You are still my dear kind father, and will always remain so; am I no longer your son? Why not? Is there anything wicked in praying and reading the Bible?'

"Then his father kissed him and said, 'I must always honor the truth; you have done nothing wicked, my son.' Then they talked for a little while about the professors at the university, and about the lectures which the youth had heard there.

"In the mean time the mother had prepared supper, and they sat down to table. The son stood up, clasped his hands, and prayed (as shown in the picture). The father suddenly thrust back his chair with violence, and rushed from the room in a rage, while the mother went after him, full of grief. She, poor woman, knew that a conflict between her dearly loved boy and his proud father was impending, and she trembled for the result. But the young man did not move, and after he had fervently prayed for his father and mother, he sought his chamber, and poured out his heart in prayer for needed grace, and then slept quietly till morning. He was prepared for this ebullition of rage. His father had spoken to him of religion from his boyhood as of a clock of hypocrisy which bad men used to hide their wickedness. But he knew from experience the power of religion, and that he who names the name of Christ should depart from iniquity. He loved his Saviour, and though he would fain lead his father to a knowledge of the truth, he was prepared, rather than deny Jesus, to obey the command to leave father and mother and all he held dear.

"When he arose next day he prayed faithfully and fervently; and after he had read a chapter in his Bible he went down to the sitting-room. The father sat in his arm-chair, and looked first pale, then red. The son shook him warmly by the hand, wishing him and his mother, 'Good morning.'

"'My son,' demanded the father, 'are you the master of this house, or am I?'

"'Who else but you, father?' replied the son.

"'Why, then, will you introduce prayers before meals, when you know that it is not our custom?'

"'Father, did I ask you and my mother to pray? I prayed purposely, "Come, Lord, be my guest;" for generally we pray be our guest. I knew very well that you do not pray, so that I did not pray our guest. I am not ashamed of my God and Saviour before any man, and sorely as it grieves me to wound you, who have always been a good and kind father to me, I will remain true and faithful to my God.'

"The words were spoken respectfully, but there was a ring of firmness in the young man's tone which the experienced lawyer detected. He was amazed. He could not suspect his own son of cherishing iniquitous schemes. Yet here was that son openly braving the wrath of his father, who could turn him penniless on the world, rather than abandon his religion. Here was a living proof that religion was, after all, something more than he had ever thought it.

"'Boy, from whence have you such courage?' exclaimed his father.

"'I love the Lord,' replied his son, 'for Him I would die a thousand times.'

"'My dear boy,' said his father, 'you are no hypocrite; so for my part you may be as pious as ever you like if you are only not a hypocrite.'

"From that time the ice was broken, and I have seen with my own eyes how father and mother and son read the Bible, prayed, and sang together, and how the brothers and sisters of the family, one after the other, were converted to the Lord. Seldom have I known a dwelling in which the Lord Jesus was so fearlessly confessed as in that lawyer's house."

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Robert makes an Ally.

THE day following that on which Mr. Waldron found Hester seated at Robert's side, with him leaning over her in a lover-like attitude that had struck him with amazement, the father and son walked out amicably together over the farmlands belonging to Aston Court. Both felt that the time was come when they must speak to one another upon that which occupied their thoughts; and Robert preferred doing so as far from the presence of Miss Waldron as possible. He accompanied his father to the end of a stubble-field which was to lie fallow during the winter, and then he commenced the conversation in as composed a tone as if he were making some agricultural observations.

"I think, father," he said, "that it is time I married."

Mr. Waldron planted his stick firmly into the soil, as if he intended it to take root there, and gazed anxiously into his son's face.

"To be sure, Robert; to be sure," he cried.

"You were surprised to find Hester alone with me yesterday," he continued.

"I was," replied Mr. Waldron, briefly.

"Father," he resumed, stammering a little,

"it was not at all the first time I have seen her of late. We know one another very well. The fact is, I happened to meet with her in the house of an old French woman."

"You don't mean the mother of John Morley's workman?" interrupted Mr. Waldron.

"Yes," said Robert, "I have met her there many times during the last few months."

"Robert," interrupted his father again, with an expression and tone the most severe he could assume toward him, "you cannot mean to tell me that you, a man of the world, knowing how ready the world is to gossip, can have taken advantage of Hester's ignorance to draw her into a clandestine intercourse with you?"

"I have," owned Robert, in some confusion.

"I wonder how you dare to confess it," continued Mr. Waldron, leaning heavily upon his stick, as if his son's words had wounded him deeply; "she is so simple, so unsuspecting! She did not know to what censure she exposed herself. Suppose your sister had found it out!" Mr. Waldron's face wore an aspect of real terror; but Robert smiled a little to himself.

"I took care that nobody should know," he said; "you need not be afraid for Hester. But now you will not be surprised to hear me say that I love her more than any woman I ever saw; ay, more than I ever supposed I could love. It seems to me that there can be no love in the world like that I feel for my little Hetty."

Robert's handsome face, with its new air of profound and passionate tenderness, looked handsomer than ever as he spoke; and his father, regarding him fondly, fancied that any woman would forgive him any previous folly.

"But have you forgotten the past?" he said.

"Forgotten it!" he exclaimed; "have you or my sister suffered me to forget it? Forget it! Why, I have only to look into Hester's face with all its sweetness and beauty, and there I see my sin written legibly in its sad lines. How can I forget, when it is Hester herself I love, in spite of everything."

"But what can be done?" asked Mr. Waldron, despondingly.

"I want to atone to her for all these years she has lost," he answered, with vehement earnestness. "I will make her after-life so bright that she shall forget all early sorrow. I will lift her out of the miserable confined lot that is hers, and give her a rank and wealth she could never reach without me. If she was but my wife I should have no fear for her happiness."

"But it is morally impossible," objected Mr. Waldron; "John Morley—"

"He must consent," interrupted Robert, "if I only make sure of Hester. He is very poor, almost to bankruptcy. He is ageing fast, and Hester's future must be an anxiety to him. He is already reconciled to you, and has allowed her to visit here, knowing that she must meet me. If you will only help me, he will come round in time. He must—he shall."

For a few minutes both father and son were plunged in profound thought. The rooks flew heavily above their heads, disturbed by their presence, and manifesting their discontent by hoarse cawing. The young cattle came near enough to contemplate them with their brown eyes. There was a sharp struggle going on in Mr. Waldron's mind which was scarcely visible in his face, so long accustomed to hide his emotions. He was, as his old minister had told him, a proud man; and he had sometimes regarded John Morley as a person in a very inferior position. John Morley was, in fact, nothing more than a tradesman, and one in difficult circumstances; and it was his only son, his heir, who wished to bring the daughter of the poor bookseller into his wealthy family as his wife. Yet Hester was so pretty, so simple, so clever; she was so good also, that, but for the accident of her birth, there could be no one more worthy of being his daughter-in-law. Besides, Robert was very obstinate if he was opposed. He would refuse to look out for a more suitable wife, if he should deny him his consent and assistance.

"I talked about it with Mr. Watson before his death," said Robert, at last breaking through the silence, "and he said he did not see any insuperable difficulties, or any insurmountable objections in the way. He did not seem to see them so clearly as I did."

"He was a timid man," replied his father, "and would agree to all you said. But how did he come to know of it before me?"

"He saw me once or twice follow Hester into the court," he answered, "and he had courage enough to speak very faithfully on the subject, I assure you. Well, he did not see why Hester should not in time become my wife. He said, however, that it would be more likely to come to pass if we only knew for certain that poor Rose was dead. It is my firm conviction that she is dead; but I can get no proofs."

"Robert," said Mr. Waldron, earnestly, "you are losing sight of John Morley's implacable hatred. Ah! my boy, you kept from me the history of that blow which almost killed you last February. It was then you first saw Hester and fell in love with her. I do not wonder at it. But do you imagine that if he seeks your life you can ever gain his consent or hers?"

"I think," answered Robert, "that his revenge spent itself in that blow. He is a good man, a religious man. He was hurried by a sudden passion into the attempt to commit that crime; but as it failed—luckily for me—he soon repented of it, and was not sorry to extend his kindness to me. We have now something to forgive one another. I am more equal with him, and that is so much in my favor. Why else was he so hospitable and kind toward me? He visited me once, and spoke as a friend would have done. He knew Hester saw me often, and yesterday he allowed her to come once more to our house. I hardly dared to hope before; but now with you to help me, I shall win Hester as my wife."

His face, dearer to Mr. Waldron even than that of his daughter, shone with more gladness and hope than had been seen upon it for many years. His father could object no longer, but gave his hand a warm and fervent grasp.

"I will help you, my boy," he said; "yet I had my own little scheme for Hester, and it is possible it may prove in your way now. The moment I set my eyes on young Bramwell, I thought he would make a good husband for the little girl. They were both so young, so good, and so handsome. Our family owes John Morley a compensation, and I fancied I had found it in him. I would have given her a wedding dowry that would have made them almost independent of his Church, wherever he goes. But now I hope he will not be in your way."

He looked anxious lest he should himself have destroyed the chances of his son's happiness. Robert also was grave, counting up all the symptoms he had detected of love between Carl and Hester. They were very few, almost none. It had not escaped his notice that his sister was making herself foolish, as he termed it, about the eloquent young preacher, ten years her junior, and he built some hopes upon that; the more so as Carl came frequently to Aston Court and spent a good deal of time with Miss Waldron. Under other circumstances he would probably have manifested his disapprobation of such an intimacy with unmistakable plainness, but he hailed it as a sign that Carl preferred his sister's mature piety to Hester's girlish prettiness; and he was more than content to let the intimacy run a smooth course.

"I am not much afraid of him," he said; "yet I should have been quite as well pleased if you had chosen a more commonplace man for Little Aston."

"I chose him for Hester," replied Mr. Waldron, in a tone which betrayed a lingering reluctance to abandon his favorite scheme; "they are just suited for each other. I thought so last night. I wish you could give up this notion, Robert."

"Never!" he exclaimed, vehemently. "I tell you I worship her. She is the only woman who can make me care for goodness, or religion or things of that sort. I have had enough to disgust me with it, but Hester makes it soothing and pleasant again. If I am ever to be anything but the idle, purposeless fellow I am, doing no good in life, it will be by winning Hester." Robert really believed what he said, as many others of his class. They think the love of a good woman can make them love God and religion, but it is the most pitiable sophistry. Love can do much, but it cannot change the nature of a man. Only God can do that, and Robert, in so deluding himself, followed the evil principles which had made his life a wreck and a misery to all about him. In this, as in all that had gone before, he was only the slave of his desires, the most contemptible of all kinds of bondage.

Mr. Waldron knew enough of human nature and of the true source of strength to be aware of the falsity of his son's hope. He sighed deeply, but he did not attempt to explain his sigh. Robert's state of mind was still, as it had always been, a grief to him; but he had come to the point of no longer pressing religious expostulation upon him. His sigh, however, included something more than that. There was a misgiving in it lest Carl, whom he had brought to Little Aston for the very purpose, had not already gained possession of Hester's love. But deeper still lay an unconquerable dread that it would be impossible to overcome John Morley's instinctive repugnance to give his daughter to the man who had brought so indelible a stigma upon his name. Every one else might plead the youth and thoughtlessness of the college lad, for Robert had been little more than that; but it could be hoped for that dishonored husband should thus excuse him, or could ever be brought to look upon his conduct as the careless folly of a boy who had not learned to master his passions? They walked homeward in almost unbroken silence, and Mr. Waldron shut himself up in his private room to deliberate upon all the bearings of the matter.

The more Mr. Waldron considered the subject upon which Robert had consulted with him, the more dubious he grew as to the possibility of winning over John Morley, unless, indeed, Hester's own happiness should depend upon his consent. He endeavored to place himself in the position of the dishonored man; but the power of seeing with other people's eyes cannot be acquired at the age of sixty-eight. He saw his son, handsome, accomplished, and rich, with a brilliant lot to offer; and he could see Hester clearly, as a very eligible daughter-in-law in every respect, except by birth. There had been always a peculiar softness in his heart toward Hester — an anticipatory tenderness, perhaps. He would like exceedingly to have her always near to him. But John Morley was, as he always had been, wrapped in an impenetrable mystery. He could no more understand him, members as they were of the same church, than Peter could understand his beloved brother Paul.

Mr. Waldron glanced but briefly toward the world, though, no doubt, it would have something to say to such a marriage. Ten years ago its tongue had been busy with the story of Robert's sin; and the world has a retentive memory for scandals. It would, perhaps, be easier to pacify John Morley himself than to satisfy its scruples, sometimes more exacting and delicate than those of an individual conscience. But Mr. Waldron was not accustomed to consider the world. He had long since turned his back upon it, and treated its opinions with contempt. If he approved of the matter, and the Church supported him, he could very well afford to leave all question of the world out of the transaction.

To make sure of the pastor was one means of securing the approbation of the Church. He did not wish to startle or shock that small congregation of faithful men over whom he and

Carl Bramwell presided. They were a simple, uncultivated class, not accustomed to split straws, but it was within the bounds of possibility that they might be scandalized by his son's marriage with Hester Morley. There was a broad though undefined code of Christian morality written most plainly upon unsophisticated hearts which he was afraid of transgressing; and upon this one weak point he yearned for the sympathy of his fellow-churchmen. It was not a formal approbation that he could receive or they give, but simply the encouragement of unchanged looks and undiminished reverence. He resolved, first of all, to sound their young pastor.

DAVID'S REPENTANCE.

S. S. Lesson for August 3, Psalm 51. Golden Text, verse 3. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

David Fallen into Sin—Three Thousand Years of Baleful Influence—David's Tactics—His Conviction—His Remorse—His Only Plea—Where the Sinner is Apt to Halt—What the Lord Wants—David Clean—His Mistrust of Himself—Usefulness Gained by Painful Experience—Not a Case for Sacrifice.

DAVID, the King of Israel, had sinned grievously, and for more than nine months he was under the power of his sin. During this time we hear nothing of his having any communion with the Lord. But our God cannot bear to have His children under the hand of the enemy, and He sent Nathan the prophet to the king to speak a parable to him. Even then the heart of David was not awakened, until Nathan spoke to him the severe words,

"THOU ART THE MAN."

The prophet did not mince matters; he brought David's heinous sins of adultery and murder home to him, and gave him no quarter until, in the anguish of his soul, he cried out, "I have sinned against the Lord." No longer self-deluded, his eyes really open to see himself as he was, David was aghast.

It is an awful thing for a child of God to fall into sin. Nathan said, "By this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme." Yes; for three thousand years "the enemies of the Lord" have made use of David's sin to speak against God! The more influence for good a teacher has, the more baneful are the effects of any sin or inconsistency in him. At first were those of self-help. It was in seeking to hide his sin with Bathsheba that he had caused the death of Uriah her husband. He had attempted to shield himself, and very likely Satan persuaded him that he was shielding God's honor, and that it would be the worst thing possible for the cause of God that he should confess his sin. "He that covereth his sins shall not prosper" (Prov. 28 : 13). This David found to his cost. "Thou didst it secretly," was God's reproach by Nathan.

Now, however, the king is brought face to face with God; how shall he act? Knowing that he deserves no mercy, he cries, "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy lovingkindness: according to the multitude of thy tender mercies, blot out my transgressions." He passes over at once from the thought of what he is to the thought of what God is, and he finds comfort and hope, for this takes away despair. The knowledge of what God is may crush a sinner into the dust with shame, but only that he may be most surely lifted out of it. David is not contented that his sins should be blotted out, he wants something more than this. In the presence of his God he sees his own vileness, and he wants to make sure against the recurrence of his sin. Thus he cries, "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin." Unless his thoughts and desires, unless his will and motives are made clean and kept clean, how can he expect anything better? It is not now the consequences of sin which occupy him; he hates the sin itself, and wants to be delivered fully and effectually from it. Now he urges

HIS ONLY PLEA.

He does not say, "Have mercy because it is the first offence;" he does not urge any excuse at all, but only pleads, "For I acknowledge my transgressions; and my sin is ever before me." Oh, how many stop short just here! How many will do anything rather than honestly and fully confess where they have sinned! Such cannot get cleansing by the blood of Christ. "If we confess our sins He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness" (1 John 1 : 9).

David says, "Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight." Had he not sinned against Bathsheba, against Uriah, against his own children, against his people? Surely yes; but David had long been in the habit of recognizing God in all circumstances, and above all people. He had sinned against God's people, and therefore against God; he had broken God's commandments in his sins against man, and this is his overwhelming grief—this it is which leads him to see the truth. "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me." Oh, how David understands now that all his past holiness and purity are due only to the grace of God; that in himself he is what Job found himself out to be when he cried, "Behold, Lord, I am vile," "Mine eye seeth thee: Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes" (Job 40 : 4; 42 : 6).

No sooner has David got thus low before the Lord than he looks Godward again. What does the Lord want? In glad joy and hope David discovers God's mind, and he cries, "Behold,

THOU DESIREST TRUTH

in the inward parts." Shall not God have His desire? Yes. "In the hidden part thou shalt make me to know wisdom." Is not this presumptuous in one who has so sinned? No; God loves to be counted upon; the sooner a sinner gets over to His side and sees the boundlessness of His grace, the better pleased is our God, and the more sure is the sinner of being saved from and kept from sinning. He "is able to save unto the uttermost all that come unto God by Him" (Heb. 7 : 25). Contemplating sin and dissecting sin only makes us more prone to it. Turning to look God in the face, to contemplate His most undeserved, incomprehensible mercy, this shames us, this makes us hate sin, but it produces love to Him, which nothing else can do. David knows he is still God's child, although such a sinful one, and he counts on the Lord fully undertaking his case. "Purge me with hyssop and I shall be clean: wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow." It may be David refers to the cleansing of the leper (Lev. 14 : 7) and to the water of purification (Num. 19 : 18, 19), for he sees himself as corrupt in soul as the leper in his body, and he knows that in his sin he had touched the dead. Sin had come, and instead of reckoning himself dead to sin, there was response to it; this was touching the dead, the self given over to death, and he must be cleansed. But looking to the grace of God he says, "I shall be clean." What? Uriah dead? the scandal abroad in the land? and yet

DAVID CLEAN?

Yes; clean in the eyes of God, who saw Jesus crucified for him, and who also saw his heart and how fully he was turned from sin to God. But before man there must be God's recognition of his sin. "Because by this deed thou hast given great occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme, the child also that is born unto thee shall surely die" (II Sam. 12 : 14). In vain did David plead for the reversal of this sentence. God would not alter it. The king pleads, "Hide thy face from my sins." He does not say, "Save me from disgrace before man; all throughout he deals with God. And quite mistrusting himself, he pleads, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me."

A good many are troubled about this word. Some say, "Do you believe in the doctrine of a clean heart?" Well, here it is in the Word of God. There are perhaps many who have yielded themselves up to God, and sought cleansing by the blood, and yet they get disappointed again and again in themselves, because they do not find their hearts answer to their own expectations; they want to feel that they are holy; they want to feel satisfied with themselves, and contented with their own state. But it is the blood of Jesus alone which cleanses, and the presence of Jesus dwelling in the heart which keeps it clean, and which shows us all which is not according to His mind in us. It is not ourselves made better, but ourselves given up to Jesus, and Jesus taking the place of ourselves which makes our hearts new. "Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. 21 : 5). The only "right spirit" within us is the Holy Ghost, who has chosen to make us His temples.

David is so sure of God's pardon that he says, "Make me to hear of joy and gladness." Is not this out of place? Not with such a God as our God. David did not say, "By bringing my sin to my face thou hast robbed me of joy, and brought me into sorrow." No; it was when it all came out, when the cloud broke, and he could see the face of God again that he could talk of joy. "Cast me not away from thy presence; and take not thy Holy Spirit from me. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation; and uphold me with thy free Spirit. Then will I teach transgressors thy way; and sinners shall be converted unto thee." It had been David's pride that he walked not in the counsel of the ungodly (Ps. 1 : 1; 26 : 4, 5), that his companions were they that feared the Lord. But now he sees another sphere of usefulness opening out before him. He knows as never before. He can go to them in their lowest depths and say, "Brother, sister, your king has been as vile as you, but the tender mercies of the Lord, and His lovingkindness have lifted him up; trust Him with me and be saved." The penitent king sees hope for the hopeless. Perhaps he had taught transgressors their ways; now he could teach them God's ways, for he never understood them as now. "Deliver me from blood-guiltiness, O God, thou God of my salvation: and my tongue shall sing aloud of thy righteousness. O Lord, open thou my lips; and my mouth shall shew forth thy praise." Under such circumstances, David must be dumb before his people unless God put a word into his lips; then He would take care of the consequences. Oh, how different is this from the morbid sullenness with which Satan seals the lips of some children of God who have fallen into sin; and who, instead of openly confessing their sin and yielding themselves up to God, remain in a useless sulk with themselves! A burnt child dreads the fire, and a restored backslider is he of all others who can best warn his brethren against the pitfalls where he fell.

David reads the heart of God; he does not attempt with numberless offerings and external observances to propitiate God or to prove to man how penitent he is. In his intercourse with God, he seeks to know what will be acceptable to Him. "For thou desirest not sacrifice; else would I give it thee; thou delightest not in burnt offering. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." This is just what Isaiah tells us (Isa. 1 : 11–18). Those who understand God learn to know His mind. The Psalmist is reading that mind of God when he says, "Do good in thy good pleasure to Zion; build thou the walls of Jerusalem. Then shalt thou be pleased with the sacrifices of righteousness." Offerings which spring out of God's work accepted by us; these, and these only, are acceptable to God. Any offerings which speak of our goodness, our zeal, our earnestness, are unacceptable; those which speak of the grace of Jesus are pleasing to the Lord.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Ravages of the Cholera in Toulon and Marseilles continue to occupy the chief place among the cablegrams from Europe. Last week the death rate in Marseilles from the cholera alone rose to seventy-three in one day. The list of victims in that city from the first appearance of the disease until sunset on July 16th numbered five hundred and seventy-eight. At Toulon the chief of police died of cholera, and the mayor and deputy mayor have both beeen smitten with the disease; and, although every one has left the city who is able to do so, the poor remain, and the cholera is carrying off forty victims a day. The epidemic is evidently becoming increasingly fatal, and there are more evidences of its spreading. Four well-defined cases have occurred in Paris. Two deaths took place in Liverpool docks on board a steamer from Marseilles. An interview published in the New York Herald with a tourist agent from the infected district explains the virulence of the disease which finds a congenial sphere in Toulon. He said the city, "despite the almost incessant work to make it sanitarily habitable, still remains almost indescribably filthy. The heat there has been terrible and the atmosphere moist and humid. In the work of renovating the town an old sewer has been discovered running right under the chief hospital of the city. This sewer reeked with filth, and had been untouched for three years past. Ten workmen engaged in opening it were overpowered by the stench, and fainted." Many cases of heroism are reported. Among them is that of the Duke of Chartres, who went to Toulon, taking with him $10,000 as a donation from the Count of Paris and family for the relief of sufferers. MM. Rousseau, Minister of the Interior, Herisson, Minister of Commerce, and Raynal, Minister of Public Works, went to Marseilles on a tour of inspection. The Prefect, welcoming them at the depot, said that over forty-six thousand inhabitants had fled by the railway and twenty thousand by other roads leading out of the city. The present moment threatened a more terrible scourge than the cholera—namely, unprecedented want and misery. Commerce and industry were at a standstill and great numbers of workmen unemployed. M. Rousseau assured the official of the sympathy of the government for the people, and said the utmost would be done to relieve their distress. The physicians are acting a noble part, laboring incessantly among the sick and dying. Among them are Dr. Pratt, a son-in-law of Dr. Marion Sims, Dr. Chapman, and the Hon. Alan Herbert, a brother of the Earl of Carnarvon.

The Compromise Proposed in the British House of Lords on the subject of the Franchise bill was formally rejected on July 17th by a vote of 182 to 132. An intense excitement has been aroused in consequence throughout the country. Even journals which do not usually support the administration condemn the obstinacy of the peers in refusing the compromise offered them. The London Times takes a serious view of the gravity of the struggle opened by the vote. It declares that a second rejection of the Franchise bill by the Lords would entail the most serious consequences, and reduce the whole business to a naked struggle for supremacy between the two Houses. It predicts openly, what ministers have been saying quietly, that Mr. Gladstone would ultimately, instead of dissolving the Commons, advise the Queen to create Peers in sufficient number to insure a Liberal majority. It explicitly pronounces an hereditary chamber indefensible on any principle accepted at the present day. In the country the Radicals appear less anxious about the fate of the Franchise bill than that the conflict may end in the abolition of the legislative power of the House of Lords. A monster demonstration of Trades Unionists, 200,000 in number, including 10,000 agricultural laborers, the class the bill was intended to benefit, took place in London on Monday. The object of the demonstration was to disprove an assertion made by the Marquis of Salisbury that the people did not care about the bill, and that the agricultural laborers were not anxious for the franchise.

The Chinese Government has Manifested symptoms of yielding to the demands of France. A cable message from Paris on July 18th says that the Chinese Imperial Gazette of the 16th inst. published a decree in accordance with the terms of the Convention with France which was violated at Lang-sin. In this decree the Emperor orders the Chinese troops to evacuate Lao-ki, Lang-son, and Cao-bang, and to withdraw to the Chinese side of the passes leading to Yun-nan, Kwang-ton, and Kwang-si. The evacuation is to be completed within a month. The appearance of the French fleet in Chinese waters has had the effect of strengthening the peace party at Pekin. The question of granting the indemnity demanded by France is being discussed. Peace, however, though probable, is not absolutely assured, as there is a powerful party in China intent on war. A later despatch from Shanghai states that the situation at Pekin has become very critical, owing to the occurrence of stormy disputes between the chiefs of the two parties relative to the reply to be sent to the ultimatum of France.

An Incident of the Annual Fete, with which, on July 14th, the French celebrate the fall of the Bastile, led to an interchange of diplomatic courtesies between Germany and France. During the progress of the fêtes some Alsatians were making a demonstration in the streets of Paris of their attachment to France and their hatred of Germany, when a young German student was observed insulting the French flag by spitting upon it. The crowd immediately became wild with excitement. They soundly thrashed the German, and then went in quest of a German flag on which the insult could be returned. They found a flag, among other decorations, on a hotel, and ordered the proprietor to take it down. As he had German guests in the house he did not comply; so the mob broke the windows of the hotel, made their way into the building, and tore down the flag. It was thrown down to the people and rent to fragments. Ample apologies were made by the French Government to the German minister in Paris and by the French minister at Berlin to the German Government for the insult to the flag.

The Eldest Son of the Prince of Wales, who is, after his father, the heir to the British crown, has been taking part in a meeting held to consider measures for improving the condition of the London poor. The meeting was held at Cambridge, where the young prince is now residing as a student at the university. In the course of a speech he delivered on the occasion he said: "Nothing is more necessary for building up a healthy commonwealth than that all classes or parties, whether political or religious, should unite together in the attempt to better, not only each other, but the community. It is because the present movement endeavors to do this, and to help in the physical, moral, political, and intellectual bettering of our fellow-countrymen in the eastern parts of London, and to make them thus worthier citizens, not only of the great metropolis, but also of our wider England, that I, for one, give them my heartiest sympathy." The prince's speech is of interest, as being the first occasion on which he has addressed a meeting of his countrymen. If the young man acts in accordance with the principles he enunciated, he may do something toward checking the tendency toward a republican form of government.

TAWHIAO, KING OF THE NEW ZEALAND MAORIES.—Scenes in the History of his People.

TAWHIAO,

King of the Maories of New Zealand.

The Colony and Population of New Zealand—Object of the King's Visit—The Blue Ribbon—First Efforts to Civilize and Evangelize the Maories—Visit of Maori Chiefs in 1820—Hongi's Love of War—Baptism of a Chief—Rubbing Noses— Lying in State—Singular Device by a Christian Chieftain.

THE sable monarch whose portrait appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is the ruler of the tribes of natives of New Zealand. His present prominence in the civilized world is due to the fact that he and a few of his chiefs have suddenly turned up in London to complain of the conduct of Englishmen in New Zealand. It is the old story with which our experience with the redskins has rendered us only too familiar. The Maories, as the natives are called, hold lands rich in minerals and covered with valuable forests. They do not work mines and they have no idea of the value of the pine trees, while the white man, looking on, and troubled by the thought that so much wealth should lie around unutilized, has gradually stolen acre after acre and square mile after square mile of the land which he knows so well how to make productive. The Maories failed to get justice from the local government in New Zealand, so, with a faith that does honor to their hearts, though it does not impress us with their wisdom, they raised $15,000 for expenses and sent Tawhiao, their king, and his attendant chiefs to plead their case at headquarters. So the Indians have sent deputations to their "Great Father" in Washington, with what result is well known.

The colony of New Zealand is situated in the South Pacific Ocean, and consists of three islands, the Northern, Middle, and Stewart's Islands. Portions of them were explored by Tasman, under the direction of the Dutch East India Company, in 1642, and visited at various times during the eighteenth century by Captain Cook. The first settlement of Europeans was made in 1814, but no colonization took place until 1839. In 1841 New Zealand was created a separate colony distinct from New South Wales. The entire area is about 106,260 square miles, being 4440 miles smaller than the State of Nevada.

THE POPULATION

of New Zealand in March, 1881, was 489,993. The native population, or Maories, was estimated at 44,097, in addition, chiefly in the Northern Island. In 1840 a treaty was concluded at Waitangi, with the native chiefs, whereby the sovereignty of the islands was ceded to Great Britain, while the chiefs were guaranteed the possession of their lands, forests, etc., on condition that they retained them. If they proposed to sell them Great Britain was to have the right of pre-emption. Thus New Zealand became a regular colony, and the seat of government was fixed at Auckland, but it was removed to Wellington in 1865. The government is vested in a governor appointed by the Queen of England, a Legislative Council, also appointed by the Queen, and a House of Representatives consisting of ninety-five members, elected by the people for three years, four of whom are Maories, elected by the natives.

The Maori King and the chiefs who accompany him on his visit to England, made their first appearance in the streets of London on June 3d, and were naturally the objects of considerable interest, the curiosity of spectators being especially aroused by the tattooed countenance of the king, and his enormous ear-rings, which he considers the chief ornament on his person. They hope to get their case considered in time for them to return next month.

THE KING'S PERSONAL HISTORY.

Tawhiao is the son of Potatan te Wherowhero, King of the Maories. Tawhiao succeeded his father under the title of Potatan II. He was known at the time as Matutaera, but subsequently took the name of Tawhiao, by which he is now most commonly known. Among the Maories birth and rank exercise as potent an influence as they do among more civilized races. No Maori chief is truly great unless he can trace back his descent to the arrival of the first Maories in their canoes from Hawaiki. Tawhiao can do this, his ancestor being Hotonui, who came in the canoe Tainui, which made the land at Kawhia, a picturesque port on the east coast, which within the last few months has been opened to Europeans.

The king is tall and slim, with a very dark skin, much darker than that of many of his subjects. His face is elaborately tattooed ; and he wears a piece of green-stone suspended from the lobe of his right ear. His forehead is high, the crown of his head being pyramidal. He wears European clothing, in which he looks as awkward as he feels, but in his native costume he is more imposing.

THE BLUE RIBBON.

Tawhiao was interviewed at Melbourne on April 15th by Mr. T. W. Glover, the coadjutor of Mr. Richard T. Booth, and Mr. Ballen, as representing the Australian Gospel Temperance Union, who tendered to him, as the first kingly wearer of the emblematic "blue ribbon," respects and best wishes, coupled with a cordial welcome to Victoria. The king and his chiefs gave the visitors a very hearty reception, and, through their interpreter, expressed the appreciation and gratification they all felt for the kind attention bestowed on them. The chiefs said they were all agreed as to the value and importance of the principles they had embraced. If they and their fathers had abjured fire-water from the first they might not now have had to go to England to complain of having been cheated. It may be hoped that when the king returns and lays aside his European clothes with their blue ribbon decoration, he will not discard the principles it represents. He will be less likely to lose his property if he keeps sober.

THE CIVILIZING AND EVANGELIZING

of the Aborigines of New Zealand was commenced in 1814 under the auspices of the apostolic Samuel Marsden, who repeatedly visited the islands in the interests of the Church Missionary Society. In 1818 the Rev. S. Leigh paid his first visit to the country, and some time afterward a Wesleyan Methodist Mission was regularly organized. Besides the flourishing centres of Christian influence now belonging to the Episcopal and Wesleyan Methodist Churches, the Baptists have organized an active evangelistic agency in New Zealand. They have no fewer than twenty-five churches in the North and South Islands, with a membership of professing Christians of more than 22,200. The Rev. Thomas Spurgeon, son of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, is pastor of the church at Auckland, which has nearly six hundred persons in fellowship, and a congregation of about double that number.

A FORMER VISIT IN 1820.

In 1820 Hongi and another young chief named Waikato, accompanied the Rev. Mr. Kendal to England. They were welcomed by the Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Bickersteth, at the Church Mission House in London. Hongi described his objects in coming to England thus, "We have come to London to see the king, the multitude of his people, what they are all doing, and the goodness of their land. We wish to remain one month, and then return, to take back with us one hundred men, miners, to search for iron, blacksmiths, carpenters, and missionaries, to teach them the arts and religion in their own tongue. We are anxious to have twenty British soldiers, and three officers to keep them in order. We will protect them and give them plenty of land." Great interest was awakened in England by the visit of these chiefs. George IV. honored them with an interview, showed them his armory, and presented each with a complete suite of armor, double barrelled gun, etc. Waikato coveted all he saw ; Hongi had eyes only for military affairs, and only pleasure in receiving of weapons.

The visit which promised such good things for the Maori was indirectly the cause of the frightful wars which desolated their country under Hongi for years afterward. Though he did not betray it while in England, the soul of the savage chieftain was then fired with one ardent ambition, to become sole ruler in the islands, as King George was in England ; with this object he exchanged on the way back everything else he had received for supplies of guns, powder, and shot. Determined to turn the deadly gifts he had received to account, he held

A COUNCIL OF WAR

(see frontispiece), and having found a cause for quarrel with another tribe, he proclaimed war against Hinaki, its chief.

In vain did Hinaki try to make peace, but nothing could alter Hongi's savage purpose, and Hinaki finding there was no alternative, prepared to resist the invader. The tribes were related to each other, but the pleasure to Hongi of trying his new military stores prevailed over every other feeling. The battle, however, was for some time doubtful. Hinaki, a man of noble form and determined courage, long maintained the combat, until at last he fell, having received four balls ; his ferocious conqueror rushed forward, and with his English clasp knife scooped out the eye of his expiring enemy and swallowed it ; he then stabbed him in the neck, and drunk his blood as it gushed from the wound. About a thousand men were slain in this battle, and three hundred were cooked and eaten on the field.

Hongi returned with twenty prisoners on his canoe, intended to keep them as slaves, but his daughter, finding that her own husband had been killed, this Maori lady seized the sword which King George had presented to her father, jumped on board, and smote off the heads of sixteen out of twenty with her own hand. She then first shot and afterward strangled herself. Such horrors would have been past all credence had they not been related by eye-witnesses. This battle was only the commencement of a series of such cruel and devastating wars, that the very extinction of the Maori race was threatened. Thus King George's present promoted English interests by encouraging the occupiers and owners of the soil to kill each other. Hongi became

THE NAPOLEON OF NEW ZEALAND.

At length this monster received a check in his desolating career. In the beginning of 1827 he plundered and burned the Wesleyan Missionary station at Whangaroa. He was successful, as usual, but after the battle he received a shot from which he never recovered. To the last he urged his people to carry on the war, and exterminate his enemies. "Thus will you avenge my death, and thus only do I wish to be revenged." were his last words. Thus his mission to England led to massacre and bloodshed, ending in his own death. King George's kindness neutralized that of the missionaries in London. It may be hoped that Tawhiao's visit will have no such unhappy results. He is little likely to get a present of arms from the Queen, who usually gives an Indian shawl when she gives anything. As the king would be embarrassed by the present of a shawl, perhaps Mr. Gladstone will persuade her Majesty to invest fifty cents in a Bible for him.

BAPTISM OF AN OLD MAORI CHIEF.

This event, which took place in 1849, in the presence of Sir George Grey, who was then Governor of New Zealand, so impressed Sir George that he made a sketch of it on the spot, and forwarded it to the Church Missionary Society ; sending, at the same time, an extract from the journal of his assistant private secretary, giving an account of the baptism. In this extract he says : "In the course of this morning we witnessed a most solemn and imposing ceremony—the baptism of a very old chief, named Te Ngahue. He was brought into the chapel, borne on an amo, or native litter, and deposited, with the greatest solicitude and care, by his relatives on the ground, upon a spot at the upper end of the building pointed out to them by e missionary, Mr. Chapman. He was a fine, gnified-looking old man, and had evidently, spite of his bowed-down and decrepit appearce, been in his youth a tall and vigorous man. was a truly impressive and touching sight to the old savage—one of the Maori chiefs of e old school, who had often led his tribe to eds of blood and savage warfare, and had isted, time after time, upon the flesh of his emies, now meekly offering himself as a candate for admission into the Church of Christ. rrounded by a few friends and the European itors, and assiduously attended by his wife, lay on his litter, the centre of a small knot persons in the corner of the spacious chapel, ile the clergyman performed the baptismal remony (see frontispiece).

War between hostile tribes was for a long ne a great hinderance to satisfactory work by missionaries, but in March, 1828, the belligent chiefs, themselves sick and weary of their erminable struggles, applied to the missionas to act as mediators. Accordingly, Mr. nry Williams set out with his party to do at they might to establish peace between the posing parties. All were armed except themves; should any provocation arise, their lives re not worth a moment's purchase, but it was path of duty, and they were in God's hands. ey arrived in the Hekianga Valley on Satury, and spent the time in seeking to influence e and another individually, with much enragement. The following day the savage rriors unanimously consented to an observce of the Sabbath.

A WHITE FLAG WAS HOISTED,

Strange preaching ground, the very dst of these stockades and trenches, and the ive fortifications, and still stranger audience, five hundred warriors armed to the teeth, o gathered round the messengers of the oss. They began with a hymn, assisted by school-boys they had brought with them, l as the melody filled the air, it seemed to athe a holy calm around; the wild cannibals re hushed into peaceful and earnest attenn, while the teachers told of Him who shed s own blood for our deliverance, and wrestled h God in prayer for the saving of their souls. The Sabbath passed under these holy influces; the eventful day dawned upon the morv, which was to settle the anxious question war or peace. The missionaries had just had joy and reward of seeing two of the hostile ders l settle their differences (see frontispiece), en a loud noise was heard, and seven hund warriors were seen advancing in order of tle till within one hundred and fifty yards of flag, when they rushed forward with a horyell, which sounded like the death-knell of hopes of a pacific arrangement. On the ntrary, it was all in due order, and after varis military performances on both sides, the ole assembly quietly dispersed. God's serits retraced their steps homeward, with the sic of their Master's words echoing in their arts, "Blessed are the peacemakers, for theirs he kingdom of heaven."

Until 1846 there were frequent outbreaks of r between the Maories and the British, but that year peace was made, and the event was occasion of much rejoicing. In 1849 a great tival took place. Previously to the arrival the guests the food was piled either on the ound or on wooden scaffolds. Those erecns were square pyramidal towers, having an vation of fifty feet, on ranges of six feet high, ending from half a mile to two miles. On se ranges were placed sweet potatoes, maize, n-root, potted birds, dried fish, karaka bers, and other dainties, which were afterward tributed among the natives present. Shortly er the declaration of peace, first, when visited by the Rev. R. Davis, he s surly in his manners, and disinclined to listen. As his sickness increased he softened down, and seemed to feel the importance of what was said to him. He died on August 7th, 1850. His last words were, "It is on Him my mind is fixed." He had expressed the wish to have Christian burial, but after his death the people objected, saying there would be danger of a quarrel if his wish were carried out, and the missionary had to be content with reading the burial service over the body. Afterward the body of the chief "lay in state" (as shown in the frontispiece). The body was placed in a sitting position, covered with a scarlet cloth, the head being dressed with feathers. At his right hand were his Prayer-book and gun. Many natives were present.

A SINGULAR DEVICE

by a Christian chieftain for making peace deserves to be recorded. He went to the neighborhood of his enemies' pah, and concealed himself near it, so that he could see every one who went in and came out without being seen himself. At last he saw a young man, one of the head chiefs of the place, go out and advance to a spot where he might obtain an extended view and see whether any enemies might be approaching; there he sat down, quite unaware of the vicinity of his foe, who lay concealed close to him. This one, watching his opportunity, stole upon him so quietly that he reached him without being heard, then sprang suddenly upon him like a tiger, and overpowered him before he had time to resist; he then pinioned his arms behind him (see frontispiece), and led him off as a prisoner. But not to death. When they had gone some distance, quite out of sight of the pah, he suddenly stopped, unbound his prisoner's arms, and bid him bind his instead! The other obeyed, marvelling what it all meant, and now took his captor, thus fettered, back to the enclosure. Once inside, all rushed upon him, eager to dispatch him instantly, but the young chief bade them pause while he related how he had obtained his captive. Surrounded by them all, the prisoner in the midst, he now gave an exact account of all that had taken place, and demanded whether he ought to be killed? Such courage and generosity combined struck the impulsive warriors with admiration. With one acclaim they voted his deliverance, the prisoner was immediately unbound, peace made between the two tribes, and, after celebrating a feast in his honor, he returned to his own place with some of his new made friends.

MR. GEORGE MULLER'S RECENT TOUR IN INDIA.

MENTION has been made on several occasions, in these columns, of the evangelistic tour in India of Mr. George Muller, of the Bristol Orphanages. He has now returned, and on July 1st a social meeting was held in Bristol, to welcome him and his devoted wife. Mr. Muller, at a public meeting afterward, gave some very interesting details of his recent tour. He said, in the course of his address: "Shortly after my conversion I offered myself five times to God for missionary labor in India, but the way was not opened up to me, and I was subsequently led into the sphere of labor with which my name has been so long associated. Thus, after an interval of fifty-eight years, I was guided in my seventy-ninth year to undertake a journey through the country that has had so warm a place in my interest. This tour was one of labor in the service of the Lord, and crowned with great blessing, no hinderance having been experienced either from the climate or any other cause.

"My objects in going to India were—first, that I might visit the missionaries who are bearing the burden and heat of the day, and, by God's grace, impart counsel and encouragement to them in their arduous labor of love. Secondly, to preach the Gospel to the thousands of Europeans and natives with whom I should come in contact in that vast field. The most difficult classes to reach are the educated Brahmins; I was very anxious, therefore, to bring the simple Gospel before them, as the power of God unto salvation. Thirdly, to promote unity and love between the followers of Christ. This has been a special feature of my ministrations during the past nine years in the twenty-seven countries I have visited. To further this object I have gladly labored in connection with all branches of the Christian Church where the foundation truths of the Gospel are admitted, though I made that an essential condition. In all these churches I have expounded the Scripture and taught the things of God, and in no instance was anything required of me that it was against my conscience to perform.

"A fourth object was to promote the study and love of the Word of God, alike among ministers and their congregations, that thus a pure and sound conception might be formed of the truths therein contained. Also to teach what I understand to be the true character of this dispensation, that we are not to wait to see the whole world converted before the coming of the Lord, but to be found 'looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of our great Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.'"

Mr. and Mrs. Muller sailed from Gravesend on September 26th last year; the voyage occupied thirty-four days, during which time the veteran evangelist held a few services on board, but with no manifestation of blessing. Some months after, however, he met a lady in India, who stated with joy that she had been blessed through his ministry on board. Among the places visited were Colombo, Madras, Bangalore, Colar, Coimbatore, the Nilgherry Hills, Calcutta, Darjeeling, Bankapoor (near Patna) Dinapoor, Benares, Allahabad, Lucknow, Cawnpore, Agra, Lahore, Delhi, Bombay, and other places, in all of which he was well received, and addressed meetings.

Benares is the great centre of Hindoo idolatry, and in speaking of it Mr. Muller said: "We cannot tell you the deep impression made upon our minds as we saw the whole city given to idolatry, and the effects of it. The birds feeding upon the bodies in the river of the dead, whose friends were too poor to buy materials to burn them; the flames at evening as others were being consumed; the cemetery of the Parsees, where the bodies are stripped and left to the mercy of the vultures and crows, who gorge themselves until they are almost too heavy to fly—this is heathenism indeed! Can nothing be done for these poor benighted souls? We went into the School of Philosophy, and saw four hundred and fifty men under their teachers learning the errors of their religion. Think of all these things, and offer yourselves to the Lord."

Two Letters from a Native Evangelist.—The Rev. Robert Spurgeon, of Barisal, Backergunge, India, said: "To give an idea of the results of the mission among the natives, I will quote from two letters I have received from an exceedingly earnest native minister, whose flock numbers some 200 or 300 persons. He was a man deeply read in the Scriptures. In October last he wrote: 'Prayer-meetings are being held here constantly, and youths are gradually acquiring the power to preach. This is a great joy, and the inner love of many of the Lord is increasing. The Lord is showing me the fruit of my labors.' A month later he wrote another letter, describing how the work is progressing under his hand: 'Since we began the Monday prayer-meetings our young men have made great progress in spiritual things. Many are tasting the essence of the love of the Lord. Besides the prayer-meeting a fellowship-meeting is held every Friday. The young men are meeting daily for prayer, and sometimes women unite with them. The study of the Scriptures and religious conversation is constantly carried on among them, while two or three of them give instruction to others each Sunday, and I praise the Lord that many more are being roused by the meetings. Some have confessed their sins with tears.'"

THE FOES OF SOCIETY.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Why hast thou broken down her hedges, so that all they which pass by the way do pluck her? The boar out of the wood doth waste it and the wild beast out of the wood doth devour it."—PSALM 80 : 12, 13.

Society being Woven Together—Disintegrating Forces—I. All Public Criminals—Making Crime a Profession—Unprofessional Criminals—Startling Figures—Rum Largely Responsible—The Cost of Crime—Treating it Unwisely—A Fifteen-Year-Old Criminal—II. Untrustworthy Officials—Corrupt Judges—Gov. Dix and the Foster Case — III. The Idle — The Tramps — IV. The Oppressed Poor — Underground Life—Responsibility of Owners of Luxuries—A Despairing Woman's Cry—Practical Hints.

BY this expressive figure the text sets forth the idea that in olden times there were bad influences which, as with swine's feet, trampled, and, as with swine's teeth, crunched the vineyards of God. So it is now. Long ago the temple of truth and justice would have been completed had there not been bad influences to deface the walls and break down the altars. If it had not been for these evil influences long ago the whole earth would have become an Eschol of ripened clusters. But the boar out of the wood hath devoured it, and the wild beast of the field hath wasted it.

Day by day the shuttle flies to and fro, of the world, and every additional wire is another nerve of sympathy; and, looking upon the present condition of these cities and upon their prospective improvements, I find that there is a large class of men and women who are the sworn friends of all that is right, and the sworn foes of all that is wrong. There never have been so many good men and women in these cities as to-day; there never have been so many officials doing their whole duty; there never have been so many churches, so many consecrated ministers of the Gospel, so many evangelical printing-presses, nor such a large multitude of men who are the friends of God and humanity as to-day.

But while I recognize this fact, we must all, as intelligent men, recognize the other fact that there is a class of persons whose whole influence is baneful, destructful, and deathful in these cities. It is my object this morning to point out these foes of society, and to classify them, that we may know who they are, how to treat them, and how to put ourselves on the defence.

I. In the first place, in this class of baneful people, you must place all

PUBLIC CRIMINALS.

The entire business of the latter class, American and foreign, whom we call the professional criminals—their entire business is to work iniquity. That is as much their business as merchandise or jurisprudence is your business. They put into it all the energies of body, mind, and soul, and they look upon the interregnum spent in prison as so much wasted time—just as you look upon an attack of asthma or rheumatism that keeps you a few weeks in the house. It is their regular business to pick pockets, and blow up safes, and shoplift, and ply the panel game; and they are as proud of their adroitness in that direction as you are proud when you upset the argument of an opposing counsel, or cure a wound that some other surgeon has given up, or foresee a turn in the market so that you can buy goods just before they go up 20 per cent. It is their business to work crime, and I do not suppose that once a year the immorality of the thing comes across their soul.

In addition to this class of professional criminals, American and foreign, there is a class who more or less are industrious in crime. In one year the police arrests in these three cities for theft, 10,000; for assault and battery, 10,000; for intoxication, 50,000. The fact is that for a great deal of the theft. It confuses people's ideas of property. They get their hands on things that do not belong to them. And rum is responsible for nearly all of the cases of assault and battery, inspiring men with sudden bravery which must be demonstrated, though on the face of the next gentleman!

Do you feel that you are independent of all these things? You are not. In the first place, it touches your pocket. Do you know that in these three cities we pay seven million dollars of tax every year to arraign, try, and support criminals? You help to pay the board of every criminal, from the sneak who takes a spool of cotton up to the man who enacts a Black Friday. Yea, your morals are affected by this fact. You might as well think of standing in a confined room where there are fifty people and avoid breathing the vitiated air, as to stand in any community without being somehow contaminated or affected by the evil moral atmosphere. What is the fire that burns down your store or house compared with the conflagration of your morals? What is the theft of gold or silver compared with the theft of your children's virtue?

When a man does wrong, we are all ready to arrest him. We shout at the top of our voice, "Stop thief!" and we put on but what provision are we making for the time when the handcuffs and manacles come off? Society practically says to these men, "You go into jail now and rot—good for you," instead of saying, "You go into jail; the justice of the earthly law and the justice of the divine law demands it; you must atone for your crime; but remember we are not rejoicing over your suffering; we wish for your elevation. Here are books and tracts, and the Gospel of the Son of God—here is Christ. Look and live!"

Instead of that, we make these criminals feel that society has a grudge against them, and they in return have a grudge against society, and they come out more infuriated and depraved than when they went in. This is so much the fact that a great multitude of those who are in the prisons of this country have been there before. Of the 1500 criminals in New York prison one year, 400 had been there before. Of the 5000 people who had been in a House of Correction in this country during a certain reach of time—of these 5000, 3200 had been there before—the prison in the one case, and the House of Correction in the other, actually producing no benefit, leaving them as bad as they were—leaving them worse than they were. A philanthropist said to a lad who was fifteen years of age, and who had spent of the fifteen years

THREE YEARS IN PRISON,

"What have they done for you, my lad, in the way of reformation?" "Oh," said the lad, "when I was brought up before the judge the first time, he said, 'You ought to be ashamed of yourself.' Then I was imprisoned. I got out, and I committed another crime, and I came back, and the judge said to me, 'You rascal!' And then I was imprisoned, and after a while I got out, and I committed a worse crime, and then I came back before the judge, and he said, 'You ought to be hanged!'" "Is that all they did for you in the way of reformation?" "Yes," replied the boy, "that is all."

"Oh," you say, "these criminals in our cities are incorrigible." I deny it. I believe there were thousands of men who slept last night in prison bunks who would leap at the first thought of coming back to decency and respectability, if it were possible. "Oh," you say, "I haven't patience with them." How much better would you have done under the same circumstances? Suppose your mother had been a blasphemer, and your father a sot, and you had started in life with your body full of evil proclivities, and at ten years of age you had been sent out to steal, and banged and bruised when you came in without any spoils; and suppose Society had turned its back on you, leaving you to consort with vagabonds and wharf-rats, how much better would you have been?

While I have no sympathy with that judicial clemency which would let crime run loose, that feeling which sits in the gallery of t court-house weeping bitterly because so desperado is brought to justice—while I ha no sympathy with that, I tell you we want m potential influences for the reformation of th depraved classes. Do you think that will ever turn a thief into an honest man? W want men in this country like William Wilb force, like John Howard—men like those w explored the dungeons of France and Engla half a century ago—women like Elizabeth F who shall do for the prisons of this coun what those people did for the prisons of En land in their days. I thank God for what Is T. Hopper, and Dr. Wines, and Mr. Harris, a others have accomplished in the improveme of prison discipline, and in the improvement the architecture of our penitentiaries; but it some time yet, I fear, before we shall have our cities the benediction of Him who said, was in prison and ye visited me."

If you want the rising generation of our cit brought up for God, and if you want cri throttled and put down, give more attention your common schools, more attention to yo high schools, more attention to your colleg and encourage all those who with toils describable and nervous exhaustion beyond power of speech to relate—encourage th people, who are, amid all these trials, toiling the elevation of humanity.

II. Another class I shall mention are all

UNTRUSTWORTHY OFFICIALS.

Why was it that crime went rampant in N York between 1866 and 1871? It was beca the police judges were as corrupt as the va bonds that were brought before them. T criminal winked at the judge, or the law winked for him. It was all over. Of 8000 ca brought up, only 3000 were tried. Things w "fixed up," but for society "fixed dow When the two thieves stole the diamond from the Brooklyn gentleman riding in Broadway stage, they were arrested. The t was set down for the General Sessions, bu never came on. The case was never heard and the government of New York bid a hig price for crime when it did that. Let a crimi go, and you open the door for more criminali You know as well as I do that there are wa ing all our streets to-day men and wom the foes of society, criminal to the last exte unwhipped of justice.

Now, I say, let the law swoop on them. it be understood that crime gets no protect in these great cities. Let it be understood t the detectives are after it; that the police c is brandished; that the iron door of the pri is swung open, and the judge is ready to call the case. When Governor Dix, a few ye ago, refused to let Foster, the assassin, go al he had been condemned to the gallows, n withstanding all the social influence that brought to bear on the Governor—when he fused to let that assassin go, he did more, t Governor did more to discourage crime than the Governors we ever had before in the St of New York!

III. Again, in this class of dangerous a baneful people, I must place

THE IDLE.

Do not mistake me. I do not mean the si the old, or those people of any age who can get work; but look out for your athletic nothing—the man who will not work, the m who chooses idleness. Some one said to a c brated French nobleman, "Why is it that work when you have so much property "Oh," he replied, "I should have to keep engraving, or I should hang myself!" No m can afford to be idle, if there is any work he get to do. Out of the idle classes come criminal classes. Character, like water, st nates if it stand still too long. I do not won that in a world where there is so much to and all the hosts of earth, and heaven, and l are plunging into the conflict, and angels ying to and fro, and God is at work, and the hole universe is aquake with the marching and ountermarching—I do not wonder that God nites with His indignation a man who chooses leness.

I have watched these do-nothings, who spend fe stroking their beard, and retouching their oilet, and criticising industrious people, and ending their evenings in bar-rooms and club-ooms, smoking, and drinking champagne, and elling silly or scandalous stories. I have atched them. For a while, they drink the best ines, and they smoke the best cigars, and they ove in very fine society; but, as by a law of in-xorable gravitation,

THEY COME TO THE ALMSHOUSE

r the penitentiary. The governments of these ree cities provide free lodgings—free lodgings o over 20,000 men and women who are as able o work as you and I are. These men go into ie station-house to sleep. In the daytime they ome out and they get their food at your door, nd they steal what they can out of the front asement while the servant is spreading the read in the back basement? Then they go long from one place to another, from one tation-house to another. When they are found ut to be "repeaters," they simply move on.

Nine hundred and ninety-nine of the thou-and would not take work if you gave it to hem. I know how much they want to work—good many of them. I am referring now to he tramps who infest all our cities. They no nore want work than did that man last August, when he came to a philanthropist and asked for omething to eat, or for some money, and the hilanthropist said to him, "Why don't you go o work? You are a stout, healthy man." While the man was wiping the perspiration off is face in the hot August weather, he replied, "I can't get any work to do at my business." "What is your business?" said the philan-hropist. Said the man, "It is shovelling now!"

I know them. I have tried over and over gain whether they wanted to work, by setting hem to saw wood in my cellar. I offered them arge wages. I heard the saw going for about hree minutes, and then there was a silence, and went down-stairs to see what was the matter, nd lo! the wood, but no saw! The man had offered his arm to the saw, and they had walked off together. I say these men are an outrage on the Lord's poor, who ought to be helped, must be helped, will be helped. There are housands of men in our cities who cannot get work, but these mean fellows of whom I am speaking come not under that category. These men would not go;

THEY DO NOT WANT WORK.

I wish we could have re-established for just such men the old-fashioned whipping-post. Banishment from society does not hurt them a bit. They like prison. They rather prefer the almshouse, for they like thin soup when they cannot get mock turtle. You cannot frighten them by imprisonment. Oh, no. If I had my way, I would just put some healthy work on one side and a raw hide on the other, and let them take their choice. By what law of God or man is it right that you and I, who toil until our hands are blistered, and our elbows ache, and our brain gets numb—I ask you, by what right are we called upon to take care of the of the United States? I like that scant bill of fare which Paul wrote out for the Thessalonian loafers: "If a man will not work, neither shall he eat." Depend upon it, my friends, these idle classes make the criminal classes.

IV. In this class of dangerous people I must also place

THE OPPRESSED POOR.

Poverty a little while is chastening, but when it comes so that the children cry for bread, and there is none, sometimes men get desperate. There are thousands of honest men every day lacerated into vagabondism. They go on, they are badgered, and stung, and kicked until they can endure it no longer, and they stand with the ferocity of a wild beast, which, pursued until it can run no longer, turns round, foaming and bleeding, to fight the hounds. There is an

and London that is simply appalling. It wallows and it sweats with putrefaction. You go down the long stairs, which are wet, and decayed, and rotten with filth, and at the foot of those stairs you find the victim, cold and hungry, three fourths dead—perhaps slinking into a darker corner, under the gleam of the lantern of the police. There has not been a breath of air in that room for five years—not a breath of fresh air. There they are, all huddled together, men, women, children, blacks, whites—Mary Magdalen without her repentance, and Lazarus without his God.

These are the dives into which the thieves and the pickpockets go, and other people who would like to do better. These are the sores which bleed perpetual corruption into the city. This is the underlying volcano which threatens us with Caraccas earthquake. It rolls, and it surges, and it heaves, and it blasphemes, and it dies; only two outlets for it—the police-station and the Potter's Field. In other words, they must either go to prison or to perdition! "Oh!" you say, "I have never seen these things." Because you will not. But you will see them in that day when these poor wretches crawl up in the light of the judgment throne, and while all hearts are being revealed, and amid the thunders and lightnings and earthquakes of that day God will ask you and me what we did to help them, what we did to save them. There is of the poor not quite so squalid, but almost as helpless. See how sunken their eyes are. Cheek-bones stand out. Hands damp with slow consumption. Their breath is that of the charnel-house. They hear overhead on the pavement the roar of the wheels of fashion and the laughter of gay men and women, and wonder why God gives to some people so much and to others so little. And some of them are being pushed off into the infidelity the poor German woman experienced when in the midst of her wretchedness it was told her that God was good. "No! no! no good God, no good God. Look at me! No good God! No good God!"

In all our cities, the cry of whose want I am to-day interpreting, there are countless thousands of people dependent upon city, individual, and State charities. If I could gather up all their voices to-day it would make a groan that would shake this city to its foundation; but for the most part it is speechless, it suffers in silence, gnashing its teeth, sucking out the blood of its own arteries,

WAITING FOR THE JUDGMENT-DAY.

I should not wonder, my friends, if it will be found in that day that we have had some things that might have been given to them, some extra garment that might have kept out the winter's cold, some piece of bread thrown into the ash-barrel that might a little have appeased their hunger, some wasted candle or gas-jet that might have illumined their darkness, some fresco on our wall that would have given them a roof, some gold ring which, sold for them, would have kept that orphan girl from being crowded off the precipices of a woful life, some New Testament that would have told of Him who came to seek that which was lost.

Oh, this wave of vagrancy, and pauperism, and crime, and hunger that dashes against our front doorstep! I do not know whether you see as much of it as I do. Some weeks I get almost frenzied with it—this pounding at the door, and pounding, and ringing, and ringing, of all nationalities, of all and there is no fortune on earth that could help all of them. It goes on until I dare not own more than one decent pair of shoes, or more than one decent hat, lest in the last day Christ should say to me, "Inasmuch as ye did it not to these, ye did it not to me." Oh, if the roof could be lifted off of these homes of the destitute, and we could look right into them as God looks, who would have nerves to stand it?

There are the forty-five thousand sewing women in this cluster of cities—forty-five thousand sewing women toiling day after day and night after night until sometimes the blood spurts from nostril and lip! How well all that woe was voiced by the despairing woman who standing by her invalid husband and her invalid child, said to the philanthropist who came to their relief, "Oh, I am broken-hearted; everything seems to go against us; and then, beside that, there are other things!" "What things?" said the philanthropist "Oh," she replied, "my sins, my sins! I never see anything or hear anything good. I work from Monday morning until Saturday night, and on Sundays I can't go out, and I walk up and down this floor, and tremble at the thought I must at last meet God. Oh, we work very hard; we get on so poorly! And then to see the poor little wee thing getting weaker and weaker every day; and then instead of getting nearer to God, to feel all the time that I am going away from Him further and further. Oh, sir, I do wish I was ready to die!"

Alas, that that woman could not realize the tender-hearted love of Jesus, who sympathizes with and will assuredly succor all who trust in Him and call upon His name! I should not wonder if some of those people will have a better time in the next world than we will have. I should not wonder if it would be just like Christ to say, "Come up, you poor woman; you had it hard on earth, you shall have it easy now; take the highest throne; you suffered with Me on earth, now be glorified with Me in heaven." Oh, weeping One of Bethany! oh, wounded One of the cross! have mercy on the starving and homeless poor of Brooklyn and New York!

I am preaching this sermon this morning for four or five

PRACTICAL REASONS.

Because I want you to see who are the dangerous classes, and beware of them. Because I want you to be more discriminating in your charities. Because I want to make you the friends of all city evangelization, of Howard Missions, of Children's Aid Societies, of Dorcas Societies. Because I want you, if you have extra and useless garments in your house, or garments that you can spare, I want you to send them out, that the naked limbs might be covered. Who knows but that the hat you give away will come back a jewelled coronet? and who knows but that the garment you give away will be turned into white, by some mysterious process, and after a while be embroidered in Christ's raiment, so that He shall run His hand over it and say, "I was naked and ye clothed me?"

And, above all, I have preached this sermon this morning, my dear friends, because I want you to see in contrast how good God has been to you; because I hope some of you will go home from this service and sit down at your full table, and look at the round faces of your children, and thank God; and that this afternoon, you will go to your room, and lock the door, and get down on your knees, and say, "Oh! I have been an ingrate; forgive me. I have often complained of business matters; forgive me. I have complained because my income is not as large as it used to be; forgive me. There are so many people in this city homeless and a-hungered; Lord, I thank Thee that Thou hast been so good to me. While there are in this city so many children crippled and sick, I thank Thee, O Lord, that Thou hast been so kind to my children—some of them on earth, some of them in heaven. Oh, God, I surrender myself to Thee now! Washed as I have been in baptismal waters, I want to experience the more holy baptism of repenting tears and the consecrating effusion of the Holy Ghost."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Value of a Bright Face.—The Rev. Dr. Fergus Fergusson in a recent address said: "Let your face shine with love to God and to men. The expression of one's countenance speaks more eloquently sometimes than words. When Murray McCheyne died, there was found on his desk an unopened letter, which proved to be from a man in Broughty Ferry, who wrote that he was converted, not by anything Mr. McCheyne had said, but 'By your look, sir, as you entered the pulpit.' Christ's joy should be in all who love and serve Him. 'Let the children of Zion be joyful in their King.' 'Rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say, Rejoice.'"

Visit to an Aged Cameronian.—Mr. Noble related: "I was visiting an old Cameronian in Scotland who was lying ill. I said to him, Shall I sing you a hymn?' 'I would rather hear you sing a psalm.' So I sang a psalm, and did so during the next few visits I paid to him; but some days afterward I asked him, 'Did you ever hear the hymn, "The Crowning Day?"' 'No, I never did.' 'Well, I will sing you the last verse, "Our pain shall then be over, We'll sin and sigh no more, For the crowning day is coming by-and-by."' It had such an effect upon the old man that he forgot his prejudice against hymns, and now I sing a bit of a psalm and the whole of a hymn every time I visit. Ladies and gentlemen who can sing about 'Jesus and His love' are ever welcome at the bedsides of the sick and ailing."

In the Garret of a Dying Man.—Mr. Muir said: "I was asked to visit a young man who was dying in one of the worst courts of our city. When I entered the court and began to look about for the house, a well-known bad woman threw up her window and asked, 'Is that you, Mr. Muir?' 'Ay,' I answered. 'Who is it ye are wantin'?' she inquired. 'Biddy So-and-so,' I rejoined. 'Ah, she's away up in the garrets.' I climbed up, and found the man lying on a straw pallet. Biddy said, 'I'll never pay the priest for prayin' again. When I was well off he always prayed for me and mine because I paid him; now that I am poor he won't pray because I can't pay.' 'Why did you send for me, seeing that I am not of your religion?' 'To speak comfortable words to the poor fellow lying there.' Both man and woman were able to say 'Christ for me' in a short time, and rejoice in His salvation."

Better than Drowning Herself.—Mr. Muir said: "A young woman, one evening, came into our meeting from an open-air service which I had been conducting. I said to her, 'You are not very happy looking?' 'No, I am not happy,' she answered; 'I was just on my way to drown myself, when the singing made me stop to listen for a little. Oh, I am very unhappy.' I replied, 'Well, the devil would like you to put yourself into the river, but he does not like you to stay here, so I think you'd better stay and tell me your story.' It was the same old, old tale of a sinner's misery. She had been led astray by a plausible rascal, who, in her time of extremity, basely deserted her, though he knew that it meant ruin to her socially, and might, for all he cared, be her death spiritually. I am glad to state that she is now reclaimed from her evil life by the grace of God, and trusting her soul in the pierced hands of the Lord Jesus Christ."

Mary's Two False Props.—Mr. Lee, an Evangelist, related: "On my way to preach on one occasion I called in to see a girl who was dying. I said to her, 'Mary, what are you trusting to?' The only answer I got was a deep sigh. I repeated my question, 'Mary, what are you trusting to?' At length she replied, 'I have two things upon which I am depending.' 'What are they?' I inquired. She responded, 'I was always good to my mother, and I went to church every Sunday forenoon.' It was hard, very hard, to throw her only hope to the ground. I tried to point her to Jesus, but I had to attend the meeting before she understood the way. I returned, however, when the service was over. As I neared the house for the second time, I saw that the blinds were closed. Mary had passed away, so far as I knew, with the false hope that by her works she would be saved. Perhaps there are those here who cannot even say they have been good to their mother, or that they went to church every Sunday, should that be able to save them, though it cannot do so. 'None but Jesus can do helpless sinners good.'"

A Farmer's Prayers for a Blacksmith.—"In a quiet country village there lived a blacksmith, who was a great debater on religious subjects. Invariably he took the side against the Gospel. One old Christian farmer felt very deeply the injury which was being done by his sturdy, plausible neighbor, and one night he wrestled with God till dawn on behalf of the blacksmith. Early in the morning he saddled and mounted his horse, and went to the smithy. The blacksmith, when he saw him, was astonished, and remarked to his assistants, 'Hullo! what's up with old John this morning that he is here so early?' Before they could answer John had dismounted, and entering, he took the smith's hand, saying, while the tears streamed down his face, 'Oh, man, I have been praying for you all night.' Without giving the smith time to argue, John turned away, remounted, and rode home. 'Praying for me all night,' thought the smith; 'there must be something in it after all.' It was not long before he realized what that something was. The last I heard of the blacksmith was that he conducted the best religious meetings in the district."

The Old Leaves of Tom's Life.—The Rev. J. T. Daly narrates the following: "Two workmen were going along the road together one morning. One said to the other, 'You'll be glad to hear, Joe, that I have turned over a new leaf. I have given up the grog-shop, and intend to be a decent man in future.' 'Yes, I am glad to hear it, Tom,' was the reply; 'but what about the old leaves?' 'God is merciful and will let bygones be bygones,' said Tom. 'Then can you say that you are a saved man—that you have accepted Christ as your Saviour.' 'Not yet; I am working to that end. You know that we are told to work out our salvation.' 'Yes, Tom, but have you got it to work out? Look at that board which says, "Trespassers will be prosecuted." Now if you go over that hedge and begin working on the land you would be a trespasser; but if you get a gift of it then you can work on it as hard as you like.' 'I think that I understand you; what must I do then.' 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved,' is the command and promise. Before they reached their destination Joe was able to rejoice with Tom because he had got the salvation of Christ within to work out."

A Bridge Washed Away.—The Rev. William Bass said: "A new bridge had to be built across a deep ravine in the mountains, through which, during winter and wet seasons, a large stream of water rushed. In summer, and in dry seasons there was no water in it. After it was contracted for, a very convenient drought set in, much to the delight of the contractor and his men. It took many weeks to build, but at length, at six o'clock one evening, it was all finished except the keystone. That night the contractor said to his men, 'Men, work overtime to-night, and get in the keystone; we don't know when the storm may come.' The men replied, 'No, there's not the shadow of a cloud in the sky, to-morrow will be fine,' and they flung down their tools, and left. The contractor went home with the burden of a heavy foreboding of disaster lying on his heart. At five o'clock next morning the wind rose, the clouds gathered dark and thick, and before six o'clock a water-spout broke on the mountain-top. The ravine was flooded with water, which washed away the wooden supports of the bridge, and it fell, all for want of a keystone. Friends, have you put in the keystone into your life? or are you depending on insufficient supports which will be washed away when the storm of death assails you? Put in Christ as the keystone at once. 'He is the "precious corner-stone," and whoso believeth upon Him shall never be confounded'"

"THE WORLD TO COME."

By Rev. G. W. Pendleton, A.M.

Will be a Material Place—Is not Fulfilled by the Church—A World not Subject to Angels—World Renovated—The Eternal Abode of the Saints—Recovery of a Lost Inheritance—It Comes down out of Heaven—No Mention of its Return—Sin Absent.

FUTURE existence, in some condition, is clearly revealed in the Word of God. Mankind cannot cease to be. Immortality is one attribute of the Spirit. "The wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever." If the righteous exist—if they live on through eternal ages—they must have a place in which to exist—some substantial residence—a material abode, because, after the resurrection of the body, they will have material, substantial bodies. "In of eternal blessedness there will be ground to walk upon; scenes of luxuriance to delight the corporeal senses; the kindly intercourse of friends, having bodies such as we now wear, and faculties of perception, and thought, and mutual communication, such as we now exercise." So says Dr. Chalmers. When and where shall we find such a place? We shall find it when we shall inhabit "the world to come."

Some say that the phrase "the world to come" means only "the promised state of the Church under the Gospel, with the worship of God therein, with a special relation to the Messiah, the Author and Mediator of it." But the word of God gives no sanction to such an interpretation of the term "world," in its application to the Church, even in any condition of the Church. It certainly cannot mean the Church in its present organization, for the phrase is "a world to come," and the Church, when this was written, was already in an organized state.

Then this "world to come" is not made subject to angels, and I suppose the angels have as much to do with the Church now as they did with the Church of the old dispensation, which Paul is contrasting in the use of this phrase.

The Greek oikoumenee means

and not the Church; and a world in the future—a world that will be after the removal or renovation of this sin-cursed world. Maimonides says that "the world to come was a common phrase to designate the kingdom of the Messiah, called also the age to come, or the future age." It is the earth redeemed from the curse; the earth purified from the consequences of the fall; the earth delivered from corruption and sin—"the restitution of all things"—a perfected, glorified earth, when "all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord." The matter of which it was originally composed will continue to exist, and be used in the arrangement of "the world to come." In this new earth there will be undoubtedly a greater variety of sublime scenery than if all things had continued as they were from the beginning of the creation, and will exhibit the attributes of God in all their diversified modes of operations. The grandeur of the divine perfections will pervade "the world to come." The glory of the holy Trinity will fill it with its light and beauty. And the host of heaven will exclaim, "O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth, who has set thy glory above the heavens."

"The world to come" will be the future and

and Christ will have exclusive dominion over it. He was made for a little time lower than the angels, but will be crowned with glory and honor, and in the end it will be said, "Thou hast put down all rule, and all authority and power, and all enemies under his feet." Thus the world, which was given to the first Adam, and, in consequence of his fall, was usurped by Satan, who became the god of this world, will come into the possession of Christ, the second Adam, and His people, and He shall have "dominion from sea to sea, and from the river even unto the ends of the earth." "And the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ."

CHRIST WILL RULE

over this kingdom—the redeemed Church—in "the world to come." He will be "all in all;" all homage and glory will be ascribed to Him, and "every knee shall bow to Him, and every tongue shall confess Him Lord, to the glory of God the Father."

"The world to come," then, is simply recovering by Christ what was lost by Adam. It is the redemption of or of "the purchased possession." Some object to this view of the future state of the redeemed, for the reason that Christ promised to His disciples that "In His Father's house are many mansions;" that He would go and prepare a place for them, and come again and receive them unto Himself. But He means that He will receive them to Himself into the house of God. And the house of God, after the judgment, will be "the new earth, wherein shall dwell righteousness." "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them, and be their God." To those mansions in "the world to come" Christ will finally receive all His people—"They shall enter in through the gates into the city." "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out; and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God—new Jerusalem—out of heaven from my God." If Christ, then, has gone to prepare a place in His Father's house, where He will take them to Himself, He will bring them to that place prepared, that they may be with Him and behold His glory. This place will be "the world to come." Christ is preparing and will complete the preparation; will restore it to its primeval glory, and fill it with righteousness, and make it the habitation of the saints.

WHICH COMETH DOWN

Some object to this view of the future abode of the redeemed because Paul says, "They shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air" when He comes. But who ever believed that the air will be the eternal abode of the saints? The air is to meet the Lord when He comes, but they do not dwell there nor go up to heaven again, but return to the earth. The Bible positively declares that they shall reign with Christ "on the earth." That in the last days the New Jerusalem shall come down from God out of heaven, and where in the Bible do we read of its return again to heaven?

This view of the future state of God's people makes the place of their future existence so real, that faith has something substantial on which to rest. It makes heaven an evident reality. Dr. Chalmers says: "By the convulsions of the last day materialism may be shaken and broken down from its present arrangements;" but "out of the ruins of this second chaos may another heaven and another earth be made to rise; and a new materialism, with other aspects of magnificence and beauty, emerge from the wreck of this mighty transformation; and the world (to come) be peopled as before with the varieties of material loveliness, and space be again lighted up into a firmament of material splendor." We shall walk forever in a land replenished with sensible delights and sensible glories, in "the new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." "There will be a firm earth, as we have at present, and a heaven stretched over it, as we have at present; and it is not by the absence of these, but by that the abode of immortality will be characterized." Tholuck says, "The idea that the perfected kingdom of Christ is to be transferred to heaven is properly a modern notion. According to Paul and the Revelation of John, the kingdom of God is placed upon the earth."

And now, if the glory of God fills the earth, there will be no place for sin, moral evil, and death. There is no connection, necessarily, between sin and materialism. In "the world to come" sin may be done away forever, and materialism be perpetuated in the full bloom and vigor of immortality. On everything in that world will be written "holiness to the Lord."

The coming of "the world to come" will be the reign of Christ. He will be King over all the earth. "All kings shall bow before Him, and all nations shall serve Him."

Such will be the final abode and future home of the righteous in "the world to come." This is the end of all things in the present economy. There is nothing beyond but ages to come, or eternity.

THE LIVINGSTONE MISSION TRANSFERRED TO AMERICA.

THE circumstances under which the direction of the Livingstone Mission has been transferred to the American Baptist Missionary Society were described on July 3d by Mrs. H. Grattan Guinness, who with her devoted husband, has heretofore managed its affairs. The following is the interesting statement prepared by Mrs. Guinness and read by her husband at a meeting of the friends of the Mission:

"Many of our friends will be surprised to learn that the Congo Mission is about to be transferred to new management; we wish to explain the reasons for the step, and what are likely to be its results. This Mission, founded in 1877, is one of the seven important central African Missions established since the death of Livingstone. Its plan was to evangelize by means of industrial Mission stations the tribes and nations occupying the vast basin of the Congo River, and constituting at that time an almost unknown world, equalling in area the whole United States this side of the Rocky Mountains. The Mission was in connection with no large society. Its original council was a very small one, and though some of its members were most liberal, the demands of the Mission soon surpassed its resources. We were then led to assume the sole financial responsibility, and undertook the management of the Mission in connection with our own institute. For the last four or five years the Lord has through the liberality of His people enabled us to meet the large demands which the support and the development of the enterprise have involved, though the physical, financial, social, and moral obstacles at first were very great. The climate of the country proved trying and fatal to Europeans, and the difficulties, dangers, and expenses of travelling and transport were immense.

"Fifty brethren and sisters in all have been sent out on the staff, and yet it consists to-day of only six and twenty. This may give some idea of the large amount of apparently fruitless outlay necessitated by work in such an unhealthy country. In spite, however, of a legion of difficulties, the Livingstone Inland Mission has nobly made its way, carried out its original programme, and planted Mission stations at intervals through three or four hundred miles of country right into the interior. The terrible preliminary difficulties have been overcome, the heavy initiatory expenses met, the first-fruits of the harvest reaped, much precious and costly experience gained, and the Mission occupies to-day a position which we hardly dared to hope, when we commenced, it could attain so soon. The important Belgian expedition is thoroughly friendly to it; the King of the Belgians himself is warmly interested in it, and Mr. Stanley most kindly doing all he can to help it forward.

"That the approaching transfer of the Livingstone Inland Mission to the American Baptist Missionary Union will be for the good of the Mission we are thoroughly persuaded. It has so grown and developed that it can no longer be managed as a subsidiary branch of our East London Institute for Home and Foreign Missions. We had for some time been prayerfully considering the best course to take, when a year ago we received an intimation that the American Baptist Missionary Union was looking out for a good opening in Central Africa, feeling it was their special duty, as having a large constituency of colored churches, to do something for the evangelization of the negro's neglected fatherland. We communicated with the secretary and have had correspondence since. After twelve months of negotiation this society has just informed us of their glad and unanimous resolution to adopt and vigorously prosecute the Livingstone Inland Mission. Dr. Murdock, of Boston, Mass., Secretary of this Board, and Dr. Crane, a member of the Executive Committee of the Board, came over to examine into the nature and working of the Mission last Christmas; after a week's pleasant intercourse, they returned to Boston, and placed their report, first before the Executive Committee, then the Board, at their great annual meeting. A few weeks since we received from Dr. Murdock the brief cablegram, 'Board approves,' followed by a letter stating that with hearty unanimity and satisfaction the managers at their annual meeting reached this important conclusion. We are now waiting to receive from the Executive Committee information as to the practical details of the annual transfer.

"I should add that all our council as well as all our missionary brethren on the Congo approve the course we have taken, and feel that it will be for the good of the Mission. The American Board takes over the staff as it stands, together with all the stations, steamers, and property of the Mission, which, though it will not in future be as in the past undenominational, will still be conducted in that spirit of largehearted charity which recognizes that the essential point on which Christians are agreed are much more important than the non-essential points on which they differ. As it happens, many if not most of the members of the staff of the Livingstone Inland Mission hold Baptist views, and the only other Mission in the country is that of the English Baptist Missionary Society. We were partly guided in this matter by the conviction that it would not be wise to introduce a second denomination into the field. If it be objected that it is a pity to hand over to Americans that which has cost so much English life and treasure, we reply, what does it matter by whom work is done, if only it be done, and done well? Neither we nor the council of the Livingstone Inland Mission, nor the friends who have so liberally sustained it for the last seven years, had any personal, denominational, or national object in view. Our sole end and aim was to do good to men, and obey Christ, by proclaiming His Gospel among the fifty millions of the Congo country. If we have secured this, is not our object attained? And if Christ and His great salvation will be proclaimed further and more widely by this Mission, under American management, than it could have been under our own, surely we have cause for nothing but joy and thanksgiving. We shall continue to correspond with the missionaries on the Congo, to keep open house for them on their return on furlough, or on sick leave, and we shall hope in every way to facilitate their new work by rendering to our American friends all the aid in our power. We shall still gladly act as an auxiliary association, by forwarding to Boston the contributions of those who wish to continue to help the Mission, or by supplying volunteers for the work when needed.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Decrease in the Number of Immigrants received last month is reported as compared with the figures of the corresponding month of last year of 17,020. This year the number for the month was 82,581. The following are their nationalities: 28,279 from Germany, 14,163 from Ireland, 6735 from England and Wales, 5800 from Canada, 5456 from Sweden, 4368 from Norway, 3405 from Italy, 2424 from Austria, 1928 from Denmark, 1819 from Russia, 1589 from Bohemia, 1303 from Hungary, 1260 from Switzerland, 1268 from Poland, 989 from Scotland, 760 from the Netherlands, 336 from France, 123 from Belgium, and 680 in lesser numbers from all other countries.

The Prohibition National Convention Assembled at Pittsburg, Penn., on July 23d. Professor Samuel Dickey, of Michigan, presided. The representation from the various States was: Alabama, 2; California, 23; Connecticut, 2; Illinois, 45; Maine, 3; Kansas, 17; Kentucky, 6; Michigan, 56; Nebraska, 3; Dakota, 1; Ohio, 34; New Jersey, 18; Maryland, 16; New York, 75; Missouri, 10; Tennessee, 12; Texas, 10; Pennsylvania, 58, and Wisconsin, 55. Total, 446. Before the roll of States was called, the preference for ex-Governor St. John, of Kansas, as the candidate for the Presidency, was so decidedly manifested that a motion was made to nominate him by acclamation. It was, however, deemed best to proceed regularly. Gideon T. Stewart, of Ohio, the Hon. James Black, of Pennsylvania, and Dr. R. H. McDonald, of California, withdrew their names, and John P. St. John was unanimously nominated. The Hon. William Daniel, of Maryland, was nominated for the Vice-presidency. The platform adopted arraigns the Republican and Democratic parties and the Republican candidates by name for encouraging the liquor traffic, advocates the election of government officers by the people instead of their appointment by the president; demands the abolition of the duties on alcohols, liquors, and tobacco; says that "custom duties should be levied for the support of government economically administered, and when so levied, the fostering of American labor, manufactures, and industries should be constantly held in view;" that public lands should be held for homes for the people and not for gifts to corporations; repudiates as un-American the exclusion of any people from residence or citizenship; protests against any territory being admitted to the family of States until it has declared against the liquor traffic and polygamy, and expresses its belief in the political equality of the sexes and the right of women to the ballot. The convention, by a vote of 223 to 156, decided to change the name of the party from the Prohibition Home Protection Party to that of the Prohibition Party.

John P. St. John, the Candidate of the Prohibition party for the Presidency, was born at Brockville, Franklin County, Ind., on February 25th, 1833. He had a Christian mother, whose teachings and character he often speaks of with filial veneration. His schooldays were brief, and such education as he acquired was principally gained in the evenings, when, tired with a hard day's work on the farm, he pored over borrowed books by the light of the fire. The demon of liquor desolated the boy's home; the father fell under its power, and young St. John, while still a boy, had to go away from home to earn his living. He went to California, where he took any work that offered, sometimes mining, sometimes working on steamboats. He served in the Indian wars of 1852 and 1853, in which he was wounded. He had been studying law by himself, but in 1860 he entered a law office at Charlton, Ill., first as clerk and afterward as partner. He volunteered on the outbreak of the war, and served in the Sixty-eighth Illinois, rising from private to lieutenant-colonel. At the close of the war he settled at Independence, Mo., removing to Kansas in 1869. Three years later he was elected to the State Senate, and in 1878 was elected Governor of the State and was re-elected in 1880. It was under his administration that the Constitutional amendment in that State was passed. St. John did not seek the nomination for the Presidency, and had, in fact, declined it in advance; but the unanimity with which it was made imposes an obligation upon him which he will do his utmost to fulfil. "Looking to God for His guidance," he says, "I shall try to do my duty." His nomination is likely to bring out the whole strength of the Prohibition party, which polled only 10,305 votes in 1880, under Neal Dow, who is now in a position congenial to him as a worker for Mr. Blaine.

The Adjourned Convention of the Independent Republicans was held in New York on July 22d, to decide upon a course of action in the Presidential election. This was the meeting for which arrangements were made at the conference held on June 17th, when the uncertainty about the Democratic nominations rendered decision premature. At the conference last week California was represented by 1 delegate; Colorado by 1; Connecticut, 28; Delaware, 2; Georgia, 1; Illinois, 2; Louisiana, 5; Missouri, 2; Michigan, 1; Maryland, 2; Massachusetts, 84; New Jersey, 33; Pennsylvania, 19; Rhode Island, 6; Vermont, 1, and New York, 273, of whom the city furnished 168. The convention unanimously agreed to support Governor Cleveland for the Presidency and to work for his election by separate organization and not in conjunction with the Democrats. The following is the most important of the other resolutions passed: "Upon the practical questions of tariff and finance, and other questions upon which both parties are divided within themselves, we also are divided in opinion. We shall vote, therefore, in the choice of Representatives and other officers, according to our individual opinions of their political views and their personal character."

The Re-opening of the Investigation into the loss of the Proteus is strongly urged. Now that Lieutenant Greely and the survivors of the expedition are on their way home, there are new opportunities, which did not exist when the court sat, for getting at the truth respecting the disastrous voyage of the Proteus. The failure of that expedition was the subject of the inquiry. The court declared that Hazen's "grave errors and omissions either directly led or largely contributed to" that failure, but declined to recommend that Hazen should be court-martialed. If the Proteus expedition had accomplished the purpose intended, eighteen lives at least would have been saved. It is only fair that a properly constituted court should declare who was responsible for that lamentable loss of life.

The Creditors of the Grant & Ward Firm have received some encouragement from a statement recently made by the official receiver, whose schedules, as filed, caused gloomy apprehension. The receiver says the schedules were necessarily imperfect. The $16,000,000 of liabilities do not represent utter emptiness. A large number of the creditors are secured, and the amounts which they realize on their securities will do much to reduce the actual liabilities of the firm. Many have realized already, and the total amount realized will not fall below twelve million dollars. The receiver speaks in the highest terms of Mr. Ward's kindness and courtesy to him in his work. Although Mr. Ward was made the scapegoat in the affair, and an invidious distinction was made between him and his partners, he has displayed no resentment, but has assisted the receiver to the utmost extent of his power. But for his aid the receiver would have been unable to trace out the ownership of the securities or unravel the intricacies of the firm's transactions.

An Important Division has Arisen among the temperance workers of Indiana on the question of political action. Two separate conventions were held at Indianapolis on July 24th, representing the two sections of the Prohibition party. One convention favored the nomination of a State ticket, while the other convention favored consolidated action, looking to the election of members of the Legislature favorable to the calling of a convention for a new State Constitution, as provided in the platform of the Republican party, leaving all persons free to vote as they pleased on the general ticket, and without antagonizing either of the existing parties. Efforts were made to harmonize the conventions, but without success. The candidate for the Governorship nominated by the first-mentioned body is R. S. Dwiggins, a banker and lawyer of Jasper County.

A Bronze Statue of the Late Hon. William E. Dodge is to be erected in New York at the cost of a few citizens, who knew the value of the work performed by the eminent philanthropist and the genuineness of his character. The statue will cost $25,000. It will be erected at the intersection of Broadway and Sixth Avenue, which is bounded on the north by Thirty-fifth Street. It will face to the south, and have a somewhat elaborate pedestal, with a drinking fountain and partly surrounding bench. These will be of polished red granite. On the front face of the pedestal will be placed the fountain. Water will pour from a lion's mouth into the upper of two basins. The statue will show Mr. Dodge standing by a low fluted column on which the right arm leans, the hand being clasped in natural action with the left one. The head will be bare. The statue will be eight feet high. The railing which surrounds at present the small piece of ground will be taken away and the grass plot arranged to suit the design of the architect.

The Christian Commission Reunion Will be held at Ocean Grove, N. J., on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, August 1st, 2d, and 3d. The invitation includes all Army Workers of the Christian Commission, Sanitary Commission, and Army and Navy Chaplains, North and South. A circular invitation signed by Messrs. George H. Stuart, Clinton B. Fisk, John O. Foster, and others, has been issued.

"I Need your Paper," Writes a Colored preacher in North Carolina, to whom the kindness of our friends last year enabled us to send it, and who laments that the year covered by the subscription has expired. "We have few books among us, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has been a light in a dark place for many families, for it has been lent around until completely worn out." This good colored brother says he is unable to subscribe for himself, which can be easily credited when it is known that his congregation are poor men, the best of whom earns only forty cents a day, and they can afford to pay him only sixty dollars a year salary and board. Similar letters are received from the other colored preachers, describing in grateful words the benefits they derived during the past year from the weekly visit of the paper, with its two sermons and its supply of illustrations for Gospel teaching. They testify to the way God has used it as a blessing to them and to the congregations that look to them for religious instruction. We cheerfully comply with the suggestion made to us from many quarters to open again this year the Colored Preachers' Fund, and we will acknowledge any subscriptions sent to it, either here or by mail, as donors may direct.

The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union will hold its tenth anniversary at Chautauqua, N. Y., on August 15th and 16th, under the presidency of Miss Frances E. Willard, President of the Union. Meetings will be held at eleven A.M., two P.M., and half past seven each day; addresses will be delivered by Mrs. Emily McLaughlin, of Boston, Mass.; Mrs. J. F. Willing, of Chicago, Ill.; Mrs. Mary T. Lathrop, of Michigan; Mrs. M. H. Hunt, of Boston, Mass.; and Mrs. Sallie F. Chapin, of South Carolina. Full particulars may be obtained by addressing Mrs. Caroline B. Buell, 16 East Fourteenth Street, New York.

Mrs. M. F. Shipman is Conducting a Fourteen days revival mission at Irwin, Westmoreland County, Penn., with marked success. The mission she recently closed at Hountydale resulted in a large accession to the membership of the churches there. Notwithstanding the excessive heat, all the meetings were crowded, as were the Gospel Temperance meetings Mrs. Shipman held at the conclusion of the revival services. Mrs. Shipman expects to sail for Europe about August 13th

Mr. John A. Condit, under whose Leadership the first band of American missionaries will leave in September for the Congo Valley, Africa, is now arranging for a short tour, so that he may present the claims of that great field to a few of the Christians of America, and tell the interesting story of its people, natural features, missionary incidents, etc. Any pastors desiring to secure his services (which he renders free) may address him at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office.

The Annual Faith-Cure Convention, Conducted by Dr. Cullis, will not be held this year at Old Orchard, but in the White Mountains, on the slope of Bartlett Mountain, about two miles from North Conway, N. H. The Rev. D. Pratt is now on the ground superintending the erection of cottages, which he announces himself ready to have completed twenty days after receipt of order. Visitors may, however, bring their own tents. Board and lodging can be obtained at present at $1.50 a day. The convention will commence on August 20th and continue until August 28th. A visitor writes to correct a misapprehension as to the convention. He says: "It will be composed of Christians who come together for the quickening of their spiritual life; and the doctrine which is continually preached from the platform, and from the experiences of individual Christians, is that of a living Saviour, mighty to save His people from their sins. That such a Saviour accepted in His fulness can also heal the bodies of His people seems to follow so much as a matter of course that it is hardly thought of or spoken of as a separate doctrine, but rather accepted as a part of the power for service included in the promise: 'Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you.'"

The Seaside Assembly of Ministers and Sunday-school workers at Key East, N. J., propose to found a permanent institution similar to the Chautauqua Assembly, but of broader scope. Mr. Edward Bachelor has donated a block of ground worth $20,000 to the association. The plan set forth embraces an art department, and also departments of music, ancient and modern languages, elocution and oratory, modern science, in its relation to modern thought; a department of Christian philosophy, and a normal Sunday-school department. The Rev. James A. Worden, D.D., of Princeton, N. J., is Superintendent of Instruction. Other eminent clergymen are interested in the project, and have promised to assist in various departments.

Ben Hogan, the Converted Pugilist, has been laboring at Livingston, Montana. The Tribune of that city, after describing him as he was prior to his conversion, and dwelling upon his unregenerate triumphs, says: "Ben Hogan as a reformed man, a temperate Christian gentleman, is now as thoroughly enlisted on the side of right and reformation. He seems in earnest, evinces a determination to do good, and in his efforts in this diametric course is meeting with excellent success.

The Chicago Meeting to Promote the Observance of the Sabbath in that city, held June 15th, was of a most encouraging character. Farwell Hall was crowded by an earnest and attentive audience. Addresses were delivered by pastors of several German churches of the city and by Rev. Dr. Arthur Little, of the New England Congregational Church. Dr. Little claimed that two thirds of the Germans in Chicago were in sympathy with the meeting, and stated that the church accommodations for Germans in the city far exceed those for Americans. It is stated that the project of opening the parks on the west and south sides for Sunday races will be abandoned.

The Sabbath Committee of New York is making efforts to reduce the labors now demanded of railroad employés on Sunday. A disposition has been manifest on the part of the directors to make concessions to the requests of the committee, providing the movement includes all the lines. The committee is now endeavoring to arrange the details of united action in this matter. The managers of the lines admit that the present Sunday labor is needlessly large, and one of the presidents says decidedly: "In my judgment, the necessity, so much urged, does not exist, nor do the public demand from railroad management more work than ordinary labor. Railroad men have a right to rest one day in seven and to observe the Sabbath as much as any other of our fellow-citizens."

Dangerous Dust in the Air is Circulated by the elevated railroads in New York. A member of the staff of The Scientific American was noticed last week flourishing a large magnet about, in Sixth and Third avenues. Being asked what he was doing, he explained that he was testing the floating matter in the air. He hung the magnet under the track of the elevated road, and when a few minutes later he took it down, it was coated with minute particles of iron dust. This dust, he said, is the cause of many severe cases of eye troubles. The swift passing trains grind off showers of iron particles, which often fall or are blown into the eyes of pedestrians. The microscope shows that the particles are of innumerable shapes, and they usually have jagged fringes, and many of them have barbs like a fish hook. When lodged in the eye they cannot be attracted therefrom with a magnet, but a gouge-shaped instrument the size of a sewing needle had been devised for the purpose. This peculiarity of the dust resembles that of moral evil. When once it finds a lodgment in the human system it cannot be withdrawn without difficulty and suffering (Ps. 38 : 3, 4).

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHÆA.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Joseph of Arimathæa, an honorable counsellor, which also waited for the Kingdom of God, came, and went in boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus. And he bought fine linen, and took him down, and wrapped him in the linen, and laid him in a sepulchre which was hewn out of a rock, and rolled a stone unto the door of the sepulchre."—MARK 15 : 43-46.

IT was a very dark day with the Church of God and with the cause of Christ; for the Lord Jesus was dead, and so the sun of their souls had set. "All the disciples forsook Him, and fled." "Ye shall be scattered, every man to his own, and shall leave me alone," were the sad words of Jesus, and they had come true. He was dead upon the cross, and His enemies hoped that there was an end of Him, while His friends feared that it was even so. A few women who had remained about the cross, true to the very last, were found faithful unto death; but what could they do to obtain His sacred body and give it honorable burial? That priceless flesh seemed to be in danger of the fate which usually awaited the bodies of malefactors; at any rate, the fear was that it might be hurled into the first grave that could be found to shelter it.

At that perilous moment Joseph of Arimathæa, a city of the Jews, of whom we never heard before, and of whom we never hear again, suddenly made his appearance. He was for the occasion, a man of influence, a man possessing that kind of influence which was most potent with Pilate—a rich man, a counsellor, a member of the Sanhedrim, a person of weight and character. Every evangelist mentions him and tells us something about him, and from these we learn that he was a disciple, "a good man and a just; who also himself waited for the kingdom of God." Joseph had been retiring, and probably cowardly before; but now he came to the cross, and saw how matters stood, and then went in boldly unto Pilate, craved the body of Jesus, and obtained it.

Let us learn from this that God will always have His witnesses. It matters not though the ministry should forsake the truth, though they that should be leaders should become recreant, the truth of God will not fail for lack of friends. It may be with the Church as when a standard-bearer fainteth and the host is ready to melt with dismay; but there shall be found other standard-bearers, and the banner of the Lord shall wave over all. As the Lord liveth, so shall His truth live; as God reigneth, so shall the Gospel reign, even though it be from the cross. "Tell it out among the heathen that the Lord reigneth from the tree." Such is a singular version of a verse in the Psalms, and it contains

A CLORIOUS TRUTH.

Even while Jesus hangeth on the cross in death He is still keeping possession of the throne, and He shall reign forever and ever. Let this be remembered for your encouragement in the cloudy and dark day. If you live in any place where the faithful fail from among men, do not wring your hands in grief and sit down in despair, as though it was all over with the cause you love. The Lord liveth, and He will yet keep a faithful seed alive in the earth. We need not worry our heads about who is to succeed the pastors and evangelists of to-day; the apostolical succession we may safely leave with our God. Concerning this Joseph of Arimathæa, the honorable counsellor, I want to speak this morning, praying that I may speak to your souls all along.

I. First, I desire to look at Joseph of Arimathæa as

OUR WARNING.

He was a disciple of Christ, but secretly, for fear of the Jews; we do not advise any one of you to imitate Joseph in that. Fear which leads us to conceal our faith is an evil thing. Be a disciple by all means, but not secretly; you miss a great part of your life's purpose if you are. Above all, do not be a disciple secretly because of the fear of man; for the fear of man bringeth a snare. If you are the slave of such fear it demeans you, belittles you, and prevents your giving due glory to God.

"Fear Him, ye saints, and you will then Have nothing else to fear."

Be careful to give honor to Christ and He will take care of your honor.

Why was it that Joseph of Arimathæa was so backward? Perhaps it was owing to his natural disposition. Many men are by nature very bold; some are a little too much so, for they become intrusive, self-assertive, not to say impudent. I have heard of a certain class of persons who "rush in where angels fear to tread." They are fearless because they are brainless. Let us avoid fault in that direction. Many, on the other hand, are too retiring; they have to screw their courage up even to say a good word for the Saviour whom they love. If they can do so they fall into the rear rank; they hope to be found among the victors when they divide the spoil, but they are not over-ambitious to be among the warriors while they are braving the foe.

Some of these are true-hearted notwithstanding their timidity. It was found in the martyr days that certain of those who endured most bravely at the stake were naturally of a fearful mind. It is noted by Foxe that some who boasted of how well they could bear pain and death for Christ turned tail and recanted; while others who in prison trembled at the thought of the fire, played the man in death, to the admiration of all that were round about them. Still, dear friends, it is not a desirable thing if you are troubled with timidity to foster it at all.

I am afraid, too, that what helped to intimidate Joseph of Arimathæa was the fact that he was

A RICH MAN.

A sad truth lies within our Lord's solemn exclamation, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God." Riches do not strengthen the heart, or make men daring for the good cause. The fishermen of the Galilean Lake readily left their bits of boats, and their fishing-tackle; but Joseph of Arimathæa was a rich man, and was therefore slow to leave all for Christ's sake. Take care, any of you that are well-to-do in this world, that you do not permit the liberality of God to be a cause of disloyalty to Him. Beware of the pride of life, the lust for rank, the desire to hoard; for any of these may prevent your service of your Lord. Riches puff men up, and prevent their stooping to find the pearl of great price. Joseph of Arimathæa's wealth made him unduly cautious; and possibiy, without his knowing it, prevented his casting in his lot with the common sort of people who followed the Lord Jesus. His heart was for the prize, but the heavy weight of his substance hindered him in his race; it was an instance of abounding grace that he was helped to run well at the last.

Possibly, too, he may have been checked by the fact that

and that he was honorable in it. It needs great grace to carry human honor; and, truth to tell, it is not particularly much worth carrying when you have it. For what is fame but the breath of men's nostrils? Poor stuff to feed a soul upon! If a man could so live as to gain universal plaudits, if he could write his name athwart the sky in letters of gold, what of it all? What is there in the applause of a thoughtless multitude? The approbation of good men, if it be gained by persevering virtue, is better to be desired than great riches; but even then it may become a temptation; for the man may begin to question rather, What will people say? than, What will God say? and the moment he falls into that mood he has introduced a weakening element into his life.

I would lovingly inquire of you at this time (for the sermon is meant to be personal all the way through) if any of you who love my Lord and Master are doing so secretly because of the fear of men. You have never openly confessed your faith, and why not? What doth hinder your taking up a decided position on the Lord's side? Are you wealthy? Are you honorable? Do you occupy an enviable position in society?

Can it be so, that, because God has dealt so well with you, and trusted you so generously, you will repay Him by denying His Son, violating your conscience, and turning your back on truth; and all for the sake of being in the fashion? I charge all concealed believers to think over the inconsistency of their concealment and to quit that cowardly condition.

I feel sure that Joseph of Arimathæa was a great for you see, he did not live with Jesus, as many other disciples did. During that brief but golden period in which men walked and talked, and ate and drank with Jesus, Joseph was not with Him. He was not among the twelve, as possibly he might have been if he had possessed more courage and decision. He lost many of those familiar talks with which the Lord indulged His own after the multitudes had been sent away. He missed that sacred training and strengthening which fitted men for the noble lives of primitive saints. How many opportunities he must have missed, too, of working for the Master and with the Master! Perhaps we hear no more of him because he had done no more. Possibly that one grand action which has redeemed his name from forgetfulness, is all that is recorded because it really was all that was worth recording. Joseph must have been a weaker, a sadder, a less useful man for having followed Christ afar off.

II. Secondly, having viewed Joseph of Arimathæa as a warning, I shall go on to speak of him as a lesson for our instruction. Joseph did come out after all; and so will you, my friends. If you are honest and sincere, you will have to avow your Lord sooner or later. Do you not think it would be better to make it sooner rather than later?

THE DAY WILL COME

when that shame which you are now dreading will be yours. As surely as you are a sincere believer, you will have to encounter that reproach and derision which now alarm you; why not face them at once and get it over? You will have to confess Christ before many witnesses, why not begin to do so at once? What is the hardship of it? It will come easier to you, and it will bring you a larger blessing, and it will be sweeter in the recollection afterward, than if you keep on postponing it.

What was it that fetched Joseph of Arimathæa out? It was the power of the cross! Is it not a remarkable thing that all the life of Christ did not draw out an open avowal from this man? Our Lord's miracles, His marvellous discourses, His poverty, and self-renunciation, His glorious life of holiness and benevolence, all may have helped to build up Joseph in his secret faith, but it did not suffice to develop in him of faith. The shameful death of the cross had greater power over Joseph than all the beauty of Christ's life. Now let us see, you timid, backward ones, whether the cross will not have the same influence over you to-day. I believe it will if you carefully study it.

I do not suppose he fully understood the design of our Lord's death; he had some knowledge of it, but not such a knowledge as we have now that the Spirit of God has appeared in all His fulness, and taught us

THE MEANING OF THE CROSS.

Oh, listen, sirs, ye that are not upon His side openly, ye that have never worn His livery, nor manifestly entered on His service. He died for you! Those wounds were all for you; that bloody sweat, of which you still may see the marks upon the countenance of the Crucified, was all for you. For you the thirst and fever, for you the bowing of the head, and the giving up of the ghost; and can you be ashamed to own Him? Will you not endure rebuke and scorn for His dear sake who bore all this for you? The cross is a wondrous magnet, drawing to Jesus every man of the true metal. It is as a banner lifted on high, to which all who are loyal must rally. This fiery cross, carried through all lands, will rouse the valiant and speed them to the field. Can you see your Lord suffering to the death for you, and then turn your backs? I pray you may no longer hesitate, but may at once cry, "Set down my name among His followers; for I will fight it out even to the end. Thus much by way of instruction taken from the life of Joseph of Arimathæa. If the cross does not bring a man out, what will? If the spectacle of dying love does not quicken us into courageous affection for Him, what can?

III. So I have to mention, in the third place, something for our arousing. Perhaps you are saying in your heart that the season in which Joseph lived was one which imperatively demanded that he should leave his hiding-place and should go in to Pilate, but that you are under no such constraint. Hearken, friends; many people are not true to their occasions, whatever they may be; they do not consider that they have come to the kingdom for such a time as this. The Lord Jesus is not hanging on a cross to-day needing to be buried; but other stern necessities exist, and call for your exertions. This hour's necessities imperiously demand that every man who is right at heart should acknowledge his Lord and do Him service. Every man that loves Christ should at this hour prove it by his actions.

A buoy off the Mumbles in South Wales bears a bell which is meant to warn mariners of a dangerous rock. This bell is quiet enough in ordinary weather; but when the winds are out, and the great waves rush in toward the shore, its solemn tones are heard for miles around as it swings to and fro in the hands of the sea. I believe there are true men who are silent when everything is calm, who will be forced to speak when the wild winds are out. Permit me to assure you that a storm is raging now, and it is growing worse and worse. If I rightly read it is meet that every bell should ring out its warning note lest souls be lost upon the rocks of error. You that have fallen behind because the fighting did not seem to require you, must quit your positions of ease. I summon you in the Master's name to the war. The Lord hath need of you. If you come not to His help against the mighty a curse will light upon you. Ye must either be written across the back as craven cowards, or else you will to-day solemnly espouse the cause of Jesus. Shall I tell you why?

I will tell you why Joseph was wanted, and that was, just because Christ's enemies had at last gone too far. When they hunted Him about and took up stones to stone Him they went a very long way; when they said He had a devil and was mad they went much too far; when they asserted that He cast out devils by Beelzebub, the prince of the devils, that was a piece of blasphemy; but now, now they have overstepped the line most fatally; they have actually taken the King of Israel and nailed Him up to a cross, and He is dead; and therefore Joseph cannot stand it any longer. He quits their company and joins himself to the Lord Jesus. See how far men are going in these days. In the outside world we have infidelity of so gross, so brutish, a character, that it is unworthy of the civilization, much less of the Christianity, of our age. Now, ye fearful ones, come out, and refuse to be numbered with the unbelieving world.

THE CITADEL ATTACKED.

Besides, in the outward Christian Church we see men who, having already taken away every doctrine that we hold dear, are now assailing the inspiration of God's own Word. They tell us plainly that they do not believe what the Scriptures say further than they choose to do. The Bible to them is a fine book, but rather out of date. Now, if you can be quiet, I cannot. The citadel of Christendom is now attacked. Let no brave man shrink from its defence. If you can hold your tongues, and see the faith rent to pieces, I cannot. Why, it is enough to make every man gird on his weapon and rush to the fight. Since they push error to extremes, it becomes us to hold by every particle of the faith. I will not, for my own part, give up a corner of my creed for any man. Even if we might have been prepared to modify expressions had the age been different, we are not in that mood now. A generation of vipers shall have a naked file to bite at. We will modify nothing. If truth bears a stern aspect we will not veil it. If there be an offence in the cross we will not conceal it. This shall be my answer to those who would have us attune ourselves to the spirit of the age—I know no Spirit but one, and He is unchanging in every age.

When Joseph of Arimathæa revealed himself as our Lord's disciple, our Lord's friends had mostly fled—we might almost say they had all departed. Then Joseph said, "I will go in and beg for the body." When everybody else runs away, then and often have I noticed it, that when there has been a wide desertion from the faith, then the feeble have become strong. Those poor souls who had said, "We hardly know whether we are the people of God at all, we are so unworthy," have crept out of their dens and have waxed valiant in fight, putting to flight the armies of the aliens. A sister was asked to tell her experience before the Church, and she could not do it; but as she went away she turned round and said, "I cannot speak for Christ, but I could die for Him." "Come back," said the minister, "you are welcome here!" They do gloriously, those hidden ones, in days whereof we are apt to fear that no witness for the truth will remain alive. Oh, that you who live where religion is declining may be all the more resolved to serve the Lord Jesus faithfully!

A FRIEND IN NEED.

And then, you know, in Joseph's time the people that were true to the Lord Jesus were such a feeble company. Those that were not absolutely poor—the women that could minister to Him of their substance—were nevertheless unable to go in unto Pilate and beg for the Lord's body. He would not have received them, and if he would they were too timid to have sought an interview; but Joseph is rich, and a counsellor, and therefore he seemed to say, "These dear good women need a friend; they cannot get that precious body down from the cross alone. I will go to the Roman governor. Together with Nicodemus, I will provide the linen and the spices, and the women shall help us take Jesus down from the tree and lay Him in my new tomb, and swathe His limbs in linen and spices, so as to embalm Him honorably."

Some of you live in country towns where those who are faithful to God are very poor, and have not much ability among them. If anything should move you to be the more decided, it should be that fact. It is a brave thing to help a feeble company; any common people will follow at the heels of success, but the true man is not ashamed of a despised cause when it is the cause of truth. You who have talent and substance should say, "I will go and help them now. I cannot leave the Master's cause to this feeble folk. I know they do their best, and as that is little, I will join them and lay myself out to aid them for my great Master's sake."

Can you not see my drift? My only desire this morning is to induce any of you who have for a moment faltered to "stand up, stand up for Jesus," and everywhere, in every place as wisdom may suggest, avow His dear and sacred name.

IV. Lastly, there is something in this subject for our guidance. Somebody says, "Well, what do you mean by my coming out? I can see what Joseph did; what am I to do? I do not live at Arimathæa, and there is no Pilate in these days." Joseph in owning his Lord put himself under

PERSONAL RISK.

A Christian slave, whose master was executed for being a Christian, went to the judge, and begged the body of his master that he might bury it. The judge replied, "Wherefore do you wish for your master's body?" "Because He was a Christian, and I am one." Upon this confession he was himself condemned to die. It might have been so with Pilate; for the Jewish rulers must have hated Joseph and longed for his death. He had been backward a long time, but now he put his life in his hand, and went in boldly to Pilate.

We read, "He craved the body of Jesus;" but, as a commentator well says, he was not a craven, though he craved the body. He simply asked for it, begged for it, implored to have it, and the procurator yielded to his wish. Now, do you think that if it were needful for you to jeopardize your best earthly interests for Christ, you could do it? Could you lose your character for culture and courage by avowing the old faith in these apostate days? Can you leave all for Jesus? Should it rend the fondest connection, should it break up the brightest prospects, could you take up the cross and follow your Lord? It is due to Him who died for you that you should count the cost, and reckon it little enough for His dear sake if you may but do Him honor.

Remember, again, that this good man, Joseph of Arimathæa, when he took the body of Jesus, brought upon himself ceremonial pollution. It may seem little enough to you, but to a Jew it was a great deal, especially during the Passover week. He handled that blessed body, and defiled himself in the judgment of the Jews. But, oh, I warrant you he did not think it any defilement to touch the blessed person of his Lord, even when the life was gone out of that matchless frame. And then, this man having risked his life, and given up his honor, was content to be at great cost for the burial of Christ. He went and bought the fine linen; and that rock-hewn sepulchre which it was the ambition of every Israelite to possess, he cheerfully resigned, that the Lord might lie there. Now, whenever you do own Christ, own Him practically. Do not keep back your purse from Him, or think that you are to say, "I am His," and do nothing for Him.

I was reading the story of

in Maine, in America, who came in to a meeting after there had been a missionary collection. The minister there and then asked "our good brother Sewell" to pray. Sewell did not pray, but thrust his hand in his pocket and stood fumbling about. "Bring the box," he said; and when the box came, and he had put his money into it, the minister said, "Brother Sewell, I did not ask you to give anything, I only wished you to pray." "Oh," said he, "I could not pray till I had first given something." He felt obliged first to do something for the great mission work, and having done that he could pray for it. Oh, that all Christ's people felt the justice of that course of conduct! Is it not most natural and proper? Joseph could not, when the Saviour wanted burying, have been true to Him without burying Him. And now that the Saviour does not want burying, but wants in all His living power to be preached among the sons of men, if we love Him we must do all that lieth in us to spread the knowledge of His name.

COME OUT

then, come out then, ye that are hidden among the stuff! Some of you strangers from the country, who have lived in the village, and attended the services, but never joined the church, do not let another Sunday dawn till you have sent in your name to be classed with the people of God. And any of you that have come often to the Tabernacle, and say that nobody has spoken to you, just you speak to somebody and own what the Lord has done for you. Joseph of Arimathæa, where are you? Come forward, man! Come forth; your time has come! Come forth now! If you have followed Christ secretly, throw secrecy to the winds! Henceforth be bravest of the brave, among the body-guard of Christ, who follow Him whithersoever He goeth. Have no fear nor thought of fear, but count it all joy if you fall into manifold trials for His name's sake, who is King of kings and Lord of lords, to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

Italian Laborers are Searching Anxiously for their money in Montana. During the recent bank troubles in New York a number of Italians living in and around Butte, M. T., withdrew their deposits from the banks of that city, and confided them to the care of a countryman of theirs named Toneatti, who had a reputation for honesty. He secreted the cash in a secure hiding-place. Soon after he was killed by a fall in a mine, and with his death died also the knowledge of the spot where the money was hid. Efforts since made to discover it have proved unsuccessful, and the grief of the unhappy Italians is pitiable. If they do not discover their treasure they will be in as poor a condition as if they had intrusted it to Grant and Ward themselves. They have learned that honesty alone is not sufficient to constitute a man a good keeper of their property. The Christian is in no danger of disappointment in that direction. He knows that his Saviour, to whom his treasure is committed, has received all power, and that "He is able to keep that committed unto Him against that day" (II Tim. 1 : 12).

A Showman was Killed by one of his Own snakes last week. The show is at High Bridge, N. Y., and consists of a variety of snakes, including one specimen of the handsome and exceedingly rare kind known as "the diamond-backed rattlesnake." James Reilly, one of the proprietors, went to the glass case where this creature was, on July 13th, and took hold of the rattlesnake, as he usually did, by the neck immediately back of the head. The reptile wriggled, and Reilly lost his hold. Instantly the rattlesnake fastened his fangs in his hand. The man flung the snake back into the case and shut the door. He sucked the wound with all his might, and drank large quantities of whiskey, but without avail. He was promptly removed to a hospital, where, after lingering twenty-four hours, he died. A former partner of Reilly, who visited him in hospital, and who said he had been exhibiting snakes for twenty-five years, stated that he had known only one case of a man living after being bitten by the species of snake that bit Reilly. In that case the man was bitten in the finger, and he instantly drew his knife and cut the finger off. He said amputation was the only sure remedy, and that was useless if not done instantly. A course so painful would not have been recommended by the man if his knowledge of the nature of the poison had not convinced him that less desperate remedies were of no avail. There are cases in spiritual affairs in which an evil habit has worked similar peril; for those the Saviour, who knew the nature of sin, gave an analogous injunction (Matt. 18 : 8).

The Bears in New York State will be Exterminated if they are hunted with the determination now characterizing the efforts of the farmers. The animals have been unusually daring and mischievous for months past, and the flocks of sheep have suffered heavily from their depredations. In the neighborhood of Redkill, Delaware County, thirty sheep have been carried off recently, and similar complaints are made in other parts of the State. On July 22d a farmer saw a large bear prowling about Redkill. He hurried home and procured the assistance of his neighbors. Eight hounds were put on his track, and after a long chase Bruin was caught and killed. He weighed 310 pounds. The farmers have now organized regular and systematic arrangements for hunting down these dangerous creatures. We can understand why the repeated losses of sheep should arouse the farmers to vigorous measures, and can but wish that a like vigor might be displayed everywhere against vice, immorality, and all forms of sin, which are stimulated by the enemy of souls, who seeks a prey far more precious than sheep (1 Peter 5 : 8).

THE MOODY AND SANKEY IRON HALL ON THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.

(See Illustration.)

The movable Iron Hall, which Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey had used, alternately with its twin structure in their evangelistic tour of the British metropolis, was set up for the last time in that service on Tuesday, May 27th, on the Thames embankment—that is, a strip of the river front which the government purchased from its owners, and having graded and paved it, turned it into a promenade for the citizens of London. The Hall was erected on an unoccupied site fronting on the promenade. A prominent London newspaper thus refers to its surroundings: "The hall, which can be sighted both from Fleet Street and Blackfriars Bridge, has for its neighbors the City of London School and the Temple Gardens—a refreshing oasis in that solitude. To pace its cloisters and shady courts carries the imagination back to the days of the Crusaders, while Whitefriars Street, immediately facing the hall itself, tells of a famous monastery which was hard by and shed abroad its influence, such as it was, in the dark ages. The City Gas Works more recently stood upon the site of the Temple Gardens Hall, and while yet the Embankment was undreamed of, the spot was actually lapped by the turbid waters of Old Father Thames. The land is the freehold of the city, but, having been cleared, is to-day in the hands of a company, who have permitted the erection of the now familiar tabernacle upon one corner for the payment of $1000. The hall is central and easy of access, being readily reached by train, bus, tram, and steamboat. It commands a district unique the world over. Within a mile radius, which embraces the purlieus of the New Cut on the south side of the Thames, and the General Post-office on the other, there is a resident population of 600,000. Messrs. Moody and Sankey's present "parish" takes in the Mansion House, the Royal Exchange, the Bank of England, and Somerset House, and the hall itself is within ear-shot of the rumbling machinery which marks out the adjacent world of printing-offices."

AN ATTEMPTED RESCUE AT SEA.

The Framnaas, a Swedish barque, was on a voyage from Hamburg to Cardiff, in ballast. The skipper was in a hurry to reach port, and spread every inch of canvas the masts would bear. A rising wind induced caution, however, and presently the command was bawled out to reef the topsails.

A number of men sprang into the rigging, and the shrouds danced under their weight as they climbed to the yard to roll the sails up. The wind thundered amid the swollen spaces of the great squares of canvas, with a sound that resembled the beating of a continuous roll upon a gigantic drum. On a sudden there was a loud cry, and the shout of "A man overboard!"

At the sound of that dreadful cry there was a rush of those on deck. The helm of the barque was put down, and as she rounded in the wind the canvas shook furiously. All was confusion in a moment—the vessel rolling heavily upon the billows, the sails thundering, every rope shrieking aloud as if in pain, and skipper and mates all shouting at the top of their voices, as a boat was lowered for the rescue of the unfortunate man.

It is not an easy thing to lower a boat even in smooth water when a vessel has way on her, but in such a sea as that now running, the undertaking was a most perilous one. It was, however, safely accomplished, and Neilson, the first mate, and two able seamen named Dahlbom and Andersen were in her pulling hard for the point where their shipmate could still be seen struggling for life some distance away.

The boat was within a hundred yards of the drowning man, when he threw up his arms and disappeared. The mate stood up to make sure that he was gone, but at that moment Andersen, who pulled the bow oar, cried out an alarm. A long, angry wave, rushing down, struck the boat, and threw her over as though a whale had risen under her. She turned completely over, and under her inverted keel Andersen was held, by the suction of the water, as firmly as if he had been lashed there. The other two, who had been flung out with a somersault, came to the surface at the same moment, and struck out for the boat still floating keel uppermost. Dahlbom reached it first, and scrambled up its slippery side until he grasped the keel. The mate missed it as a wave carried it whirling past him, nearly striking his head. He made another effort, and Dahlbom, on the watch for the opportunity, stretched over and grasped him by the wrist. (See illustration.) So aided, the mate was able to seize the keel, to which both men clung convulsively.

Then they took breath, and looked for their comrades and the vessel. The ship was far away, and on the wild waste of waters there was no sign of life. It was evident that both Andersen and the man they had come to rescue were drowned. The poor fellows clinging to the boat rose and fell with the hurling waters, half blinded by the spray that struck their faces like a volley of small shot as the wind blew the foam along in smoke from the seething heads of the seas.

Death would have been but a light and brief anguish compared to the despair in the men's hearts. Their strength was fast failing them, their finger nails were half torn off and bleeding from their desperate clutchings at the iron-hard, smooth, slippery surface of the boat's bottom:

they were sick and faint with the salt water they had swallowed, and their limbs were tortured as though every bone had been broken, by the fierce and heavy swinging of the sea and by the weight of water that poured down upon their clinging bodies, and beat them against the boat from which it threatened every moment to wash them.

Meanwhile anxiety devoured the hearts on board the Framnaas. Night was closing in, and the sea was still rising. To send out another boat to the rescue of the men seemed to be inviting fresh disaster. Besides, it was not certain that they were still alive. In the deepening gloom the overturned boat was a mere speck on the surface of the sea. Yet to leave the men to perish was to the humane skipper an act of shameful barbarity. He gave orders for the ship's course to be changed, and bore up for that rising and falling speck.

To the men clinging to that iron-bound keel the moments seemed like hours. Their own experience warned them of their peril. They knew that many skippers would, on realizing the danger of attempting a rescue, sail away and leave them to their fate. It was only their knowledge of their captain's kindness of heart that gave them courage to hold on.

"The sailor stretched over and grasped the mate by the wrist."

"Will they try to save us, do you think, Tom?" Neilson said in one of the pauses, when they had opportunity to get breath.

"They won't lower another boat, I reckon," was the reply. "Maybe they'll try to overhaul us and throw a line, but it'll be a chance if either of us is here by that time. I can't hold on much longer."

Another struggle with the water stopped further conversation. When it was over, the mate said, "Can you say a prayer, Tom? I think it's all over with us. I never had a pious mother like yours, and I never learned to pray. But I don't like dying without a prayer."

"I learned to pray when I was a boy," said Dahlbom, "but I haven't prayed since the day I went to sea."

"Well, pray now if you can, Tom, for I don't believe we'll live the night through."

With the prayers that went up to the throne of God that night from cathedrals and churches and quiet firesides, there mingled the earnest prayer of those two men tossing on the angry sea on that boat's keel. It was not one of the "eloquent prayers" of which we read in newspapers, which seem to be addressed to men rather than to God, but it was the earnest cry for deliverance of men on the verge of destruction. Tom knew the Lord's Prayer and he said it reverently, followed by the mate. Then in a few brief sentences the two prayed that God would deliver them, or, if that could not be, that He would look mercifully upon them in death and forgive their sins.

"Do you think God hears us, Tom?" asked the mate.

"Mother used to say He listened to us as much as if we were priests," was Tom's reply.

"I don't know how it can be," said Neilson; "but if we come safe out of this I'll find out what religion is. Look, Tom, there's the ship heading right for us. We'll be saved yet."

Tom looked and raised a shout of joy. They could hold on now with fresh force, for hope braced their muscles. As the ship drew nearer they made out eager men standing on the rail holding on by the shrouds, ready with lines in their hands to throw when the right moment came. It was an anxious time for those on the ship as well as those on the boat. At last the lines were flung out with skilful, unerring hands, and each man seized an end with a grasp that only those give who hold for life. As the two men stood once more on deck a reverent "Thank God" was uttered with heartfelt gratitude.

Neilson kept his word, and he and Tom Dahlbom went to the latter's mother to learn "what religion is." The godly old lady could have no more grateful task than that of directing her wayward son and his shipmate to the God she served. Before they went on their next voyage each man had in his heart a firm trust in Him, "who is able to save unto the uttermost all who come unto God by Him."

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Consulting the Minister.

IT was late in the November afternoon, and Carl was deeply absorbed in study, with that utter oblivion of the outer life which is known only to students. Certainly there was a pleasant impression of the previous evening hovering about him like a sunny mist, and mingling subtly with every movement of his thoughts. He came up from the depths at the entrance of Mr. Waldron into his study, with something of the bewilderment of a pearl-diver who has been long under the water. It was not for a moment or two quite clear to himself who he was, or who was the intruder coming in with all the freedom and ease of a patron.

"I wish to have a confidential conversation with you," said Mr. Waldron, after a few minutes' desultory talk; "it is strictly a family matter. You are already well acquainted with the circumstances of my son's sojourn in John Morley's house."

"Certainly," answered Carl, starting into a very keen, quick-eared attention.

"You know, too, the whole history of his second wife," he continued; "I am far from casting undue blame upon her, but she was a giddy, childish young woman, with no steady principles to protect her. There had been some love-making between her and Robert at Oxford, before she had ever seen John Morley. She was fully as old as he was, therefore, as a woman, she may be considered several years older. She came here, heard nothing of Robert for a year or two, and at last married for a home. You know the rest."

"Yes," said Carl, his elbow resting on his desk and his hand shading his eyes.

"Tell me," resumed Mr. Waldron, "what you suppose the consequences must be to my son? He has long since repented of his sin. Is he to bear the burden of it his life through?"

"Nay," answered Carl, his lips parting with a smile of great tenderness; "you, who are an elder in the Church, know the grace of God better than I can do. There is no burden of sin we may not cast away before the face of the Father."

"But are the consequences to remain?" asked Mr. Waldron. "Is he always to bear the stigma of his sin? Is he not free to act as if he had never been guilty? Ought the transgression to be forgiven by every man as well as by God?"

Carl paused. There was a swift current of sympathy and love running clear and unobstructed through his young spirit which carried him irresistibly toward the side of mercy. He was as yet a mere student in human nature, and had no actual wrestle with temptation. He had not seen sin face to face. At present it was a veiled and awful form for him; he had not beheld its hideous features, and received the ineffaceable memory upon his heart.

"'None of the sins that he hath committed shall be mentioned unto him,'" he said in a lowered and reverent voice.

"You yourself would act upon that," pursued Mr. Waldron. "My son is the same in your eyes as though he never was guilty of this sin."

"Perhaps not altogether that," answered Carl; "but who among us would enforce a penalty if God does not? If He will make no more mention of his transgression, why should we?"

It was Mr. Waldron's turn to pause and reflect. His anxious face grew darker, and the knotted veins in his forehead became larger. He did not feel quite sure of Robert's repentance, though he longed to believe in it. He wished to believe that his own prayers through so many years had not failed in the court of heaven. Perseverance in an earthly court must have prevailed before this. He argued illogically. Because he had so earnestly prayed that his son might truly repent, his professed repentance must be sincere.

"Mr. Bramwell," he said, suddenly, "what do you think of Hester Morley?"

If Carl had been asked unexpectedly what he thought of the cherubim, he could not have been more stupefied or at a loss. He gazed blankly at Mr. Waldron, and did not reply till that gentleman repeated the question.

"Oh, I think she is very good," he answered, somewhat coldly; "she is a member of the Church, and an excellent daughter. My sister is very much attached to her."

"You have not seen much of her?" remarked Mr. Waldron.

"Very little," he replied.

"Would it astonish you," said Mr. Waldron, hesitating, "would it shock you in any way if you heard that my son, having seen her a good deal while he was ill this spring, was very anxious, nay, bent upon making her his wife?"

"Impossible!" ejaculated Carl, starting from his seat as if he had been shot. He took a hasty turn or two across his study, and then came back to his chair opposite his visitor. "I think I must have misunderstood you," he said, with a ghastly effort at a smile. "Did you say that Mr. Robert Waldron wishes to make the daughter of John Morley his wife?"

"Yes," replied Mr. Waldron, briefly.

"It is impossible!" said Carl. "Your son's sin demands great charity from us; but he must not ask Hester to share the burden he has to bear all his life long. Oh, it would not be possible!"

"But is my son never to marry?" asked Mr. Waldron.

"Yes!" cried Carl; "let him find some one with a spirit which would not be bowed down by such a burden. But Hester is too young, too ignorant of life, too simple-hearted. He would do well with a wife like his sister, strong in her own faith, and able to fight with him against his spiritual foes. Why should Hester's young and innocent heart be joined to one which must ever bear the sting of a sore repentance?"

"You are a young man, yourself," said Mr. Waldron, as Carl paused; "a very young man. There are scores, hundreds of marriages—ay! and happy ones—where there has been an early folly like this."

Carl looked up with surprised face. To him it seemed strange that this experienced Christian could use such a word as folly in such a matter. He had seen John Morley a broken, prematurely aged man, his heart torn with sorrow and his head bowed with shame. He had seen Hester, whose past nine years, which should have been the brightest of her life, turned into cold and joyless years. He had been in the home on which the shadow still lay, and had felt its benumbing influence. All this rose before him as he heard Mr. Waldron's words, and his soul revolted when he heard him denominate the act which had wrought all the misery merely as "folly." But he said nothing.

Mr. Waldron went on: "Hester would be rich, happy, and beloved. If John Morley should be reconciled to Robert, he would become a member of our Church, and would be ready to take my place in it when I am gone. Moreover, there was a something in Hester's manner last night which makes me hope that she is not averse to Robert. You may have seen it yourself—a pretty, pensive, gentle pleasure in listening to him."

"Yes," replied Carl, who had watched Hester furtively during the whole of the previous evening, and who had seen every little gesture and every expression of enjoyment that had escaped her.

"Then if she loves him," resumed Mr. Waldron, "and if that folly of his youth should not be remembered against him now he is a man, I see no impediment to their marriage. I see in it rather a compensation for the past. If John Morley's poverty and shame have come from us, surely the honor of marrying his daughter into our family ought to balance it. Do you agree with me?"

Carl's restless hand moved absently among his papers. His face had grown pale, and his bright, keen sight, dim. Until this moment he had looked at John Morley's misery from the outside. By temperament he was profoundly sympathetic, and was touched to the quick by the feelings of others. But by this very law of his nature he had regarded John Morley and his exaggerated grief from the point of view of the Waldrons, with whom he had been most closely associated. He had placed himself in the position of Robert, and pleaded for him all the excuses he would have sought for himself. But now he seemed to look into the very heart of John Morley—that heart on fire, as Grant had once called it. That Hester Morley should love Robert Waldron! That she should ever become his wife! He pushed away the hair which had fallen over his forehead, and gazed fixedly at Mr. Waldron, who said, "Do you think with me?"

"I think," cried Carl, in an irrepressible frenzy, "that the idea is monstrous! There are some sins which cannot be forgotten. It would be a horrible thing, an unheard-of thing."

"Perhaps you love Hester yourself," Mr. Waldron suggested.

Carl hastened to regain his self-control. Mr. Waldron's face was one of sharp and anxious scrutiny; and he did not wish to subject himself to any more pointed questions.

"I was thinking of her father only," he answered; "I believe that to him it will appear more monstrous than it does to me."

"Carl," said Mr. Waldron, in an accent of pity, "I like you; ay, I honor and trust you. In bringing you here I thought it probable that you would love Hester. But this is my son's whole chance of happiness; perhaps for the life to come as well as this. It may be his salvation. You possess a better and holier happiness. Promise me, at least, that you will not use your influence against him."

"I have, perhaps, no right to influence her," answered Carl, sighing; but I will commit her to His care who judges all men. If my prayers can shield her from peril, they shall not fail her."

His heart sank a little after he had given this implied promise to stand aside while she was tempted with all that ambition and love could offer her. The sole weapons he could use in her defence were the prayers and teachings she would listen to from his mouth in the public services of the chapel.

Scarcely had Mr. Waldron closed the house-door after himself, having considerately forbidden Carl to quit his warm room, when a light rap at his study-door recalled Carl from his painful reflections upon the interview which had just ended. The second intruder was his sister Annie, who carried a little work-basket in her hand, and came in boldly, with an air which plainly announced that she intended staying with him for a time.

"Now, Carl," she said, "it is all nonsense you pretending you can study with that dreadful cold. My husband"—she uttered the word with a little bridling of the head, which showed that the title was still a new one—"has been called out, and does not expect to be home till late. He said I was to come here and sit with you, and you were on no account to leave this room till bedtime. So I am going to order tea up here, and we will have a nice, quiet, cosey evening together, you dear old boy."

She rang for the servant to bring the tea-tray and bright brass kettle up-stairs, and was very busy for a time in making the tea and toast by Carl's fire. He sat upon the hearth, watching her with dimmed eyes and a colorless face. Annie was quick-sighted, and the weariness of his expression did not escape her.

"Are you going to talk to me, Carl, or shall I talk to you?" she asked.

"I would a great deal rather you talked to me," he answered.

"I shall not say anything very wise, and I shall gossip," she said, threateningly.

Carl leaned back in his chair, and stretched his feet out toward the fire. He could not make conversation, even to Annie, that night. His mind was very busy, but very rambling, darting from one point to another of his interview with Mr. Waldron. Yet he was not sorry that Annie had invaded his solitude, and that her voice should prattle through the confusion of his thoughts. Now and then he caught a sentence of her lively gossip, and answered by a word or two. On her part she was weaving a very skilful and subtle web by which she might entrap his most secret sentiments; but she might as well have gone directly to her point, so insensible was he to her delicate handling.

"She is very fond of me," said Annie, in a tone of great significance; and, as he was thinking at the moment of Hester, the words startled him. "She said last night she loved me like a sister."

"I am very glad to hear it," he answered, earnestly.

"I wonder how old she is," remarked Annie. Carl knew to a day Hester's age. She was four years and three months younger than himself. He had seen the date of her birthday in a book which had been given to her years ago, but he did not give his sister the information she desired.

"She perhaps looks younger than she is," said Annie; "I think she is very good; don't you, Carl?"

"Yes," he answered, in a very subdued tone.

"And she thinks you," continued his sister, "the very best, the very first, the most eloquent of men and ministers. Of course I agreed with her, but she said I was never to tell you so, Carl."

Carl's face grew crimson, and with the gesture most familiar to him, he shaded his eyes with his long hand; there were tears, he could not tell why, standing in them. Annie nestled to his side, and laid her head upon his shoulder.

"Dear old fellow," she said, "I daren't quite say that she is in love with you; but she is not far from it. And I am not quite sure that I should like it altogether. She is not exactly what I fancied your wife would be. I should think she cannot be less than six or seven years older than you; but she is very good and very rich, and her father is a great man among our people. Still I am not quite sure that I should like my brother Carl to become her husband."

Carl had suffered too severe a shock that evening to be staggered by this one. The deep flush faded gradually away from his face, and the tears dried under his eyelids, but he could not command his voice sufficiently to speak to Annie.

"So now," she said, kissing him affectionately, "your mind is prepared for it. I don't believe you have vanity enough for the notion to enter your head of itself, clever as you are. It would be a very grand thing for you, but I don't exactly see how it would turn out in the end. You are very fond of her, Carl."

"She is my friend," he answered, with parched lips and dry throat.

"Ah, yes!" said Annie, sagely; "but everybody knows what such friendships generally come to. I don't mean, Carl, that you might not go on very comfortably as a friend; but Miss Waldron will not. Mark my words, and make up your mind about it. Only if I were you, unless I really cared for her, I would not let her come here so often. I should think you could easily put a check upon that. It is not nice generally for men to marry women older than themselves, but she is everything else you like; isn't she?"

Carl fell into a train of troubled thoughts again. His friendship for Miss Waldron was pure and chivalrous, founded upon the gratitude he felt for her very gracious and flattering regard for himself. No idea that she cherished a sentiment one degree warmer than his own would ever have entered his mind, had not Annie placed it so plainly before him. But now that his eyes were opened he saw it distinctly, and knew that he could never be blind again.

He passed in review the incidents of the preceding evening, and then his thoughts were brought round once more to the first painful subject which had occupied them.

"Annie," he said, in a very low and troubled voice, "do you think it possible for Hester ever to love Robert Waldron?"

"It looked very like it last night, Carl," she answered, gravely.

"But," cried Carl, "the thing is impossible."

"I have been thinking about it all the morning," resumed Annie, "and I partly understand how it can be. Hester has lived so apart from the world that she is still like a child in many things. It is clear that Robert Waldron does not shock her in any way, but that she is rather attracted by him than otherwise. I saw her look at him, once or twice yesterday, with the open-eyed, wondering, unconscious gaze of a child. But at other times her eyes sank, and her face colored when he was talking to her. I am afraid she might love him."

"But what could be the end of it?" asked Carl, in a sharp accent.

"Ah! how could it end?" repeated Annie.

ABSALOM'S REBELLION.

S. S. Lesson for August 10, II Sam. 15. Golden Text, Ex. 20 : 12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

David's Punishment Necessary — The Punishment a Parent Feels Most Keenly—The Parent's Sin Reflected on his Family—How Satan Gets his Hold on a Family—Absalom's Crafty Conduct—His Hypocritical Profession of Religion — David's Humble Submission—God's Readiness to Open the Tangled Skeins of Life—David's Patience under Ingratitude and Abuse—The Fate of the Undutiful Son.

GOD had declared unto David by Nathan the prophet, "I will raise up evil against thee out of thine own house" (II Sam. 12 : 11). The king knew that God did not willingly grieve him; but God is a just God and holy as well as loving. David had brought shame and death on the house of Uriah; under the law, just retribution must follow. "Every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward" (Heb. 2 : 2). Therefore David must suffer through his own family. No humbling is so great as that which comes through our own children; touch a parent anywhere else, and the wound will heal in time; but there is no healing save in Christ for a wound received by a parent from his own child. David had grievously wronged his God; he was the child of God most known and observed in the world; he had brought a slur on His cause which would be felt through all generations. The world must know how God abominated his sin, and David must be touched on his most tender point.

Every parent who walks with God must have noticed that he CANNOT DO WRONG WITH IMPUNITY.

His spirit reflects itself on all who are in his house. If he himself is walking in victory over sin, his heart cleansed by the blood, and Jesus consciously dwelling in him and ruling over him, he will find that all goes better in the house; that children, servants, clerks, workmen—all come more or less under the influence. The flesh in them meeting Christ in him cannot explode for want of friction. Whereas when he is under the power of sin, or self, or circumstances, or people, when he is worried, fretted, overcome, the flesh in him meets the flesh in others, and there are frequent explosions. Satan gets his hold in a family too often through some child of God, making his slips an occasion for sin in the others. When David sinned, another atmosphere must have come into the house, and very soon the evil began to develop. Amnon sinned; his sister Tamar was blighted for life, and Absalom planned and carried out the murder of Amnon. Thus David's own sins were repeated in his family.

Absalom condemned himself to banishment; but the heart of the king yearned for him, and he recalled him; he himself had learned the power of temptation, and probably Absalom's sin made him more anxious to win him to the Lord whose longsuffering love he himself had proved. But Absalom was unworthy of this love; Satan had got him completely, and so filled him with self-love that all natural affection was obliterated by it. Without any kind of provocation from his father, Absalom stirred up rebellion against him. Personal ambition was his only motive, and he sacrificed everything to it. He had seen his father act deceitfully in the matter of Bathsheba, and the devil made Absalom a true

DISCIPLE IN DUPLICITY.

By misrepresentations of his father and by his own suavity of manner, he "stole the hearts" of the people whom he met in the gate when they came for judgment. He led them to think that David had no care to see them righted, and that he alone had their well-being at heart. When any one came near to do him obeisance, he took him and kissed him; by this act of condescension causing unkind reflections on his father, who maintained the dignity of his position. With all this, Absalom made a profession of religion which completely deceived his fond father. He "said unto the king, I pray thee, let me go and pay my vow, which I have vowed unto the Lord, in Hebron. For thy servant vowed a vow while I abode at Geshur in Syria, saying, If the Lord shall bring me again indeed to Jerusalem, then will I serve the Lord." It is not easy for a loving father to believe a child is untrue. David was deceived; he said to Absalom, "Go in peace." There must have been an unutterable sorrow in his heart when he learned the truth, that his son was conspiring against him, and that "the hearts of the men of Israel were after Absalom."

It is very striking that in this deep sorrow David did not inquire of the Lord. In almost all the persecution of Saul he followed the Lord's directions closely; perhaps he thought that in his relations with his own children he himself was responsible, and he did not in these things make the Lord his Shepherd, and say, "He leadeth me" (Ps. 23 : 1, 2). It may be the enemy got the upper hand, and suggested to him, "You have if you had not sinned as you have done, God would not have allowed such evil in your family; now you must bear it, 'you have made your bed, and you must lie on it,' and you cannot expect God to guide you in such circumstances; you are under judgment, and must do the best you can for yourself." It is Satan's way to get us down and then keep us down. God is a loving Father. He may be forced to chasten us, and even to let judgment come on us, but not to leave us under it. Jesus bore our sins and all their consequences, our griefs and our sicknesses, that we, casting all our burden on the Lord, may be delivered. David could not remain at Jerusalem to see Absalom either conquered or taking possession of his throne; he fled, and his servants with him. He just yielded to the force of circumstances, and gave way to his sorrow, as we see when he directed Zadok the priest to carry back the ark of God into Jerusalem: "If I shall find favor in the eyes of the Lord, He will bring me again, and shew me both it, and His habitation: But if He thus say, I have no delight in thee; behold, here am I, let Him do to me as seemeth good unto Him."

Had David looked away from his deservings to the faithfulness of his God, and placed the whole matter in His true hands, who knows whether Absalom might not have been brought to repentance in an hour, and all the people turned back to the Lord! Such a change took place on Mount Carmel in Elijah's time, and the God of Elijah was David's God. It is he seeks to fasten our eyes on what we are, and on the miserable incompetency of our own resources, and then persuades us that as we are, we cannot claim God's intervention, our failures render it presumption to apply to Him. Thank God, Satan is a liar. Thank God, it is in grace He deals with us. And thank God in our greatest failures of all, which so often are our family failures, our loving God stands ready at any moment to take the tangled skein in hand, and to get us out of our difficulties. He longs to take those wayward hearts of our children, over which we have no power, into His own Almighty and most tender hand: "Be careful for nothing; but in *every*thing by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God" (Phil. 4 : 6). "Casting all your care on Him, for He careth for you" (I Pet. 5 : 7); if the children are the chief care, He careth for them. "My God shall supply all your need according to His riches in glory by Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4 : 19). Often the greatest need of a parent is the control of some wayward son or daughter.

During David's sore trial there were precious testimonies borne to the faithfulness of many of the hand of the Lord was in this, and he recognized it. Ittai the Gittite brought his men to the help of David. Zadok and the Levites were true to him, Hushai the Archite went for David's sake into the very council chamber of Absalom; Shobi, Machir, and Barzillai brought provisions for David's army. But some took occasion to manifest another spirit; Ziba, the servant of Mephibosheth, sought his own ends, and Shimei came forth and cursed David. Abishai, David's nephew, wanted to execute summary vengeance upon the man, but David said, "What have I to do with you, ye sons of Zeruiah? So let him curse, because the Lord hath said unto him, Curse David. Who shall then say, Wherefore hast thou done so? . . . Behold my son . . . seeketh my life: how much more now may this Benjamite do it? let him alone, and let him curse; for the Lord hath bidden him. It may be that the Lord will look upon mine affliction, and that the Lord will requite me good for his cursing this day" (II Sam 16 : 10–12). Can this be the same David who wrote of God, "He only is my Rock and my Salvation; He is my defence; I shall not be moved. . . . Trust in Him at all times, ye people, pour out your heart before Him: God is a Refuge for us" (Ps. 62 : 6, 7)? Yes, but it was David with his eye upon himself and upon circumstances, whereas in Ps. 62 his eye was upon God.

But how about Absalom? "Honor thy father and thy mother that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee," or, as quoted by Paul, "that it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth" (Eph. 6 : 2, 3). The punishment of a disobedient son under the law was death by stoning (Deut. 21 : 18–21). Absalom knew the law, and was wilfully sinning against it; he was no longer a child, but about thirty years of age. Vanity and self-sufficiency were the avenues by which Satan took possession of him, and hurried him to an early grave and a lost eternity. He had many advantages, but gave the rein to his own will: he must have what he wanted, and nothing must stand in the way; his father, mother, his own soul must be sacrificed that he might gain his ends. At first he seemed to carry all before him; but he did not take into account that God lived, and that nothing can be done which He does not permit. Absalom sacrificed all, for time and eternity, and gained nothing. Many a young man or woman finds the restraint of a parent's commands or wishes very irksome, even when both parties are Christians. Even when the parents may be mistaken it is safer to obey, and to trust God to bring them round to see their error. How often have we seen a parent's mind or a child's mind changed by God in a night when the difficulty has been handed over to Him. Alas, for Absalom it was too late!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Plague in Marseilles and Toulon was reported last week to be slightly decreasing, but spreading to the surrounding villages. It has made its appearance at Arles, a marshy seaport town of about twenty-five thousand inhabitants, where the deaths from the disease are about twenty per day. The outbreak was followed by a panic. A cablegram from the town, on July 25th, says: "Nearly all the bakers and butchers have left the city. The supply of food is consequently scarce and difficult to obtain. The panic throughout the city is simply indescribable. The Prefect could not get even a chop at the sub-prefecture, the butchers having all fled, and two doctors from Marseilles, having put up at the chief hotel, were offered the keys by the proprietor with the words: 'I am going; do the best you can.' One of the greatest difficulties in meeting the plague grows out of the insensate fears and the extraordinary ignorance and superstition of the poorer people. In Marseilles the poor are firmly convinced that the physicians are determined to keep up the epidemic. They force them to take their own medicines first before touching them. They sometimes shut the doors in their faces, and in one case threatened them with knives." Some very pathetic cases are reported. Among them was that of an unknown woman, who was seized with the dread disease while passing along the street. She fell prostrate to the ground, and expired immediately. The entire number of deaths from the cholera up to the close of last week aggregated over a thousand. Five hundred persons attacked by the disease were cured. Much of the virulence of the disease is undoubtedly due to the unhealthy condition both of Marseilles and Toulon. A correspondent of the New York Times, who recently visited the two cities, says: "The condition of Marseilles was frightful, that of Toulon struck me as simply murderous. Although Toulon has a background of mountains, the city itself is situated on a flat plain, four feet only above the level of a tideless sea. The consequences arising from imperfect drainage, with a natural want of slope, are that the sewers have only a fall of 18 inches, so, with a sluggish movement, the filth of the town drops into an almost stagnant sea. What is worse is that at the points where these drains flow they are only covered with plank, and the filth, disgusting to the nose, impresses itself on the eyes. You not only then smell, but you see, the garbage of Toulon." The Quarantine against both cities is strictly observed, and much inconvenience necessarily results. The following is an instance: The corvette Argentina, which was recently at Marseilles, desired to take on coal at Gibraltar. The English authorities there forbade this, and threatened to fire unless the vessel at once departed. The Argentina thereupon proceeded to a port in Portugal and began coaling; but the inhabitants of the port became panic-stricken, and compelled the authorities to order the immediate departure of the vessel. Where the Argentina is to find fuel enough to enable her to return to La Plata appears to be an insoluble problem.

Another Nihilist Plot against the Czar of Russia has been discovered. The conspirators had arranged to blow up the palace at Warsaw, in Poland, where the Czar was to stay during his visit to that city. A quantity of arms and dynamite was discovered. Several arrests were made and compromising documents seized. They showed that elaborate and far-reaching plans were adopted. Evidence is adduced to prove that the conspirators, after murdering the Czar, intended to provoke a rebellion in Poland and Western Russia, to plunder the Jews and rich tradesmen of Warsaw, and to seize the arms in the arsenal. Five Nihilists were arrested in Moscow having in their possession dynamite bombs and documents. The latter showed that since the coronation of the Czar Moscow has been the seat of the Executive Committee of the Nihilists. A state of siege will be proclaimed at Warsaw. The governor-general and the chief of police of that place will be removed. The newspapers say that Russia and Germany propose the adoption of an international convention providing measures for the suppression of dynamiters.

Legislation by Picnic, is the Phrase by which the leader of the British Conservatives stigmatizes the demonstration of July 21st against the House of Lords. The demonstration was, however, a legitimate answer to his own assertion that the people were not interested in the question of the extension of the franchise. Other demonstrations of a similar character, but more menacing in tone, were made during last week. One of the most important was held in Manchester on July 26th, when the veteran statesman, John Bright, said that, "unless English freedom was a fraud and a sham the people would know how to deal with an aristocratic Chamber, which was ever hostile to popular rights and national interests. Englishmen ere now had proved their power to curb the despotism of kings, and they would surely find the means to hold in check the bloated aristocrats of the present day." The Radical section of the Liberal party is not anxious for a compromise, and would prefer the dispute over the Franchise Bill to continue until the House of Lords is abolished as a legislative House.

The Egyptian Conference has Adjourned without coming to an agreement in regard to England's financial proposals. England and France are diametrically opposed, and the Conference failed to harmonize the two powers. Earl Granville is empowered to summon the Conference to another meeting at any time. The Conference postpones giving its decision on the English or French proposals, but agrees to such a modification of the law of liquidation as will enable England to arrange a part of the Egyptian loan. An effort to relieve General Gordon at Khartoum is being made by Colonel Colville, who is crossing the desert with a small force of Bedouins. It is reported by merchants that General Gordon is still in safety at Khartoum, though the city is surrounded by the Mahdi's forces.

The Dissensions of the Irish Leaders are now agitating the party in Parliament and in Ireland. The growing jealousy of Mr. Parnell for Mr. Davitt has culminated on the subject of the Belfast Convention. The London correspondent of the New York Herald cables the following account of the dispute: "The leading spirit in the organization of the Convention is Mr. Ferguson, of Glasgow, who is one of the leading supporters in Scotland of Mr. Henry George's doctrine. Mr. Michael Davitt has actively co-operated with Mr. Ferguson in calling the Convention, and means to make it the initial point of a land nationalization campaign. This brings the issue between Davitt and Parnell to a head, and Parnell was forced to accept the challenge. It is known that he deliberated long and anxiously upon the subject, but finally made up his mind that the time had come to crush what he and his party believe to be the fatal heresy of land nationalization. Mr. Parnell has addressed a circular to the secretaries of the League, in which he says the promoters of the Convention are acting in hostility to the Oganizing Committee of the League. He advises the branches not to send delegates to the Convention. Mr. Parnell also denounces the holding of the Convention as contrary to the policy of the Parliamentary party and the platform of the National League.

The French Demands on Madagascar are, if correctly reported, of an exceptionally severe character. It is stated that France claims a protectorate over that portion of Madagascar lying north of the sixteenth parallel of south latitude. They also claim an indemnity of $600,000 and an indemnity to compensate foreigners for their losses during the war. France also proposes that the Queen shall be styled Queen of the Hovas only. One of the speakers in the French Chamber of Deputies declared that the Hovas abused the patience of France. He advocated the occupation and retention of Tamatave, Majunga, and other points. For commercial reasons, also, it would be necessary to occupy points south because they were healthier and because the English Methodists there should be taught that the rights of France extended over the whole of Madagascar.

The Hon. JOHN P. ST. JOHN, the Prohibition Candidate for the Presidency.

THE HON. JOHN P. ST. JOHN,

Presidential Candidate of the Prohibition Party.

The Nature of the Prohibition Struggle—Gov. St. John's Title to Eminence—Ancestry—A Noble Mother—Birth and Early Life—A Home Clouded by a Curse—Last Day at Home—Studying Law by the Light of Pine Knots—Legal Career—Elected Governor—The Results of Prohibition—Incident of German Immigrants—A Pathetic Narrative—Many-Sided Character—An Artless Question.

In response to a desire expressed by its subscribers, The Christian Herald, this week, reproduces the portrait of ex-Governor St. John, of Kansas, who has received the nomination for the Presidency of the Prohibition party. In doing so, it makes no invidious distinction between the candidates. St. John represents a principle with which The Christian Herald has always avowed its sympathy. The Prohibition Convention expressly stated that the party is divided in opinion on political issues, but is united in its opposition to the liquor traffic. Good men in both the Republican and Democratic parties share that hostility, though they deprecate the nomination of an independent ticket. If any possibility existed of a Prohibition President being elected, they would work for him with all their energy; but, realizing the impossibility of success, they prefer to cast their ballots for the candidate who on other questions commands their support. Even they admire the courage and energy of while regretting that they cannot approve its policy.

It is not surprising that the Prohibition party should have been organized. If a hostile fleet were at our shores, if a hostile army were encamped on our soil, every citizen would become a soldier, ready to wield a weapon in defence of our flag, our homes, and our hearths. But we have to-day in our midst an enemy which is sapping our strength, draining our wealth, desolating our homes, making our wives widows, and our children fatherless. It is the worst of foes, for its approaches are so insidious that its true character is not apparent until its fell mission is accomplished. Our great men, men of noble genius, men capable of serving their generation, have called it a friend, and, falling under its paralyzing power, have been lost to their country, to themselves, and to God. It is against this treacherous and that Christian men, having organized in social and religious associations, have also united in political action. They are perfectly aware that they cannot elect their candidate, but they desire in this way to put themselves on record on a question which, in their opinion, dwarfs all other issues. The self-sacrifice they display is worthy of all honor. While workers for the other candidates are stimulated by the hope of victory and the prospect of office as reward for their services, the workers for St. John know that in this contest defeat is inevitable, and that for them there is no hope of gain. Yet they work on cheerfully, content if the cause they love is advanced by their labors. Those who differ from them may well admire their consistency and applaud their self-sacrificing spirit.

The Prohibition Convention was wisely guided in its selection of a candidate for the Presidency. No man living is better fitted to call out the full strength of the Prohibition vote. His whole public life has been devoted to a conflict with the gigantic evil of the liquor traffic, and he has spared neither himself, nor his labor, nor his money in the contest. He has proved his worthiness to the position of a representative leader to which the Convention called him.

John P. St. John comes of

A CHRISTIAN FAMILY.

His grandfather, Rev. Daniel St. John, was an honored minister of the Gospel, a native of Pennsylvania, who for more than sixty years faithfully labored in the cause of Christ. Some of his life was spent in the State of New York, and he ultimately removed to the West, where he spent his declining years, and died at Broad Ripple, Ind., at the advanced age of eighty-eight. While residing in New York State the family was blessed by the birth of a son, Samuel St. John, the father of the future Governor of Kansas. He is described as a man of good education and considerable natural ability. He settled on a farm at Brockville, Franklin County, Ind., and there, on February 25th, 1833, John P. St. John, the future Governor, was born.

Like the majority of great and good men, John P. St. John was blessed with that choicest of God's blessings—a good mother. She was of English extraction, a daughter of that Captain Snell who distinguished himself in the war of 1812. Of this Christian lady Governor St. John has many times spoken in words of heartfelt veneration. Her influence seems to have had great power over him from his earliest years, and to have had no slight part in moulding the character of his mind.

The narrative of boyhood's years is one that our young people may study with advantage.

PIONEER LIFE IN THE WEST

fifty years ago was more favorable to the development of the physical than the mental powers. But this boy had a very clear idea of the value of an education. Possibly his mother had something to do with the estimate he formed, but his own persistence and untiring industry, qualities which have distinguished him all through his life, were mainly instrumental in its realization. "The chores" had to be done on the farm, morning and night. The boy was young, but he could do something to help his parents, and that little was thoroughly done. In the interval between those morning and evening labors he attended school in the little log schoolhouse of the neighborhood, and when he returned home at night and had performed his home duties on the farm he never failed to get in his lessons before he retired to rest.

School days, however, were brief, and when, before he emerged from boyhood, he finally quitted school, he set to work on a self-imposed course of study, laying the neighborhood under tribute for such books as could be borrowed, or purchased at low rates. There is something very interesting in the picture of this farmer's boy, tired and weary in the evening with labor on the land, setting himself down by the light of the fire to voluntary study. Any one witnessing the spectacle would have said there was and subsequent events have proved that such an opinion would have been correct.

There was, however, a trouble in the Indiana farm-house. The heart of the beloved mother was slowly breaking under a bitter sorrow. Her husband had fallen under the power of the social glass, and was fast becoming its slave. "Things about the farm were not as they used to be," is the pathetic description we have of that time, and "father was not so well off as formerly." It was decided that John should leave home to earn a living for himself, and while yet in his teens he was placed in a store at a salary of six dollars a month. That was scarcely the life for which the active lad was adapted, and before he was twenty he resolved on quitting it for more congenial pursuits.

California attracted him, and he determined to try his fortune in the Golden State. It was a hazardous enterprize for a mere boy to undertake, but he was not afraid of work; he was adventurous and ambitious. We can easily understand how anxious the mother must have been when she bade him farewell. The temptations to which he would be exposed she could imagine, and she had at her side a doleful example of what evil those temptations might achieve.

THE LAST DAY AT HOME

Governor St. John has described with much pathos. "My mother," he said, "was not cheerful and happy; how could she be? and though she never spoke of her fears or secret sorrow, yet I saw it all, and, boy as I was, I hated the demon, Drink, that had made such a change in my father, had broken my mother's heart, and darkened my boyhood's home; and I resolved it never should pass my lips, and anything I could say or do should be done to put the blighting curse from other homes. My mother called me to her, and said, 'John, my son, promise me you'll always be a man wherever you go.' I promised her, and wherever I went after, and whenever tempted to go astray, or do anything that I knew my mother would not approve of, that promise kept me right. Oh, mothers! talk to your boys and get them to promise you against everything that leads men astray; and men! when you are tempted to do wrong, to enter a saloon and imbibe the poisonous draught, think, would God want you to go in there? And if your thoughts won't go as high as that, think of your mother, your next best friend to God. Think whether she would have you do this thing or not; and if she would not, don't do it."

In California St. John accepted any work that offered. He had his own way to make, and he recognized no way of making it but steady, honest work. Our young men in the present day are dazzled by "lucky coups," fortunate speculations, which have indoctrinated them with a contempt for the slower process of work; but St. John chose the slow way, and succeeded. Sometimes mining, sometimes working on the seamboats, or trading at others; when nothing better could be had, chopping wood, but always at work, and always careful of his money, that he might be able to send home some little help to his mother, whose straitened circumstances rendered such assistance only too welcome. His connection with the steamboats proved more lucrative for St. John than his other employments, and the length of his voyages increased. He sailed to South America, to Mexico, the Sandwich Islands, and took a journey through Central America. In 1852 and 1853 the Indian wars broke out, and then St. John, with many other citizens, entered the field against the red men, was wounded twice, and several times narrowly escaped death.

During St. John's Californian experiences he commenced the study of the law. We have here another of those picturesque interiors that a Rubens might have painted. In a rough miner's cabin by the light of pine knots, on board a steamer by the faint glimmer of a lantern or the dim light of the moon, the persistent young man, but little over twenty years of age, was seen

PORING OVER HIS LAW BOOKS.

The same tenacious hold on mental culture which distinguished him in childhood was apparent in his adolescence. It was a pursuit of knowledge under difficulties; but it was so far successful that in 1860 he was accepted as clerk by the law firm of Starkweather & McLean, of Charlton, Ill., and in a year from that time had given evidence of so much ability and learning that he was given a partnership. When the war broke out, St. John, like many other professional men both North and South, closed his office to take the field in defence of his principles. He enlisted as a private in the Sixty-eighth Illinois Volunteers, but before the close of the war he had risen to the rank of lieutenant-colonel. When he returned to private life he settled at Independence, Mo., and there he remained for upward of eight years.

During the political campaign of 1868 St. John was an active worker. He visited all the towns of Western Missouri, and became well known as an effective speaker. In May, 1869, he removed to Kansas, and commenced a law business at Olatha, at first in partnership with Mr. M. V. B. Parker, but afterward alone. Three years later he was elected to the State Senate. This was the first prominent political office he had filled, though he had, while in Illinois, received from his fellow-citizens evidences of public confidence. In 1876 the nomination for Governor was tendered him, but at that time he declined it. It was, however, again offered him by the State Convention, held at Topeka on August 28th, 1878, and his friends urgently pressed him to accept it. He consented, and at once commenced an energetic campaign. He was in a total vote of 138,285, by a majority of 36,812 over his principal rival, and a majority over all of 9755. In 1880, in a total vote of 198,238, St. John was re-elected by a majority over the next highest candidate of 51,647, and a majority over all of 32,170, a fact which shows how satisfactory to the people had been the manner in which he had discharged the duties of his office during the first term. In 1882 St. John was nominated for a third term, but it was the year of the Democratic tidal wave, and he was defeated by the Democratic candidate.

The chief event which distinguished Governor St. John's administration was the passage of the constitutional amendment in 1880. As to the beneficial results of that change there is indisputable evidence. An official return of the State prisons for the first nine months of the following year shows that 114 prisoners were sent to the penitentiary, while 226, or nearly double the number, were incarcerated during the corresponding period of 1880.

GLOOMY PREDICTIONS.

During the campaign there were not wanting politicians who urged that prohibition would impoverish the State, and would also prevent immigrants settling there, and especially that German immigrants would never be persuaded to make their homes in a State where lager could not be procured. Governor St. John, in an often-quoted speech, thus criticised those predictions in the light of events which have followed the prohibition law. "Let us see if we are losing business: Take the Santa Fé Road for instance, which earned in June, 1881, $438,998 more than it did in June, 1880. Business is increasing everywhere; our State never was so prosperous; let us see whether we are losing in dollars and cents or not. I find that in the year 1876 we commenced the biennial system of assessing real property. In 1877 there was no valuation on real property, and consequently the increase was on personal property alone; it amounted to $3,648,213.52; in 1879 the increase on personal property was $6,231,468.71, and in 1881 the increase on personal property reached $10,243,611.59. Can't we stand that kind of ruination?

WHERE WE LOSE.

"The population of the penitentiary, December 30th, 1880, was 725. July 1st, 1881, it was only 659; thus it will be seen that in one spot, and one only, are we losing population, and I think we can stand it.

"We were told that we should get no German immigration. I went down the Santa Fé Road not long since, and had to ride on the rear platform of the sleeper on a camp-stool, because there was no room in the inside of the train, and when I finally got in the front car I found it full of Germans. I supposed, of course, that they were going to New Mexico or Colorado, where they could get whiskey and beer, but discovered that they were really going to Kansas.

"A gentleman said to a man, who seemed to be acting as interpreter for them, 'Where are these people going?' and was informed, 'To Kansas.' 'Why,' said he, 'they can get no beer there.' The interpreter repeated the assertion to one who seemed to be a leader, then turned to the gentleman who had addressed him, and said, 'They say they are not going to Kansas for beer; that they go to secure a home for themselves and families; that a home gives more true happiness than all the beer manufactured.' I said to myself, they are on the right platform. They are coming to Kansas for a legitimate purpose, and we welcome them with all our hearts. We are having a better class of immigration this year than ever before."

Governor St. John is an effective orator, enviably successful in the principal test of a public speaker—viz., securing and holding the attention of his audience. He speaks slowly, correctly, and distinctly, showing no hesitancy and using no rhetorical device. There is, therefore, everything in his manner to add to the impressiveness of his subject and of his felicitous style of treating it. He knows the value of illustration to add to the weight of argument, but while his memory is stocked with apt anecdotes, he never tells one for its own sake, or to help him out of a failure in his speech. When delivering an address in the Cooper Union, New York, he related the following incident, which had occurred in connection with his own official duties, and it produced a sensation in the crowded assembly:

"A HEART-BROKEN WOMAN

came into my office with a babe in her arms to beg the pardon of her husband, who was under sentence of ten years' imprisonment in the penitentiary for homicide. She showed papers recommending the pardon from the judge who tried the man, the prosecuting attorney, and other prominent men. After closely examining the papers, I said, 'If I were to consult my personal feelings, I should gladly let your husband go; but I am bound by my official duty, and that forbids it.'

"The woman fell at my feet in a paroxysm of weeping. 'Then hear me,' she cried, 'till I tell you how he came to be where he is. We were married seven years ago; we went to a town (mentioning the place), and there in our little village we were happy. My husband was sober, industrious, and thrifty. By great exertion and self-denial we finally got our home paid for. But in an evil day the State licensed a saloon, and let it plant itself right between my husband's shop and our house. He was prospering so well that he could leave his business in other hands and lose an hour or two without feeling it. He was solicited to enter this saloon, and weakly yielded. Hour after hour he spent there, playing cards. One day he became embroiled in a drunken quarrel, and, fired by drink, struck a man and killed him.

"'He was tried and sent to the penitentiary for ten years, and I had nothing to live on. By and by the sheriff turned us out of our comfortable home into a rough shanty, neither lathed nor plastered. The cold wind came in through the walls and ceiling. My oldest boy took sick and died. Then little Tommy, my next, fell sick and died. Now this babe in my arms is sick, and I have nowhere to take it. The State licensed that saloon; and now in God's name I want you to set my husband free.' I said I would—and I did."

THE STATE MURDERED MY CHILDREN;

Innumerable instances are related of men who have been induced by Governor St. John's appeals, in public and in private, to quit drunken habits and lead sober lives. Fully occupied as he necessarily is with official duties, an opportunity to talk to a poor drunkard is one he has never been known to neglect, and there are few Sundays on which he is not preaching Gospel temperance in some city or village in his State. Somewhat above middle height, St. John is a fine specimen of physical manhood; robust, active, energetic, decisive in all his movements, he gives those with whom he comes in contact the impression of being vigorous in work, prompt in action, and unswerving in purpose; yet, with all his manly qualities, those who have seen him listening to a tale of distress or urging a dissipated man to forsake his evil ways, carry away a deeper impression of his delicacy, sympathetic kindness, and sensibility, for which other aspects of his character had not prepared them. It is not surprising that such a character should have aroused the unbounded enthusiasm of those citizens of Kansas whose views are in harmony with his own, or that he should have won a regard more devoted than is usually given to a mere politician. How fervent that affection is, is manifested when the name of St. John is mentioned to a citizen of the State, one of whom, in a letter we received during his Governorship, naïvely said, "We almost worship our Governor. Is it a sin?"

The Three Dangers now Menacing Society form the subject of a remarkable article, from the pen of Washington Gladden, in the current number of the Century. The writer is too well known to be set down as an alarmist, and it may therefore be hoped that the educated and wealthy classes, who hold him in high esteem, will heed the warning he solemnly gives. As Mr. Gladden points out, there are a multitude of evils working for the disintegration of society; but of that multitude three have grown to gigantic and formidable proportions. Of those three he gives the first place to the vice of intemperance. It is no part of his work to prove that the individual suffers by intemperance, but he proves incontestably that the intemperate man is an enemy to society, and that the six hundred million dollars spent in liquor in the United States in a year is spent in the purchase of "want, pauperism, vice, disease, insanity, and crime." Mr. Gladden might have added that we get a very liberal supply for the money. The second evil mentioned is the evils that directly assail the family. One startling fact he mentions will serve to show what those evils are. In 1860 there was one marriage to every 99 persons; in 1880 there was only one marriage to every 114 persons. In 1860 there was one divorce to every 51 marriages; in 1878 there was one divorce to every 21 marriages. As Mr. Gladden rightly says, "It is not possible to add to the significance of these figures." The third danger mentioned is the gambling mania. Mr. Gladden shows how the mania is increasing and the evil it produces, and mentions an estimate recently made that the "lambs" who gamble in Wall Street alone lose eight hundred million dollars a year. It is significant that such a writer should mention Christian ethics among the preservatives in which he trusts to save society from destruction by these forces. Christian readers will note the fact, and wish that he had given it still greater prominence.

A Vision of Blue Flames.—An Elderly, Respectable man thus spoke at a meeting lately: "Two and a half years ago, you would have found me standing at a bar, drinking, and ready to dispute or quarrel with anybody. I never personally knew a man who was so madly infatuated with drink as I was. I was standing drunk, on a Sabbath morning, on the north side of the river, with ten shillings in my pocket, longing for drink. Drunk as I was, I began to ask myself, 'What if I can't get home after I get my supply?' Shortly afterward, I found myself at the top of Clyde Street, Anderston. I don't know whether I slept or not, but I thought that I saw blue flames leaping round me, and my inward question was, 'Is this what I've come to at last?' At that moment a band of evangelists went past, singing as they walked. Scarcely knowing what I did, I rushed into their midst, and they took me along with them to their place of meeting. While sitting in the hall, I again dreamt that I was lost. I rushed down-stairs, and got into a dark passage, with tears streaming down my face. I stopped a man who was going past and asked, 'Will you go up-stairs and ask these people to pray for me, and I will follow you up?' He thought I was not in earnest and said, 'You can be saved where you are.' 'I know that well enough,' I answered, 'but it will do you no harm to oblige me.' He went up-stairs, and I followed him. He got me into a seat, and then prayed, 'Lord, if it be thy will, deliver this man from the love of drink.' I rose to my feet, staggered to the end of the seat, and prayed for myself. I then went home and got to bed. On awakening next morning, I remembered all about it, gave myself to Christ as my Saviour, and I have been both free and happy ever since."

THE NEEDLE.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Now there was at Joppa a certain disciple named Tabitha, which by interpretation is called Dorcas."—ACTS 9 : 36.

THERE is in Joppa, a seaport town, a woman with her needle embroidering her name inefaceably into the charities of the world. I see her sitting in the village home. In the doorway, and around about the building, and in the room where she sits are the pale faces of the poor. She listens to their plaint, she pities their woe, she makes garments for them, she adjusts the manufactured articles to suit the bent form of this invalid woman, and to the cripple that comes crawling on his hands and knees. She gives a coat to this one. She gives sandals to that one. With the gifts she mingles prayers, and tears, and Christian encouragement.

Then she goes out to be greeted on the street corners by those whom she has blessed, and all through the street the cry comes, "Dorcas is coming!" The sick look up gratefully in her face as she puts her hand on the burning brow, and the lost and the abandoned start up with hope as they hear her gentle voice, as though an angel had addressed them; and as she goes out the lane eyes half put out with sin think they see a halo of and a trail of glory in her pathway.

That night a half-paid shipwright climbs the hill and reaches home, and sees his little boy well clad, and says, "Where did these clothes come from?" And they tell him, "Dorcas has been here." In another place a woman is trimming a lamp; Dorcas brought the oil. In another place a family that had not been at table for many a week are gathered now, for Dorcas has brought bread.

But there is a sudden pause in that woman's ministry. They say: "Where is Dorcas? Why, we haven't seen her for many a day. Where is Dorcas?" And one of these poor people goes up and knocks at the door, and finds the mystery solved. All through the haunts of wretchedness the news comes,

"DORCAS IS SICK."

No bulletin flashing from the palace gate, telling the stages of a king's disease, is more anxiously awaited for than the news of this sick benefactress. Alas for Joppa! There is wailing, wailing. That voice which has uttered so many cheerful words is hushed; that hand which had made so many garments for the poor is cold and still; that star which had poured light into the midnight of wretchedness is dimmed by the blinding mists that go up from the river of death. In every God-forsaken place in that town; wherever there is a sick child and no balm; wherever there is hunger and no bread; wherever there is guilt and no commiseration; wherever there is a broken heart and no comfort, there are despairing looks, and streaming eyes, and frantic gesticulations, as they cry:

"DORCAS IS DEAD!"

They send for the apostle Peter. He urges his way through the crowd around the door, and stands in the presence of the dead. What lamentation and grief all about him! Here stand some of the poor people, who show the garments which this poor woman had made for them. Their grief cannot be appeased. The apostle Peter wants to perform a miracle. He will not do it amid the excited crowd, so he kindly orders that the whole room be cleared. The door is shut against the populace. The apostle stands now with the dead.

Oh, it is a serious moment, you know, when you are alone with a lifeless body! The apostle gets down on his knees and prays, and then he comes to the lifeless form of this one all ready for the sepulchre, and in the strength of Him who is the Resurrection, he exclaims: "Tabitha, arise!" There is a stir in the fountains of life; the heart flutters; the nerves thrill; the cheek flushes; the eye opens; she sits up!

We see in this subject

DORCAS THE DISCIPLE,

Dorcas the benefactress, Dorcas the lamented, Dorcas the resurrected. If I had not seen that word disciple in the text, I would have known this woman was a Christian. Such music as that never came from a heart which is not chorded and strung by divine grace. Before I show you the needlework of this woman, I want to show you her regenerated heart, the source of a pure life and of all Christian charities. I wish that wives, and mothers, and daughters, and sisters would imitate Dorcas in her discipleship. Before you sit with the Sabbath class, before you cross the threshold of the hospital, before you carry a pack of tracts down the street, before you enter upon the temptations and trials of the day, I charge you, in the name of God and by the turmoil and tumult of the judgment-day, O women, that you attend to the first, last, and greatest duty of your life—the seeking for God, and being at peace with Him.

Now, by the courtesies of society, you are deferred to, and he were less than a man who would not oblige you with kind attentions; but when the trumpet shall sound there will be an uproar and a wreck of mountain and continent, and no human arm can help you. Amid the rising of the dead, and amid the boiling of the sea, and amid the live, leaping thunders of the flying heavens there will be no chance for courtesies. But on that day, calm and placid will be every woman's heart who hath put her trust in Christ; calm, notwithstanding all the tumult, as though the fire in the heavens were only the gildings of an autumnal sunset, as though the peal of the trumpet were only the harmony of an orchestra, as though the awful voices of the sky were but a group of friends bursting through a gateway at eventime with laughter and shouting. Dorcas the disciple! Would to God that every Mary and every Martha would this day sit down at the feet of Jesus!

II. Further we see

DORCAS THE BENEFACTRESS.

History has told the story of the crown; the epic poet has sung of the sword; the pastoral poet, with his verses full of the redolence of clover tops and a-rustle with the silk of the corn, has sung the praises of the plough. I sound the praises of the needle. From the fig-leaf robe prepared in the Garden of Eden to the last stitch taken, the needle has wrought wonders of generosity, kindness, and benefaction. It adorned the girdle of the high-priest; it fashioned the curtains in the ancient tabernacle; it cushioned the chariots of King Solomon; it provided the robes of Queen Elizabeth, and in high places and in low places, by the fire of the pioneer's back log and under the flash of the chandelier—everywhere it has clothed nakedness, it has preached the Gospel, it has overcome hosts of penury and want with the war-cry of "Stitch! stitch! stitch!"

The operatives have found a livelihood by it, and through it the mansions of the employer have been constructed. Amid the greatest triumphs in all ages and lands I set down the conquests of the needle. I admit its crimes. I admit its cruelties. It has had more martyrs than the fire. It has butchered more souls than the inquisition. It has punctured the eye. It has pierced the side. It has struck weakness into the lungs. It has sent madness into the brain. It has filled the potter's field. It has pitched whole armies of the suffering into crime, and wretchedness, and woe. But now that I speak of Dorcas and her ministries to the poor, I shall relate only

THE CHARITIES OF THE NEEDLE.

This woman was a representative of all those women who make garments for the destitute, who knit socks for the barefooted, who prepare bandages for the lacerated, who fix up boxes of clothing for Western missionaries, who go into the asylums of the suffering and destitute, bearing that Gospel which is sight for the blind, and hearing for the deaf, and which makes the lame man leap like a hart, and brings the dead to life, immortal health bounding in their pulses.

What a contrast between the practical benevolence of this woman and a great deal of the charity of this day! This woman did not spend her time idly planning how the poor of Joppa were to be relieved; she took her needle and relieved them. She was not like those persons who sympathize with imaginary sorrows and go out in the street and laugh at the boy who has upset his basket of cold victuals, or like that charity which makes a rousing speech on the benevolent platform and goes out to kick the beggar from the step, crying, "Hush your miserable howling!" The sufferers of the world want not so much theory as practice; not so much tears as dollars; not so much kind wishes as loaves of bread; not so much smiles as shoes; not so much "God bless yous!" as jackets and frocks.

I will put one earnest Christian man, hard-working, against 5000 mere theorists on the subject of charity. There are a great many who have fine ideas about church arrchitecture who never in their life helped to build a church. There are men who can give you the history of Buddhism and Mohammedanism who never sent a farthing for their evangelization. There are women who talk beautifully about the suffering of the world who never had the courage, like Dorcas, to take the needle and assault it.

I am glad that there is not a page of the world's history which is not a record of

FEMALE BENEVOLENCE.

God says to all lands and people, "Come now, and hear the widow's mite rattle down into the poor-box. The Princess of Conti sold all her jewels that she might help the famine-stricken. Queen Blanche, the wife of Louis VIII. of France, hearing that there were some persons unjustly incarcerated in the prisons, went out amid the rabble and took a stick and struck the door as a signal that they might all strike it, and down went the prison-door, and out came the prisoners. Queen Maud, the wife of Henry I., went down amid the poor and washed their sores and administered to them cordials. Mrs. Retson, at Matagorda, appeared on the battle-field while the missiles of death were flying around, and cared for the wounded.

But why go so far back? Why go so far away? Is there a man or woman who has forgotten the women of the sanitary and Christian commissions, or the fact that before the smoke had gone up from Gettysburg and South Mountain the women of the North met the women of the South on the battle-field, forgetting all their animosities while they bound up the wounded and closed up the eyes of the slain? Have you forgotten? Dorcas the benefactress!

III. I come now to speak of

DORCAS THE LAMENTED.

When death struck down that good woman, oh, how much sorrow there was in Joppa! I suppose there were women there with larger fortunes; women perhaps with handsomer faces; but there was no grief at their departure like this at the death of Dorcas. There was not more turmoil and upturning in the Mediterranean Sea dashing against the wharves of that seaport, than there were surgings to and fro of grief in Joppa because Dorcas was dead.

There are a great many who go out of life and are unmissed. There may be a very large funeral; there may be a great many carriages and a plumed hearse; there may be high-sounding eulogiums; the bell may toll at the cemetery gate; there may be a very fine marble shaft reared over the resting-place; but the whole thing may be a falsehood and a sham. The Church of God has lost nothing. The world has lost nothing. It is only a nuisance abated; it is only a grumbler ceasing to find fault; it is only an idler stopped yawning; it is only a dissipated fashionable parted from his wine cellar; while, on the other hand, no useful Christian leaves this world without being missed. The Church of God cries out, like the prophet, "Howl, fir-tree, for the cedar has fallen!" Widowhood comes and shows the garments which the departed had made. Orphans are lifted up to look into the calm face of the sleeping benefactress. Reclaimed vagrancy comes and kisses the cold brow of her who charmed it away from sin, and all through the streets of Joppa there is mourning, mourning because Dorcas is dead.

I suppose you have read of the fact that when Josephine was carried out to her grave there were a great many men and women of pomp, and pride, and position, that went out after her; but I am most affected by the story of history that on that day there were 10,000 of the poor of France who followed her coffin, weeping and wailing until the air rang again because when they lost Josephine they lost their last earthly friend. Oh, who would not rather have such obsequies than all the tears that were ever poured in the lachrymals that have been exhumed from ancient cities?

There may be no mass for the dead; there may be no costly sarcophagus; there may be no elaborate mausoleum; but in the damp cellars of the city and through the lonely huts of the mountain glen there will be mourning, mourning, mourning, because Dorcas is dead. "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; they rest from their labors, and their works do follow them."

IV. I speak to you of

DORCAS THE RESURRECTED.

The apostle came to where she was and said, "Arise," and she sat up. In what a short compass the great writer put that "She sat up!" Oh, what a time there must have been when the apostle brought her out among her old friends! How the tears of joy must have started! What clapping of hands there must have been! what singing! what laughter! Sound it all through the lane! Shout it down that dark alley! Let all Joppa hear it! Dorcas is resurrected! You and I have seen the same thing many a time; not a dead body resuscitated, but the deceased coming up again after death in the good accomplished. If a man labors up to fifty years of age serving God, and then dies, we are apt to think that his earthly work is done. No! His influence on earth will continue till the world ceases. Services rendered for Christ never stop.

Here is a Christian woman. She toils for the upbuilding of a church through many anxieties, through many self-denials, with prayers and tears, and then she dies. It is fifteen years since she went away. Now the spirit of God descends upon that church; hundreds of souls stand up and confess the faith of Christ. Has that Christian woman, who went away fifteen years ago, nothing to do with these things? I see the flowering-out of her noble heart. I hear the echo of her footsteps in all these songs over sins forgiven, in all the prosperity of the church. The good that seemed to be buried has come up again. Dorcas is resurrected.

After awhile all these womanly

FRIENDS OF CHRIST

will put down their needle forever. After making garments for others, some one will make a garment for them, the last robe we ever wear—the robe for the grave. You will have heard the last cry of pain. You will have witnessed the last orphanage. You will have come in worn out from your last round of mercy. I do not know where you will sleep, nor what your epitaph will be; but there will be a lamp burning at that tomb and an angel of God guarding it, and through all the long night no rude foot will disturb the dust. Sleep on, sleep on! Soft bed, pleasant shadows, undisturbed repose! Sleep on!

"Asleep in Jesus! Blessed sleep!
From which none ever wake to weep!"

Then, one day, there will be a sky-rending, and a whirl of wheels, and the flash of a pageant, armies marching, chains clanking, banners waving, thunders booming, and that Christian woman will arise from the dust, and she will be surrounded by the wanderers of the street whom she reclaimed, surrounded by the wounded souls to whom she administered! Daughter of God, so strangely surrounded, what means this? It means that reward has come, that the victory has been won, that the crown is ready, that the banquet is spread. Shout it through all the crumbling earth! Sing it through all the flying heavens! Dorcas is resurrected!

In 1855, when some of the soldiers came back from the Crimean war to London, the Queen of England distributed among them beautiful medals, called Crimean medals. Galleries were erected for the two Houses of Parliament and the royal family to sit in. There was a great audience to witness the distribution of the medals. A colonel who had lost both feet in the battle of Inkermann was pulled in on a wheeled chair; others came in limping on their crutches. Then the Queen of England arose before them, in the name of her government, and uttered words of commendation to the officers and the men, and distributed these medals inscribed with the four great battle-fields—Alma, Balaklava, Inkermann, and Sebastopol. As the Queen gave these to the wounded men and the wounded officers, the bands of music struck up the national air, and the people, with streaming eyes, joined in the song:

"God save our noble Queen!
Long live our gracious Queen!
God save the Queen!

And then they shouted "Huzza! huzza!" Oh, it was for those returned warriors! But a brighter, better, and gladder day will come when Christ shall gather those who have toiled in His service, good soldiers of Jesus Christ. He shall rise before them, and in the presence of all the glorified in heaven He will say: "Well done, good and faithful servant!" And then He will distribute the medals of eternal victory, not inscribed with works of righteousness which we have done, but with those four great battle-fields, dear to earth and dear to heaven—Bethlehem! Nazareth! Gethsemane! Calvary!

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

An Interesting Experiment with Diamonds has been conducted by French scientists. It has long been asserted by some and denied by others that the diamond has the power of retaining light and of afterward emitting it in the dark. The theory has been often stated, but has not been easy of test. All, or nearly all, the great diamonds—such as the Kohinoor, the Regent, the Grand Mogul—cannot be made the subject of experiment, and stones of a lesser size do not always give satisfactory results. Happily, a private individual, the owner of a gem of remarkable purity, lent his diamond for scientific investigations. These have been most satisfactory, and the "phosphorescance" of the stone may be regarded as proved. The diamond was exposed for an hour to the direct action of the sun's rays and afterward removed into a dark room. For more than twenty minutes afterward it emitted a light so bright as to render visible objects within reach of its rays. It then gradually paled, until again submitted to the sun's rays. It is thus with God's jewels. The light they give in the world is derived from the Sun of Righteousness, and they would not give out light if they did not live always in the light of God's presence." "The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord (Prov. 20 : 27).

A Strange Contract has been Made Between a citizen and Jo Daviess County, Illinois. The citizen, whose name is Becker, lost his wife last fall, and in consequence became depressed and unable to attend to his business. He possessed some property, but could not take care of it, and wandered around aimlessly, losing his money to unscrupulous men, who took advantage of his helplessness. The attention of the county attorney was called to the case, and the man was cared for. Finally he executed a deed transferring his property to the county, in return for which the county officers undertook to provide for him for life. Becker appeared to feel relief when the arrangement was complete, and recovered somewhat his health and spirits. He has confidence in the integrity and capacity of the county, and has no anxiety about the future. The duties of the county, however, end at his grave; but he need not be distressed about his condition beyond that, if he will go to Jesus in a similar spirit of helplessness and exercise a similar faith in Him (II Tim. 1 : 12).

A Prudent Squirrel is the Domestic Pet of a family in Dutchess County, N. Y. It appears that for a long time one of the pets of the household has been a red squirrel. Three weeks ago the cage door was left open and the squirrel escaped out of doors. It was chased by boys, and its owner last saw it jumping from tree to tree. Its whereabouts was lost sight of in the darkness, and the family made up their minds that their pet was lost to them. The squirrel, however, surprised the family by running into the breakfast-room one morning last week, and, jumping upon the table, greedily began to drink milk out of a cup. It appeared to be nearly starved to death. It was emaciated to a degree, and its coat of hair had been torn out in spots by the roots, evidently the result of a fight with some animal in the woods on or near the Fishkill Mountain. Now, when the outside door of the house is left open, the squirrel looks out, but refuses to cross the door-sill. The squirrel thus sets an example which might be followed with advantage by men who, having fallen into trouble in the haunts of sin, are inclined to renew their visits (Prov. 23 : 35).

A Child's Perilous Position Caused Some excitement in an up-town street in New York last week. An aged woman went out shopping, leaving her little granddaughter, a child six years old, asleep on a lounge in her room. When she returned half an hour later she saw a crowd around the house eagerly looking up to the stone coping, on which the child stood trembling. It appeared that the little girl, awakening soon after her grandmother's departure, became alarmed at finding the door locked, and crawled out of the window. She let herself down until she stood on the stone projection of the upper part of the window on the floor below, while, terror-stricken, she held to the sill of the window of her grandmother's room. She was wailing softly, and several persons, expecting she would fall, ran for and extended blankets to save her. But a policeman managed to enter the room and seize the child just as her courage and strength were giving out. There is reason to fear that many children occupy in spiritual matters a position equally perilous through similar neglect. Parents suffer them to sleep on unenlightened, and place confidence in some safeguard of their own contriving which is apt to fail when most needed (Prov. 29 : 15).

A Remarkable Illustration of the Power of prayer is quoted by the Brooklyn Union. It is stated that for one hundred and twenty years a ship has annually left England for the Moravian mission in the arctic regions of this continent, and that in every instance special prayers have been offered for the safety of that particular vessel. In the whole time not a single ship or passenger has been lost by storm, iceberg, or wreck.

THE HOPE OF ISRAEL.

By Rev. J. Gossett Tanner, M.A.

The Present Condition of Palestine—Apparently Hopeless—Rocky and Barren—How Water will be Obtained—The Predicted Earthquake—Recently Discovered Reservoirs—A Legend of an Arab—The Germs of the Change—Four Details of the Restoration.

IF a stranger visits that country which was once the glory of all lands for beauty and fertility, a land of brooks of water, a land flowing with milk and honey, he is amazed and disappointed as he passes over rocky terraces and hills scantily covered with loose, friable soil, and apparently possessing no capacity for supporting a large and flourishing population. And some even of the Lord's people are prone to exclaim in unbelief: "The days of the Holy Land are past: its sun has set forever: Ichabod is written on its desert rocks as well as upon the fortunes of its people. Israel has lost God's favor forever. The nation will never be restored."

But you and I firmly believe God's promise in Amos 9: 14, 15. We are persuaded that every jot and tittle which God has spoken shall surely come to pass.

An abundant supply of living water is necessary for the fertilization of the soil, and it is remarkable that on this vital matter there are

which singularly agree—Joel 3: 18, "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the mountains shall drop down new wine, and the hills shall flow with milk, and all the rivers of Judah shall flow with waters, and a fountain shall come forth of the house of the Lord, and shall water the valley of Shittim." Then the explicit and full passage in Ezek. 47: 1–12, "Afterward he brought me again unto the door of the house; and, behold, waters issued out from under the threshold of the house eastward: for the forefront of the house stood toward the east, and the waters came down from under from the right side of the house, at the south side of the altar. Then brought he me out of the way of the gate northward, and led me about the way without unto the utter gate by the way that looketh eastward; and, behold, there ran out waters on the right side." Then follows a description of the waters—how they increase in depth and volume until they become "waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over." The eighth verse shows us whither they run—"out toward the east." And the ninth verse informs us that it is

A RIVER OF LIFE.

The third passage—for at the mouth of two or three witnesses shall every word be established—is Zech. 14: 4, which gives us a hint of the way in which these great physical changes shall be brought about—viz., by an earthquake to take place as soon as the feet of the Lord Jesus shall touch Mount Zion.

Now I firmly believe that all these portions of Scripture will be literally and exactly fulfilled when the Redeemer comes to Zion, that a great river will run from Jerusalem toward the Dead Sea, and another branch toward the Mediterranean. Hitherto Jerusalem has been almost the only great city of the world not built on a river. But that deficiency will be supplied by an exercise of God's almighty power. In what is at present the dry and desolate bed of the Kedron shall flow an abundant river right to the Dead Sea—no more dead then, but a living sea, abounding in fish as the fish of the Great Sea, exceeding many.

Now, the means the Lord will use are illustrated by recent discoveries. A little book, lately issued, on under the Temple Hill," states—and it is a fact which has been fully confirmed—that vast reservoirs exist under the Temple Hill, which seems to be completely honeycombed by underground aqueducts and cisterns. It has been computed that thirty-five of these excavations could hold ten million gallons of water. One of the largest and best known of these excavations is called the Great Sea. In the third century a large subterranean fountain sent forth a never-failing stream from under the Temple. An early writer speaks of it as "a perennial fountain of water," and states that these river-courses, or excavations, extend a great way, and have many secret entrances, only known to the servants of the holy place. The Great Sea is forty-three feet deep. Its area covers eleven thousand feet, and it can hold three million gallons of water. Another cistern is still of greater depth, being sixty-two feet deep.

There is a legend of an Arab, employed in clearing one of the passages, who ventured to walk along, and, after going a considerable distance, found it becoming lighter and lighter. At length he reached (so runs the legend) a garden of exceeding beauty and loveliness. He plucked a leaf from one of the trees, with which he returned, and when examined it was declared a leaf from the tree of paradise. The only fresh water now in Jerusalem issues from these reservoirs, and, after appearing at the Fountain of the Virgin, it pursues an underground course until it reaches the Pool of Siloam, and thence by the Kedron Valley into the Dead Sea.

Now we can gather from this, first of all, there was a very considerable fountain under the foundation of the Temple, which, by reason of the sins of the nation, and, physically, the cutting down of the forests, has been dried up to a great extent. Still we see which the Lord may make use of as the germs of the great physical changes which He hath foretold.

These blessings have the closest possible connection with the return of the Lord. This is brought before us in the key text, Isa. 59: 20, "The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto them that turn from transgression in Jacob, saith the Lord." What is it causes the change? "Arise, shine, for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee." Therefore I hold that while it is possible some of the Jews may be restored yet many more will follow. "Lift up thine eyes round about, and see: all they gather themselves together, they come to thee: thy sons shall come from far, and thy daughters shall be nursed at thy side."

IN AN UNCONVERTED STATE,

Have you ever noticed the clue to Ps. 107? It is the Psalm of the restoration of Israel. Thanks are rendered, and the exhortation is, "Let the redeemed of the Lord say so, whom He hath redeemed out of the hand of the enemy." And the writer proceeds, "He gathered them out of the lands, from the east, and from the west, from the north, and from the south." Has that ever come to pass yet? Never! When has the Lord gathered His people from the east, the west, the north, and the south?

Then you notice there follow four paragraphs answering to the Lord's way of bringing back Israel from the four quarters of the earth, each paragraph concluding with the ascription of praise, "Oh that men would praise the Lord for His goodness, and for His wonderful works to the children of men!"

1. Notice they

COME FROM THE EAST.

"They wandered in the wilderness in a solitary way: they found no city to dwell in. Hungry and thirsty, their soul fainted in them." Evidently referring to the great deserts of Bokhara, Beloochistan, the Arabian deserts and other eastern wildernesses.

2. They come from the west. "They sit in the darkness and in the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron." What was the condition of the Jews in Spain and many parts of Europe? Literally they were in the shadow of death and in iron bondage for hundreds of years. In the very public gardens of Germany has been seen the announcement, "Beggars, dogs, and Jews not admitted here." So this paragraph describes them coming from the west.

3. Then in the next paragraph (17–20) we have them coming from the north, which I take to be Russia. They are afflicted; "their soul abhorreth all manner of meat, they draw near the gates of death;" clearly describing the pestilence and persecutions they have endured and still endure in the north. Already we have as it were a first-fruits coming from Russia, and we rejoice that an open door of access has been gained to many of these poor and desolate ones.

4. Then follows (23–30) a description of their coming from the south, for those who come from South Africa and America must come in ships.

The great Jubilee is coming when all the ransomed shall be kings and priests unto God, but Israel will have its own kingdom in which Abraham and David will be two of the chief princes.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Happiest Person in the Parish.—Dr. Boyd related the following reminiscence: "When I was a country minister in Scotland, some time ago, the most joyous person in my parish was a poor old woman whose every joint was knotted with rheumatism; her husband was a poor laboring old man, her home a crowded hut, yet her life was bright and cheerful. When I was dejected I used to visit her, and after ten minutes' conversation my load would be lightened. She diffused gladness wherever she was, because the Holy Spirit dwelt in her as a temple."

A Teacher's Golden Key.—"The Superintendent of a Sabbath-school noticed that one of his teachers had obtained a great influence over a rough set of scholars. Being desirous of finding out the secret, he inquired: 'How did you obtain such power over these children?' 'Oh, I have got a golden key,' he answered. 'What is it?' asked the superintendent. 'Love!' was the teacher's response. Notice, it was not kindness, gentleness, or giving gifts, but real, true, heartfelt love toward each unit of the class. They were not merely scholars but friends as well, and each scholar knew it, for we cannot hide love—it is easily seen. How wonderfully Jesus Christ, our Great Teacher, has commended His love to us!"

Result of a "Wretched Sermon."—The Rev. Mr. Lowe related: "I remember distinctly the case of a young woman, in connection with my own congregation, who was roused from a state of spiritual apathy, by attending an evangelistic meeting such as this, to an acute perception of her lost condition as a sinner. She was in great mental distress, when she attended a service, during which I preached what I thought a most wretched sermon. At the conclusion I said, 'Friends, do not look to anything I have said, but take the New Testament, read the last chapters of Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, where there is recorded actual historical facts. Upon these facts depend the whole of the religion of Jesus.' These remarks opened a new view to the distressed young woman. She went home to her lodgings, read the chapters I spoke about; light flooded her soul, and she got grace to accept Christ and to follow the Lord."

Converted in an Infirmary.—Mr. Clyde said: "One of our brethren died last week rejoicing in Christ as his Saviour. For the encouragement of those who visit the Infirmary, I will tell you how he was converted. Three years ago he was a Roman Catholic by profession, and was laid up in the Royal Infirmary by a severe attack of illness. So ill was he that the doctor told him that he had no chance of life. Wholly unprepared, as he felt himself to be, for eternity, he was in a state of great fear. One day a tract was put into his hand, and he read the words, 'Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved.' He obeyed this injunction and found rest for his troubled soul in Christ, and what is more, he got restored in health and lived for three years to glorify God by his life and death. When the nurse was telling his wife of his death, she remarked, 'Surely your husband was a Christian, for he was always in the attitude of prayer; even when he died, his hands were held up together, as though he were praying?' The widow's reply was, 'if ever there was a Christian he was.' Could there be more emphatic testimony than this? His wife is a colored woman, and a Roman Catholic. Pray that she may have Jesus as her Saviour."

A Dead Mother's Beautiful Child.—"About thirty-five miles from Glasgow, exactly thirty-five years ago, a poor hunger-bitten wanderer called at the house of a relative of mine. She had in her arms a beautiful baby girl. The weary mother was the picture of death, and as she sat down without a word, the good wife saw that something was wrong, and gave the wanderer food. Alas! it was too late to do her good, and she died on the spot where she sat. The good man buried the mother, and though he had a large family of his own, he kept the baby for Christ's sake, and none of his own were dearer to him than this one. No one ever inquired after either mother or child, but God has smiled on him ever since, and given him abundant prosperity and blessing. He had entertained angels without knowing it."

A Life-Long Desire Gratified.—Mr. Cruickshank recently said: "Seventeen years ago, at the close of a missionary meeting, there might have been seen a little boy whose soul was fired by what he had heard that night, of the needs of the perishing heathen, and even then he was very anxious to offer himself to go out as a missionary of the cross of Christ. All these years the prevailing idea of that lad has been, 'How can I get away to preach the Gospel to the heathen?' For some years back it has been impressed upon his mind that Africa was the place to which he should go, and he made it a matter of prayer that he should be sent there. That boy, now grown to manhood, stands before you to testify that his aspirations and prayers have been answered, and that to-morrow he leaves for the Congo district in Africa, to publish there, if God shall spare him, the glad tidings of salvation."

Calmness in the Face of Death.—The Rev. Mr. Arthur remarked: "When I was in Paris recently I was much struck with the aspect of work there. I remember one, a blind organist, who told me that four years ago he was a Roman Catholic, and played the organ in the Romish churches; but on his conversion he had to give up this means of living, and to trust in the Lord for his support. Now he and his pious Protestant wife work together for the Master. One man was given up by the hospital doctors, but cheated them by recovering. The medical men ascribed his recovery to his great calmness in the face of death. One doctor asked him, 'How is it you were so calm in the face of death?' Pulling out a New Testament, he replied, 'This is the cause.' 'Let me see it.' After looking over a few pages the doctor asked, 'May I take this home with me?' 'Yes.' And so the New Testament went to be a blessing to the doctor's family."

A Reformed Inebriate's Fear.—At a Recent Mizpah meeting a man said: "Two years ago I was in the habit of drinking regularly, for a time, to excess, then, becoming ashamed of my conduct, I would repent for a little time, and be sober, till I set to drinking again, quite unable to abstain. I attended one of Mr. Moody's meetings, and got a seat pretty far back, where I could only hear a word or two at a time. These words were sufficient to make me weep before God for my sins, and for six dreary weeks I had a great struggle with myself. Above all things I hated hypocrisy, and the devil told me that if I trusted in Jesus, and made a public confession of my faith, that I would fall again. So I argued with myself 'What's the use? I shall fall again; it's no good for the like of me,' and so on. At the end of the six weeks I went to another meeting of Mr. Moody's, along with some friends. When he asked those who wished to be prayed for to stand up, I felt it my duty to do so, but was restrained by the cowardly fear of my companions; but, at last, God gave me power to stand, and my brother followed my example. My soul was saved through trust in Christ, and I have been kept by the power of His grace ever since"

NEW BOOKS.

Mr. Philip Phillips, whose Gospel songs have delighted audiences in all climes, has written a most fascinating work under the title

"SONG PILGRIMAGE

Round the World." In The Christian Herald of March 17th, 1881, we published, with a portrait of this "singing pilgrim," a brief narrative of his wandering. Those of our readers who remember that narrative can easily understand how intensely interesting must be the story Mr. Phillips has to tell in his book. It includes, as the title-page indicates, experiences, sights, anecdotes, incidents, impressions of men and things throughout twenty different countries.

Mr. Phillips has much to say of his own country, having visited all its chief cities and thousands of less prominent places, singing the Gospel everywhere and holding the people entranced with his melodies. In Canada he commenced his tour at the Eastern coast, passing thence to the shores of the Western lakes, visiting, as he did so, in response to urgent requests, places on both sides of his direct route. In Great Britain he covered the country from the extreme north to the shores of the English Channel. In Ireland, too, he sang his songs to appreciative audiences. He visited and made extensive tours in Italy, Germany, Austria, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, France, and Holland. Turning his face eastward, he visited the Holy Land and its historic sites. India, with its teeming millions lying in spiritual darkness, was next visited, and Mr. Phillips passed through its chief cities, singing as he went at mission stations and in churches the story of the Cross. In Egypt and in the Sandwich Islands also Mr. Phillips found opportunities for singing, of which he gladly availed himself. During all these journeyings he closely observed, with the penetrating eyes of an enlightened American citizen the places through which he passed and the men with whom he came in contact. The chief object of his journey was to sing the Gospel, and that object brought him into acquaintance with Christian men and with other men, who were not Christians, but who were attracted to his meetings by their love of music. He had thus exceptional opportunities of seeing innumerable types of the religious character.

From such an experience it will be understood that Mr. Phillips must have collected abundant materials for a book of more than ordinary interest, and such has been the case. The "Song Pilgrimage" has not a dull page in it, and while it interests it also conveys a vast quantity of useful information. The value of the book is enhanced by its numerous excellent engravings of picturesque scenes, public buildings, churches, etc., some of which are full-page engravings. At the end of the book Mr. Phillips has given the music and words of the sacred songs he had the happiness of singing in the various places he visited. There are seventy of these songs, and they include such favorites as: "Almost Persuaded;" "Cling to the Mighty One;" "Home of the Soul;" "No Tears in Heaven;" "The Better Land," etc. "Song Pilgrimage" is published by Messrs. Phillips & Hunt, 805 Broadway, New York.

Mr. Edward Ryder has sent us a copy of his excellent work, the the philanthropist, preacher and prison reformer, compiled from her journal and other sources. It is published by E. Walker's Son, 14 Dey Street, New York. Mr. Ryder has in this work modestly contented himself with the part of an editor, believing, as he informs us in his preface, that Mrs. Fry's own words and those of her two daughters will best serve to render the reader acquainted with her true character.

The following sketch of

as it existed before Mrs. Fry commenced her beneficent labors, we extract from Mr. Ryder's able work as a specimen of its contents: "At that time all the female prisoners in Newgate were confined in that part now known as 'the untried side.' The larger portion of the quadrangle was then used as a state prison. The partition wall was not of sufficient height to prevent the state prisoners from overlooking the narrow yard and the windows of the two wards and two cells, of which the women's division consisted. These four rooms comprised about one hundred and ninety superficial yards, into which, at the time of Mrs. Fry's first visit, nearly three hundred women, with their numerous children, were crowded; tried and untried, misdemeanants and felons, without classification, without employment, and with no other superintendence than that given by a man and his son, who had charge of them by night and by day. In the same room, in rags and dirt, destitute of sufficient clothing (for which there was no provision), sleeping without bedding on the floor, the boards of which were in part raised to supply a sort of pillow, they lived.

"With the proceeds of their clamorous begging, when any stranger appeared among them, the prisoners purchased liquors from a regular tap in the prison. Spirits were openly drunk, and the ear was assailed by the most terrible language. Beyond that which was necessary for safe custody, there was little restraint over their communication with the world without.

"Although military sentinels were posted on the leads of the prison, such was the lawlessness prevailing, that even the governor of the prison entered this portion of it with reluctance. Fearful that their watches would be snatched from their sides, he advised the ladies (though without avail) to leave them in his house. Into this scene Mrs. Fry and her single lady companion entered, and as her custom was, she dispensed with the protection of the jailer, and was locked in with the crowd of prisoners, more than one of whom was a murderess."

"ROME IN AMERICA"

is the title of an arousing work from the pen of Rev. Justin D. Fulton, D.D., published by Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls. The title of the first chapter supplies the key-note to the book. It is, "Can American Citizens Safely Invest in Romanism?" Dr. Fulton proceeds to show why they cannot do so, and points out the radical errors of Romish doctrine, explaining how each affects the life of a citizen who holds it.

How necessary it is that citizens should be put on their guard against this insidious foe to civil and religious liberty is realized as the reader follows Dr. Fulton's statistics of the spread of its influence and his statement of the position it has already attained. One paragraph will suffice to show the aim and spirit of the book. Dr. Fulton says: "In America, such is the influence of the priests over the minds of the deluded votaries of Romanism, that idols are openly kept on sale, and the people bow down to stocks of wood and stone in Boston with as devout worship as characterizes devotees of pagan lands, while the Bible is seldom found in a Romanist home. It is said that they do not worship the image, but the God represented and behind it. This may be true of some, but that it is not true of the multitudes is apparent from the sacrifices they make to obtain an image or a candle for their homes. It is known that many a poor Irish family in Boston took the money given them by the city to purchase food for their families and bought instead a candle consecrated by the priest and to be burned before their idol at Christmas. Thus, while Rome neglects her poor and builds great establishments, which are but nurseries of Romanism, American citizens by a tax support and feed the fires of Romish superstition."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Foreign Commerce of the Country During the past twelve months was smaller than that of the previous year. From a report issued last week by Mr. Nimmo, the chief of the Bureau of Statistics, it appears that the balance of trade in favor of the United States during the last fiscal year was $72,798,997, as against a balance in our favor during the year ended June 30th, 1883, of $100,658,488. The total value of the exports of merchandise during the fiscal year just closed amounted to $740,513,560, as against $823,839,402 during the preceding fiscal year, a falling off of $83,325,842. The imports of merchandise amounted to $667,714,563, as against $723,180,914 during the preceding fiscal year, a falling off of $55,466,351. The decrease in the total value of exports of domestic merchandise during the year ended June 30th, 1884, was due chiefly to the falling off in the exports of cotton, manufactures of cotton, wheat, wheat flour, hops, tobacco and manufactures of tobacco, and fruits. The only items among the imports showing an increase were sugar, molasses, and coffee; in all other articles there was a decrease more or less heavy.

A Most Enthusiastic Meeting of Irishmen was held in Chickering Hall, New York, on July 28th to indorse the candidacy of Mr. Blaine for the Presidency. The large building was packed to its utmost capacity, and the most complete unanimity prevailed. This is the more remarkable because the Irish vote in New York has usually been cast in previous contests for Democratic candidates. The names of Blaine and Logan elicited outbursts of enthusiastic cheering every time they were mentioned. The speakers were all Irishmen, some of whom have suffered imprisonment for political offences in their own country. The Rev. George W. Pepper, a Methodist minister, who was one of the speakers, said that when he was in Ireland in 1881 he made remarks that were considered disrespectful to the Queen, and he was arrested. But when he showed the policeman Mr. Blaine's name on his passport and told him that "that man would 'defend" him "with the armies of the United States," he was released. Therefore he should vote for Mr. Blaine. Resolutions were passed pledging the Irish vote to the Republican candidates. It is not supposed that the meeting could control all votes of that nationality, many of them being controlled by Kelly and Tammany Hall, but it is believed that the accessions of Irish Democrats will more than compensate in New York for the loss of the Independent Republicans.

Governor Cleveland was Formally Notified of his nomination to the Presidency on Tuesday, July 29th. As usual in such cases, the chairman of the convention was accompanied by a representative from every State and Territory. Colonel Vilas, the chairman, in addressing the candidate, said that the National Democracy seek a President, not in compliment for what the man is, or reward for what he has done, but in a just expectation of what he will accomplish as the true servant of a free people, fit for their lofty trust. They place their reliance for the usefulness of the services they expect to exact for the benefit of the nation upon the evidence derived from the services performed by the Governor for the State of New York. Governor Cleveland in the course of his reply defined his attitude in the contest as being "not merely to gain a partisan advantage, but pledged to give to those who trust us the utmost benefits of a pure and honest administration of national affairs." At a public meeting held in the evening at Albany a letter was read from Mr. S. J. Tilden expressing his approval of the ticket, and a speech was made by Mr. Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, in which he pledged it his support.

The Nomination of Ex-Governor St. John has given general satisfaction in the party. Since it was made the Prohibitionists have been full of enthusiasm, and claim their ability to carry enough States to throw the Presidential election into the House of Representatives. Secretary Swoger, in a conversation with a reporter, recently said: "The plan of the campaign has been fully indicated by the nomination of St. John and Daniels. The leaders are now considering whether to select a few States and capture their electoral vote, or to make a determined effort in all of the twenty States in which the party is organized." Promises of funds are being made with unexpected liberality.

The Inaugurative Ratification Meeting of the Prohibition campaign was held at Cumberland, Md., on July 28th. Notwithstanding the unfavorable weather, there being a drenching rain-storm, the large Academy of Music was filled with an overflowing audience. Among the speakers were the Hon. William Daniel, the candidate for the Vice-Presidency; Major George A. Hilton, of Washington, D. C., and Miss Frances E. Willard, President of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. The utmost enthusiasm prevailed, and the platform and ticket were warmly indorsed. The character and high social standing of those present at the meeting were a surprise to the workers for the old political parties. If that meeting furnishes an indication of the classes who will support the Prohibition candidates, a further surprise is in store. The dissatisfaction prevailing in both the Republican and Democratic parties may lead large numbers of temperance men in both parties to cast their votes for candidates who represent reform in the most formidable and gigantic evil of the day.

The New Orleans Exposition Promises to be one of the most brilliant of recent times. From statements made by the committee in charge, it appears that the park in which it is to be held is 9000 feet by 2000 feet. The building itself is 1378 feet long and 905 feet wide and covers thirty-three acres, one third more than the main building at the Centennial Exhibition at Philadelphia. The music hall, situated in the centre of the building, will seat 11,000 persons. There is to be a tower, 115 feet in height, on which is a platform where the visitor can get an exceptionally fine view of the city and the river. A feature of the exposition will be the Agricultural Hall, where everything connected with agricultural matters will be represented. This hall is being built by the city of New Orleans at a cost of $100,000. A railroad is also being made round the park, and an elevated railroad is being built to run from the centre of the city to the Exposition Building. Besides this, St. Charles Street is being asphalted, so that this street, which is one of the best in New Orleans and runs right up to the park, will form a splendid carriage drive. A wharf on the side of the park on the Mississippi River has been built for steamers. The committee has a capital of $1,000,000 raised by subscription in New Orleans, and lately Congress has voted another million to help forward the enterprise. Besides this many of the States have also set apart sums for the same purpose. President Arthur will open the exposition on December 4th, and the inaugural address will be made by Secretary Lincoln. It is intended that it shall remain open until May 31st, 1885.

The Survivors of the Greely Expedition arrived at Portsmouth, N. H., on August 1st, where they received a warm reception. The meeting between Lieutenant Greely and his wife and children, his mother and family was deeply affecting. A public reception of an imposing character was accorded to the party on August 4th. It has been found necessary to retain all the members of the expedition in the hospital, owing to their enfeebled condition. Lieutenant Greely insisted that he was well in every way, except that he was weak. The surgeons gave it as their opinion that Greely would require great care, his condition being rather unfavorable. He has gained flesh at the rate of two or three pounds daily, but it is soft and flabby and contains no muscular strength. The rest of the survivors have also gained flesh too rapidly, although not in so marked a degree as in the case of Lieutenant Greely.

The Negligence of Congress in Not Passing the Utah or some other bill to check polygamy at its last session, is rendered increasingly deplorable by the publication of the news from the Mormon Territory. The Utah correspondents of a Boston journal state that Mormonism is expending unusual vigor in colonizing Arizona and Idaho, sending their drafted men to buy up farms from the Gentiles at liberal prices, or to preoccupy unimproved land till their emigrants arrive and take possession. Mormon preachers insist openly on the duty of plural marriage, as if it were not a crime against the law of the land. President Taylor recently ordered the bishops to cut off from the church every Mormon who should dare to send his children to outside schools. A Mormon high in authority said to one of these correspondents: "We are sending emigrants with our polygamy to Arizona, Colorado, Wyoming, New Mexico, Idaho, Montana, and Oregon, and your government cannot stop it. In a short time we will rule some of these Territories absolutely, as we now rule Utah, and hold the balance of power in others as we do to-day in Idaho."

The Baxter Street Mission in New York celebrated its fortieth anniversary on July 27th. It is situated in a neighborhood notorious for its squalor and vice, but the Christian ladies and gentlemen who have labored there have worked on in faith, undeterred by the poverty, misery, and disease surrounding them. Meetings are held every evening of the week. They are conducted by Mr. W. H. Weeks, who is aided by his wife and daughter and volunteer Christian friends. At the anniversary, Dr. Freeman, of Holy Trinity Church, and Dr. Mingins, of the Thirty-fifth Street Tabernacle, delivered addresses. The congregation was composed chiefly of Italians and colored men, many of whom bore on their faces the marks of dissipation, but they listened attentively to Dr. Freeman's earnest appeals. This is a very useful mission, laboring with little encouragement in a neglected field.

The Interstate Conference of the W. C. T. U., just adjourned at Mountain Lake Park, Md., was largely attended by able delegates from Maryland, West Virginia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and District of Columbia, and a vast amount of work was completed that will greatly promote the efficiency of the Unions in the several States named, and have a beneficial influence on the work at large. Many earnest workers were present at the conference, which was addressed by Frances E. Willard, Hon. William Daniel, Major George A. Hilton, of Washington, and others. The low rates of railroad fare, the comfort of the throng that attended on excursion day, and the general success of the conference are due largely to the personal efforts of Miss Jennie Smith, and it will rejoice her many friends to know that "Grace Cottage," her new home, is completed and ready to receive Christian workers and others in search of rest and a delightful home in this attractive mountain retreat, that gains in popularity each season.

The Reunion of the Army Chaplains and the Christian Commission at Ocean Grove, N. J., was of a most enthusiastic character. The speeches made proved how completely hostile feeling between the two sections is dead. The enthusiasm culminated when General Grant, leaning on the arm of General Stuart, hobbled with his crutch to the platform. His emotion almost choked his utterance as the air vibrated with the cheers his appearance elicited. He said: "It would always be very difficult for me to address an audience such as this, but now it is especially hard. An hour ago I could have told you the good these agencies did, for I had especial opportunities to know of the service they rendered, the consolation they administered by the side of death-beds, and their patient, unswerving attention to the sick, but now I can't. I hope—you will appreciate—" Here the general's voice, which was on the point of breaking several times, sank almost into a sob, and, with tears flowing from his eyes, he turned and sank into his seat. Tears were flowing from the eyes of the delegates and many others in the audience, besides those of the old veterans who sat in front.

No Little Surprise was Manifested Last Week at one of the sessions of the School of Philosophy at Concord, N. H., at the avowals of two eminent professors. Both scientists having thoroughly studied the doctrine of evolution and declared their belief in it, many of their hearers expected to learn that they had no faith in the Bible or the Christian religion. Dr. A. P. Peabody, of Cambridge, was the first essayist. He took up the general reasons for the belief in immortality, which were insisted upon a quarter of a century ago, but maintained that even those positive reasons, as held by the great ethical teachers of the race, pro-Christian and non-Christian, did not reach the certainty that had been reached in the resurrection of Jesus Christ as taught by the Christian religion. Professor John Fiske spoke for two hours on "The Origin and Destiny of Man," and in conclusion, to the profound surprise of his hearers, he came out in spiritual affirmations of God and immortality as the ultimate aim and result of the system of evolution. Thus two representative scientists, after all their studies and speculations, find themselves on the same platform with Christians who accept the Bible simply as it stands as a guide through life to immortality with God.

Another Case of the Cure of Spinal Disease by faith and prayer is reported from Newark, N. J. The Associated Press despatch describing the case says that Mrs. Mary E. Douglass, of 174 Camden Street, has been bedridden for eight years. A complication of diseases that attacked her settled finally in her spine, and after suffering for four years from spinal inflammation she was finally stricken with curvature of the spine. That was four years ago. During the last two and a half years she had ulceration of the stomach, and abscesses. Her left hip was drawn out of place, and her ankles turned as though she were club-footed, and her feet became paralyzed. Her physicians were unable to give her relief from suffering or to restore the affected limb. Her pastor, Dr. Sandford, a Congregational minister who was formerly with Dr. Cullis, at length induced her to trust wholly to Christ's power. On July 26 Dr. Sandford and a few Christian friends met in the sick-room in which Mrs. Douglass had been eight years a prisoner, and offered prayers for her recovery. She was then assisted out of bed and supported by chairs. Dr. Sandford again prayed. Mrs. Douglass says: "As he prayed I felt my leg slip into place, and saw my foot on the floor. I began to have faith then, and started to take two or three steps and walked around the room. I feel no return of my maladies, and yesterday my physician, Dr. Haines, examined me and found that the curvature had disappeared."

A Temperance League has been Formed in New Jersey. Its object is to form into effective union the Reform Clubs established by Messrs. Mabee and English. The clubs are doing valuable work in their separate districts, which it is believed will be assisted by united action. A conference was held at Bound Brook on July 29th, at which the League was regularly organized, and a convention will be held at Asbury Park on September 1st, to which all the temperance organizations of the State are invited to send delegates. The constitution adopted at the conference makes the name of the association "The Reform Club League of New Jersey." Its objects are stated as: 1. The strengthening of those ties which bind us together as members of organizations, which, by the grace of God, exist, and by the love we bear our fellow-men constrain us to exist so long as the drink habit curses the nation and the homes of our people. 2. The discussion of questions relating to the welfare of the clubs, to embrace the experiences of the clubs in every department of work, and the lessons therefrom; to give advice when asked, and to tender sympathy and help when needed. This is another of those wise steps which have rendered the work of Mabee and English pre-eminent for its thoroughness and permanence.

The "Leisurely Work" of a West Virginia pastor is described by the Richmond Religious Herald, which, writing of Rev. M. Ellison, says: "Twelve years ago he had charge of fourteen churches and averaged a sermon a day the year through. He said to us: 'I have always meant, should God spare my life to threescore and ten, to take it leisurely the rest of the journey, and now that I have turned that point I have resigned the care of all my churches except eight.' Dear old man! for ten years he rode through the mountains and valleys of West Virginia, preaching almost every day and acting as a colporteur as well, and he called that taking it 'leisurely.' Now, that fourscore years are upon him, he has resigned all of his churches, but in one way and another he is enforcing and illustrating the great truths of the Gospel."

The American and Foreign Christian Union has issued an appeal on behalf of the McAll and other evangelical missions in France, to which it is anxious that the churches would give a place among the objects to which they regularly contribute. In the course of the appeal the directors say: "With a population nominally papal, the traditional faith of France is losing its power over the souls of men with wonderful rapidity. France is doomed to become atheistic unless a true Gospel shall come to her people. If France becomes atheistic the infection will extend to our own people, as it has heretofore. Multitudes are on the alert, glad to welcome a truth that will save them from the abyss of infidelity. To preach the Gospel to such men is like carrying food to those who have long suffered the pangs of hunger, who have spent money for that which is not bread. The Corresponding-Secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union the Rev. George B. Safford, D.D., Room 43, Bible House, New York, will address churches that may wish to hear more particular statements relating to the French work.

RECEIVING THE HOLY GHOST.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"He said unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed?"—Acts 19: 2.

The Questions Paul did not Ask—Questions of Interest—Not of First Importance—The Signs of the Holy Spirit in Apostolic Days—The Miraculous Gifts have Departed—Better Gifts Remain—I. The Question—A Vital One—The Holy Spirit the Source of Life—The Question Answerable—No Guess-Work in Daily Life—To Whom the Question is Inevitable—Faith Living in Heaven—Always Charity Children—Knowing J from I—The Perfect Brother Cracked—Two Heavens.

It may be well to notice what question the apostle did not put to these Ephesian disciples of John. He did not say to them, "Have ye believed?" This would have been a very important question, but it ought to be settled once for all. Our faith must either be boldly affirmed or sorrowfully denied, but it should not remain the subject of question. We not only ought to know that we believe, but to know whom we believe, and it would be well for us to advance beyond common believing to assurance, and thence to full assurance—the assurance of faith, the assurance of hope, and the assurance of understanding. Again, Paul does not put the question, "If ye have believed, how came it about? By what agencies was faith created in your souls? When did you first become believers?" These are very proper questions if we view them as points of interest, but they do not touch

THE ESSENCE OF SALVATION.

A man may be saved, and yet know none of the details of his conversion. Thousands in the fold of Jesus came back to the good Shepherd by degrees. Many who now walk in the light received daylight, not by the leaping of the sun above the horizon in a moment, but as our days mostly begin in this country: a little light tinged the eastern sky, and then came a rosy hue, followed by a dim dawn, and afterward came the actual rising of the sun, which cometh out of the chambers of the east, and runs his course till he has created perfect day. Many are gradually brought to Christ, and yet they are truly brought to Christ. I say we may ask about the when and the how of conversion if we wish to be interested, as we have a right to be, in the stories of the godly; but we must not ask such questions as if they were of vital importance, and should stand first.

Paul does not inquire about ways, and means, and times, but he does ask—"Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed?" Our Revised Version reads it, "Did ye receive the Holy Ghost when ye believed?" and others who are probably quite as accurate read it, the Holy Ghost now that ye have believed?" It does not matter one atom which way you read it; all the renderings come to this: Do you see a connection between your believing and the Holy Ghost? Did you receive Him when you believed? Have you received Him since you believed? Are you daily receiving Him as you believe? That is the subject which is now before us—the Holy Spirit in our hearts as believers.

"ARE YE RECEIVING

You know, dear friends, when the Holy Spirit was given in the earliest ages He showed His presence by certain miraculous signs. Some of those who received the Holy Spirit spake with tongues; others began to prophesy; and a third class received the gifts of healing, so that wherever they laid their hands disease fled before them. Now, be it never forgotten that those works of the Holy Spirit which are permanent must assuredly be of greater value than those which were transitory. We cannot suppose that the Holy Ghost brought forth the best wine at first, and that His operations gradually deteriorated. It is a rule of the kingdom to keep the best wine to the last, and therefore I conclude that you and I are not left to partake of the dregs, but that those works of the Holy Spirit which are at this time vouchsafed to the Church of God are every way as valuable as those earlier miraculous from us. The work of the Holy Spirit, by which men are quickened from their death in sin, is not inferior to the power which made men speak with tongues. The work of the Holy Spirit, when He comforts men and makes them glad in Christ, is by no means second to the opening of the eyes of the blind. Why, sirs, men might have the gifts of the Spirit as to miracle, and yet might perish after all; but he that hath the spiritual gifts of the Holy Ghost shall never perish; they are saving blessings, and where they come they lift the man out of his sinful estate, and make him to be a child of God. I would therefore press it upon you this morning that, as you would certainly inquire whether you had the gifts of healing and miracle-working, if such gifts were now given to believers, much more should you inquire whether you have those more permanent gifts of the Spirit which are this day open to you all, by the which you shall work no physical miracle, but shall achieve spiritual wonders of the grander sort.

GIFTS WHICH HAVE DEPARTED

We will, first, this morning, consider the question; and then we will listen to the lessons which it is calculated to teach.

I. I want you to consider the question. In some respects it is

A VITAL QUESTION.

I shall not be playing about the outskirts of religion now, but plunging into its very centre. This question has nothing to do with the sect to which you belong, nor with the particular condition in which your mind may happen to be for the present hour; it is an inquiry which touches the heart of the man and the inmost life of his spirit. "Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed?" For, remember, the Holy Ghost is the author of all spiritual life. Life does not lie latent in natural men for themselves to stir it up, but until the Holy Ghost visits them, they are dead in trespasses and sins. If, when you believed, you had not a life imparted by the Holy Spirit, your believing was a dead believing, the mere counterfeit of living faith, and not the faith of God's elect.

As the Holy Ghost is the Author of our quickening, the Lord and Giver of life, so is He the Author of all true instruction. My brother, you have professed to be a believer, but you know nothing at all unless the Holy Spirit has taught you. Furthermore, if we have believed in Christ aright, the Holy Ghost has come upon us to transform us altogether. By divine grace we are not now what we used to be; we have new thoughts, new wishes, new aspirations, new sorrows, new joys, and these are wrought in us of the Spirit. A man's conversion is nothing, his believing is nothing, his profession is nothing unless he is made to be a new creature in Christ Jesus. But how can we be made new by any other power than the Holy Spirit? Only He that creates can new-create. If our faith has not brought with it the Holy Spirit, if, indeed, it is not the fruit of the Spirit, and we are not changed in nature and in life, then our faith is presumption, and our profession is a lie. Furthermore, it is absolutely essential to all true religion that you and I should be sanctified. A faith which works not for purification will work for putrefaction. Unless our faith makes us and pant after conformity to God, it is no better than the faith of devils, and perhaps it is not even so good as that. How can any man become holy except by the Spirit of holiness? A holy man is the workmanship of the Holy Spirit.

Beside that, remember, dear friends, there is one mark of God's people which if it be lacking is fatal, and that is prayer. Pray without the Spirit of God? Oh, sir, it will be a mechanical performance, the statue of prayer, but not the living, prevailing supplication of an heir of heaven. You may go to your chamber, and kneel down at that particular chair, where you have so often enjoyed communion with God, but unless you invoke the Spirit of God the posture shall be a weariness, the exercise shall be heartless, and the result shall be worthless. Dear, dear friends, you do see, do you not, how on all these points contact with the Spirit of God becomes essential to our present spiritual life and to our eternal salvation? Look ye to it; look ye to it at once. If all you have is what you have made yourself, you and your works must perish; if all your prayers have risen from no greater depth than your own heart, and if they are the fruit of no better spirit than your own, they will never reach to the ear of God, nor bring you blessings from the throne. If there is not something supernatural about your religion, it will be a millstone about your neck to sink you into hell.

But now, while this is a vital question, I beg to say further that where it is not vital it is nevertheless greatly important. I do not think we ought always to be asking the question, "Is this essential?" meaning thereby, "Is it essential to our salvation?" Those are who would be penurious in obedience and love, so that they would labor and love no more than is absolutely needful to get to heaven. They would be saved in the cheapest possible way, and they would be content to crawl over the threshold of glory, but not to go too far in. They want as much grace as may be necessary to float them over the bar at the harbor's mouth; but they do not desire an abundant entrance. Oh ye miserly professors, stinting yourselves in the matter of the grace of God, I have little enough to say to you; but I turn to the children of God, and joyfully remind them that there is in the Holy Ghost not only what they absolutely need to save them, but much more. Here is not only bread, but wine on the lees well refined. In the Holy Ghost there is comfort to gladden you, grace to strengthen you, holiness to ennoble you, and love to purify you.

For, first, the Spirit of God is the Comforter, and how important it is that you should be comforted! In the Holy Ghost there is also a spirit of enlightening. Do you not read the word of God understanding very little of it? Do you not hear it as though you heard not? Why is this? Should you not seek more of the teaching of the Holy Spirit, that He may lead you into all truth? The Spirit of God is, also, the spirit of liberty, but some of God's children do not seem to have attained their freedom as yet. They have one fetter remaining on their foot, and though they try to enter into the broad fields of heavenly enjoyment, they cannot escape from their prison. Of such we may well ask—Have ye received the Spirit since ye believed? If so, wherefore are ye the bondaged serfs of fashion? Wherefore do you ask leave of your fellow-men to breathe, or think? The Holy Spirit is a free Spirit, and makes men free; where the Spirit of the Lord is there is liberty.

Some of God's people need to feel the Spirit of God as a power moving and impelling them to holy service. Do you never hear behind you a voice saying, "This is the way; walk ye in it?" Have you never known holy impulses bidding you do this and that—impulses which did not come from human nature, for they impelled you to something which you would naturally have avoided? I would we had more of it, for then we should be more ready for service, and should do greater things than these. That same Spirit who moves the saints to work, also empowers them to achieve the purpose which is put into their souls. Wherever God has done great things by a man He has had power to do more had the man been fit for it. We are straitened in ourselves, not in God. Oh brothers, the church is weak to-day because the Holy Spirit is not upon her members as we could desire Him to be.

Now I come to notice that this question is assuredly answerable. "Have you received the Holy Ghost?" The notion has sprung up that you cannot tell whether you have the Holy Spirit or not; but you can. Give a man an electric shock, and I warrant you he will know it; but if he has the Holy Ghost he will know it much more. You may sometimes raise the question, "Did I ever feel the Holy Ghost in years gone by?" but you cannot ask the question, "Do I feel it now?" for if you feel it now you have the witness in yourself that the Lord is at work with you. You need not ask a question about present experience. If you do not feel the Holy Ghost at work distinctly and perceptibly even now, then lift your heart to God for it, and pray that you may now receive Him in all His fulness.

"Oh," says one, "I thought we must always say, 'I hope so, I trust so.'" I know that jargon; but men do not say, "I hope I have an estate," or "I trust I have twenty shillings in the pound," or "I think I have a wife and children." Some of us are quite clear about these matters, one way or the other. We as to daily life, much less as to eternal things. Oh souls, live daily on what God gives you, and you cannot doubt; live near to Christ, and you cannot doubt whether you love Him; live in the Holy Spirit, give yourselves up fully to His divine anointings and bedewings, and you will not have to say, "I hardly know whether there be any Holy Ghost," for He dwelleth with you, and shall be in you.

Permit me to say here that there are many professors to whom this question is inevitable. I will pick out certain of them. There is the brother with the long dreary face, the Knight of the Rueful Countenance. You know him, and you pity him. His favorite hymn is—

"'Tis a point I long to know,
Oft it causes anxious thought."

Is there anything dreary? He delights in it as much as he can delight in anything. He is sure of nothing but the horrible; everything that is pleasant he is afraid of. His life is one protracted groan. Come along, brother, and shake hands as cheerfully as you can. Please tell me, have you received the Holy Ghost since you believed? How he hesitates! Poor soul, he is perplexed. He is not well acquainted with the Comforter. Surely, if we have the earnest of the Spirit, the first-fruits of heaven, we ought to rejoice in the Lord always. Brother, you look comfortless; how is this when the Comforter is come to you?

Another brother is a member of the church, and a very unpleasant neighbor, for he picks holes in everybody and everything; he is

and since he has been new born he has not given up the habit. When he goes home this morning, after dinner he will spend the afternoon in his growlery, complaining of the heat, and perhaps of my sermon. Oh, my dear brother, you who are so uneasy and unhappy, and so worrying and annoying to everybody, did you receive the Holy Ghost when you believed? Are you receiving the Holy Ghost still? I have sometimes thought that certain unfriendly friends must have been baptized in vinegar instead of water, from the sharp acid of their temperament. Surely the Spirit of God is a dove, full of peace, and love, and kindness, and not a bird of prey. Here comes another who flies out into and grows fiercely angry. A little thing puts him out; he finds fault readily enough, and becomes excited in no time. He says that he is very sorry for it afterward, but this does not remove the wounds which he has inflicted. If you cut a person's head off, it is of small use to apologize to him afterward. Many a man boils over with passion and scalds his friend, and then in cooler moments expresses his regret. All very fine; but fine words cure no blisters. I would suggest to you the next time you are in a great temper that you ask yourself this question, "Have I received the Holy Ghost since I believed? Is He not the spirit of peace and gentleness?"

Here is a brother who cannot be happy unless he indulges in and useless amusements. When he gets into a grand frolic with worldly people, he finds himself at home; but the joys of godliness he despises. My friend, the next time you are coming home from a gay party, I should like to meet you in the street and inquire, "Have you received the Holy Ghost since you believed?" You would think me almost blaspheming. Alas! the blasphemy is in your heart. You would feel awkward, would you not? Do not do things which make you feel awkward; keep out of those scenes which are unfit for a child of God. Do not play with the devil's children. You cannot expect the Holy Spirit to continue with you if you are joined with the adversaries of the Lord.

But there are certain persons who live solely to hoard and scrape and get money, that they may grow rich and grind everybody else to pieces in the process. I would like when the avaricious man is totalling up his gains to put to him the question, "Have you received the Holy Ghost since you believed?" He would answer, "Don't, don't; it is terribly out of place to mention so serious a matter." It is out of place no doubt, for the man himself is out of place; but ought a believer to be in a position in which it shall be out of place for a friend to speak to him about his eternal interests?

I know some

TO WHOM THE QUESTION IS NEEDLESS.

You never did put it to them, and you never will. You meet them in the morning, soaring aloft, like the lark, in the praises of God. See them in trouble; they are patient and resigned to their heavenly Father's will. Mark how they spend their lives in hallowed service, seeking ever to win sinners to Christ; their common talk is sweet with the honey of the Holy Land; you cannot be with them ten minutes without discovering that they have leaned on Jesus' bosom. There is an aroma about them which tells you that they dwell in the garden of the Lord. When they tell you their experience it is "e'en as if an angel shook his wings." You do not ask them if they have received the Holy Ghost; but you stand still and admire the work of the Spirit of God in them. Now, beloved, be such yourselves.

II. One or two lessons can be gathered upon the very surface of this question, "Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed?" Then the first lesson is, we are not to look for salvation to one single act of faith in the past, but to Jesus, in whom we continue to believe. I have read, very much to my grief, an assertion that, whatever we may be to-day, we are safe, if years ago we exercised a single act of faith. There may be truth in the statement, but it is so badly stated, and so wretchedly distorted, that it looks like a lie; is a faith which does not spend itself in a single act, but continues to work and operate throughout the whole of life. It is not a question for me to-day, "Did I believe in the Lord Jesus Christ in the year 1850, on a certain morning in the month of January?" Oh, no; the question is, "Do I believe in the Lord Jesus at this hour?" For if my faith is "faith of the operation of God," it has continued to this hour, and will continue to the end.

THAT WHICH SAVES

They say we do not believe in heaven, but this is surely an error occasioned by want of thought. Heaven is a fit sphere for faith, not faith for what we shall there see, but for things promised and not yet fulfilled. If I were to go to heaven to-day, I should believe in my stopping there; I should believe in the Lord's continuing to love me, I should believe in all the prophecies yet unfulfilled, in the ingathering of the redeemed, the perfecting of the Church, and of the Lord. I should look for the resurrection, the new heavens and the new earth, the millennial glory, the binding of Satan, and the eternal glory of the Triune God. Faith may be altogether lost in sight so far as things realized are concerned, but it will be grandly exercised upon blessings yet to come. We must live by faith; it is not only our starting-point, but the road along which we are to travel.

The next lesson of the text is that we must continue to live by receiving. We received Christ Jesus the Lord at the first, and now we receive the Holy Ghost. These disciples were questioned about their receiving rather than their expending, for at bottom everything depends upon what we receive. Nothing can come out of us if it does not first go into us. We are always charity children. It is our blessed lot to live upon the alms of divine bounty.

Again, let us learn that we may not despise the very lowest form of spiritual life; nay, not even those who have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost. Paul, when he met these half-instructed disciples, did not say, "You see the door. Be off; you have nothing to do with me, for you are so desperately ignorant." On the contrary, he sat down and taught them more, and then baptized them. God has some children who are mere babes and sucklings, and it is a fact for their comfort that He does not judge of their being His children by measuring their height. Babes in grace are as much his children as those who have reached perfect manhood.

WEAKLINGS ARE DEAR TO GOD;

let them be dear to us. When you are considering some poor child of God who has no education, and cannot read the Bible, do not judge him by his knowledge. The question is not whether he knows "A" from "B," for if he knows "J" from "I" he knows enough; that is to say, if he knows Jesus from himself he has grasped the essential point. If he trusts Christ and not himself he knows enough to take him to heaven, and enough for you to take him into your heart.

Once more, the Holy Ghost can be yet more fully possessed by all believers. If there should be a brother or sister here who has a notion that he cannot have any more grace, I am afraid he is specially in need of it.

THE PERFECT BROTHER

I must leave to the angels; he is above my reach, for I am sent to fallible men. I conceive that when a man is so good in his own esteem that he cannot be better, he is even then no better than he should be, and is either cracked in his head or his honesty. However, I leave him to his own Master; but as for you and for me, let us be certain that if we have been taught of the Spirit, there is more light yet for the Spirit to give to us; if we have been quickened of the Spirit, there is more life yet for the Spirit to impart to us; if we have been comforted, there are greater consolations yet which the Spirit of God can apply to our hearts; if we have been made strong, we can be stronger yet to do yet greater exploits; if we have had communion with Christ, we can have closer communion yet, and enter more thoroughly into the secret place of the tabernacle of the Most High.

If it can be, then why should it not be? Does not every man or woman here that is a Christian say, "I mean to realize all the possibilities of true religion?" A little religion is a miserable thing. He that has just enough to save him at last, may not have enough to comfort him for the present. He that has much grace, and is filled with the Spirit of God, shall have a heaven here and a heaven hereafter. I desire to make that true in my own case. I would find two heavens in Jesus; are there not many more? He who has the Spirit richly shall have the joy of the Lord here to be his strength, and the joy of the Lord hereafter to be his reward. Come, let us ask for all that God is willing to give. Does He not say, "Open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it?" Come, ye little ones; why remain little? Our prayer for you is, that you may be as David, and David as the angel of the Lord. Come. You are living on crumbs. why not eat abundantly of the bread of heaven? Do not be content with pence, for a king's ransom is at your disposal. Poor brother, rise out of your poverty. Sister, bowed down by reason of the little of the Spirit of God you have received, believe for more, and pray upon a larger scale. May the Lord enlarge all our hearts, and fill them; and then enlarge them again, and fill them again; so that from day to day we may receive the Holy Ghost, till at the last Jesus shall receive us into His glory.

REV. H. T. EDWARDS,

A PAINFUL sensation was caused by the cable message on May 25th, that the Rev. Henry Thomas Edwards, the Dean of Bangor, had committed suicide. Those who knew the deceased clergyman, however, were confident that he could not be in any moral sense responsible for the act of self-destruction. He was of an exceedingly nervous and highly-strung temperament, of peculiar and delicate constitution, and had recently passed through severe mental and physical suffering, which had overthrown his reason.

The late Dean was born in Wales, in 1836, so that he was in the forty-eighth year of his age. After a preliminary education at Westminster School, he graduated at Jesus College, Oxford, taking his B.A. degree in 1860 and M.A. in 1873. He was ordained deacon by the Bishop of St. Asaph, in 1861, when he was appointed to the curacy of Llangollen. He remained as his father's curate until 1866, when he was promoted to the charge of Aberdare, South Wales, by the trustees of the Marquis of Bute. In 1869 he was preferred to the vicarage of Carnarvon by the Bishop of Chester, and continued there until his elevation to the Deanery of Bangor, in 1876 by the present bishop of that diocese. He was an exceedingly able and active preacher, both in English and Welsh; very popular in all parts of the Principality, and considered one of the most eloquent speakers connected with the Welsh Church. He was deservedly held in high esteem by both Churchmen and Nonconformists.

The Dean had been staying with his brother, the Rev. W. Edwards, vicar of Ruabon, during the previous two weeks, to recruit his impaired health, which had occasioned anxiety to his friends for some time. His whole nervous system seemed to be shattered, resulting in that most obstinate of all nervous affections, melancholia. On the morning of May 24th, the family waited for the Dean to make his appearance at the breakfast table; but as he did not come his bedroom was visited, when the lifeless body was discovered suspended from the bedpost with a leather belt.

The Dean's family were deeply affected by the melancholy event, for which they were unprepared. They were, however, spared the misery of doubt as to his spiritual state, by the evidence of the physicians and the testimony of eminent brother clergymen. Among the latter was Archdeacon Farrar, who, with that grace and tenderness which characterize him, thus wrote: "I was dreadfully shocked to hear the news which your letter brought me. I had a great regard for poor Dean Edwards. When he was in town he often came to St. Margaret's, generally attending the early Communion. I had also met him in Wales, and been his guest at the Deanery. Nothing but a complete unhinging of the mind could possibly have caused so terrible an end; and when the mind is broken down the poor ship of our life may be wrecked without the captain's will—without the steersman's knowledge. He was the ablest and most vigorous Churchman in Wales, and should have been a Welsh bishop; but he is gone, I doubt not, to the mercy of the Merciful."

The Rev. Thomas Jones, curate of Ruabon, an intimate acquaintance of the deceased, says that all who knew the late dean, whether personally or by reputation, must have had the greatest admiration for him. His public career was of an unusually successful character; he was richly qualified for the sacred calling which he so heartily loved and so faithfully followed, and his vast mind and honest heart were always employed in furthering the cause of his Divine Master. In his death the Church had lost one of the brightest ornaments that had ever adorned her. Their loss, however, would be his gain; he had gone from the world of consuming toil and wasting worry to the happy mansions of God's departed saints; he had ascended into the presence of that God whose attributes he labored so diligently to unfold, and his soul had gone to the dear Redeemer whose atoning life and death he had set forth with such faith and boldness.

A BIBLE AS A SIGNAL.

Among the marvellous incidents related of the results of missionary labor, scarcely any is more remarkable than one recently published in an English journal. It describes the surprise with which a shipwrecked crew, in a moment of terrible apprehension, received assurance of safety.

A ship was sailing among the islands of the South Pacific Ocean, when it suddenly struck on a sunken rock, and was soon a wreck. The captain and crew, twenty-two in number, took to their boats, hoping to reach an island or to see the sail of some friendly ship which might take them in. But vainly they strained their eyes and watched for a sail; no ship and no land appeared. For fourteen weary days they had been exposed in the open boats, and they were beginning to lose all hope of saving their lives, when, on the morning of the fifteenth day, they saw an island, unknown to them, guarded by its coral reef, over which the surf was dashing. The natives had perceived the boats, and were thronging the beach. It was an anxious moment for the poor sailors. Even exhausted as they were by fatigue and hunger, they scarcely knew whether to rejoice or not at the sight of land.

If these natives were savages, a worse fate might await the poor weary men than being swallowed up by the waves; for the natives of some of the islands were savage and cruel, and had sometimes murdered the unfortunate white men who fell into their hands, and sometimes even feasted upon them.

While the sailors watched with trembling anxiety every movement on the shore, they saw one of the natives coming toward them through the surf, holding in his hand a book, while he cried, with a loud voice, "Missionary, missionary!" What a joyful sound to the ears of the poor shipwrecked sailors! The missionaries had been on the island—they had given the natives "The Book"—there was, therefore, nothing for them to fear now.

With a glad shout the sailors replied to the natives, beckoning at the same time for help; and in a few minutes a number of the natives went to their aid, helped them through the surf, carried them on shore in their arms, supplied them with food, and cared for them with true Christian kindness.

To the great joy of the captain, he found that all this was owing, under the blessing of God, to the labors of his own brother. The captain's brother had been the means of bringing "The Book" to these once heathen natives. He had thus been honored, not only to impart the light and the blessings of Christianity to the islanders, but in so doing he had also been the means of saving the lives of his brother and his crew.

The book thus held up as a token of peace by the natives was the Bible. They rightly thought that the book which had transformed them would be recognized by the white men as a sign of safety.

NURSE WILFER'S PATIENT.

A young nurse sat watching one hot, stifling night in the ward of a city hospital. There was scarcely a breath of air stirring, and the patients slept uneasily or tossed waking on their beds of suffering. Now and again Nurse Wilfer rose and walked slowly through the ward, adjusting a pillow, laying a cool hand on a feverish brow, and speaking words of sympathy and encouragement to a sufferer. She was a young woman for a post so responsible, and there were evidences in her manner and conversation that she had been accustomed to a higher sphere than the one she occupied, but there were no signs of discontent either in word or look as she went about her duties.

At one of the beds she paused to make an inquiry. The patient, a tall, stalwart man, lay perfectly still, but the lines on his face showed that his quietude was the result of a severe effort, and that he was suffering intense pain.

"Thank you, nurse," he said, "you are very kind; you are like a sister to me; but I am afraid it's of no use; I shall die on your hands. I am a tough fellow, but a man need be made of iron to stand such pain as this. Tell me truly, nurse, what does the doctor think of me?"

"He thinks seriously of you, my poor fellow. Your strength is the only thing in your favor. The doctor said to-night that a weaker man would have died a day or two ago under the suffering. We cannot tell how much you have left to draw upon."

"I think there is not much physical strength left, nurse, but my nervous strength keeps up, or I could not lie quiet. The pain has not been so bad before as it is to-night; should you think this is the crisis, nurse?"

"I hope so; if it comes now you will bear it better than later."

"I think it will kill me, nurse. I am not a baby, and I shall not give up the fight, but I think a few more hours of this will see the end. I am going to ask you to do me a favor, nurse. It is a shame to add to your work, but it will not be much, and I have no one else. When—when the end comes, would you mind writing a line to my poor mother down in Virginia, and tell her gently that her boy is dead? It will be hard for her to bear anyhow, and I should like to make it as easy for her as I can. You will tell her more kindly than the doctors would. I wish I could sit up and write myself, but it's of no use wishing."

"Tell me what you would like to say; I will write now. If God does not spare you, I can add a line at the close."

"Thank you, nurse; God bless you for your kindness to a stranger."

Nurse Wilfer's Patient.

Nurse Wilfer went away, and presently returned with writing materials. Sitting down by the bedside, she wrote at the sick man's dictation a letter to his mother, telling the old story of a life of careless forgetfulness of her and her teaching, his own promises, and of God. Sickness, he said, had led him to think, but he had no hope for forgiveness, because he had sinned against the light. He prayed his mother to forgive him, as he knew she would.

"That is all, thank you, nurse, except what you will write yourself in an hour or two."

"You have been an ungrateful son, I infer from this letter?" said Nurse Wilfer gently.

"Worse than you can think, nurse," the sick man said. "What makes it so bad is that no man ever had so good a mother. She is the kindest, dearest, best of women. I hate myself as I think how I have returned her kindness."

"But you seem to feel sure of her forgiveness?"

"Ah, yes, I have no doubt of that. Nor would you if you knew her. She is too good to do anything else."

"Cannot you think of God in that way?"

"Oh, no, I have been too wicked."

"Perhaps your mother will not forgive you."

"Oh yes, she will. If she knew I was really sorry, she would forgive me anything. She loves her boy."

"So God loves you. Why, He gave you the very strongest proof you could have; He sent His own Son to die, that you might be saved."

"That is a new light to me, nurse. You have given me hope. I wish you would offer a prayer for me."

Nurse Wilfer knelt down and prayed that God would manifest Himself to the dying man, and show him something of that love, the depths of which mortal man cannot fathom, and that even in the eleventh hour he might have saving faith given to him.

The next morning the patient was still living and seemed better, though extremely feeble. The life hung as if by a thread for several days, and then the patient began to mend. In less than a month he was pronounced convalescent, and was allowed to travel slowly homeward. Wringing Nurse Wilfer's hand as he left the hospital, he said, "I have not forgotten; I believe God has forgiven me."

Two years later a strong, vigorous man presented himself at the hospital and asked for Nurse Wilfer. She was not there, but he was directed to her home. It was in the poorest quarter of the city. Only two rooms on the third floor of a poor house. The visitor rapped with his knuckles on the door, and was admitted. Nurse Wilfer was evidently going on a journey, for a trunk stood beside her chair, and she was stitching away at some articles of clothing that appeared destined to go in the trunk. She admitted her visitor with the puzzled look of one seeking to recall a past memory.

"Do you know me?" he said, seating himself opposite to her. "I see you are not quite clear. Well, do you remember writing a letter for a patient in —— Hospital two years ago, who did not die as he was expected to do?"

Nurse Wilfer rose and offered him her hand. "I remember you perfectly, now," she said.

"But you do not know what I have come to see you for. You remember writing to my mother? Well, I have brought the old lady to see you. She wants to know the lady who was the means of her boy's conversion. I have left her at the hotel while I came around for you. Will you come and see her?"

Nurse Wilfer went willingly, and on the way her former patient told her how he had received his mother's forgiveness, and how he had settled down to honorable work at home and was doing well. She found the mother a stately but affable lady, who on seeing her put her arms around her neck and kissed her.

"You were the means under God of giving me the greatest happiness I could hope to have," she said. "God in heaven forever bless you."

Nurse Wilfer was persuaded to accompany mother and son back for a short visit to their Virginia home. But the visit did not prove a short one. It was extended from time to time, and finally Nurse Wilfer was induced to be "nurse" no longer, and to become the wife of the man to whom she had been permitted to open the way back to God.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Summary of the Story.

[JOHN MORLEY, a studious bookseller of Little Aston, a widower, marries Rose, a beautiful young lady, who accepts a man older than herself because she is weary of earning her own living. John Morley introduces her to his daughter Hester, who, at his request, promises to love and honor her as long as she lives. Mr. Morley is deacon of a church, and his brother-deacon is Mr. Waldron, a member of Parliament, and an aristocrat. Mr. Waldron's son arrives, and proves to have been, under an assumed name, an acquaintance of Mrs. Morley's before her marriage. He induces her to elope with him, and thus brings heart-breaking misery on Mr. Morley and his daughter. Nine years afterward, having parted from Mrs. Morley, Robert Waldron returns. He is attacked in the street and wounded. A medical student, Grant, finds him unconscious, and carries him into the nearest house, which happens to be Mr. Morley's. His identity is kept a secret from the man he had injured, but is discovered by Hester. Robert Waldron recovers, and having become attached to Hester contrives to meet her in her visits to the mother of her father's workman, and at Hester's request goes to seek the woman whom he had ruined, but is unsuccessful. The pastor of the church of which Mr. Morley and Mr. Waldron are deacons dies, and his successor is Carl Bramwell, whose sister is the wife of Grant, the surgeon before mentioned. He also becomes attached to Hester, of whom Miss Waldron is jealous. Hester is persuaded to pay a visit to the Waldron home, where she has a conversation with Robert. He afterward informs his father of his desire to marry Hester. Mr. Waldron approves, but doubts whether Hester or her father would consent to an alliance with a man who has done them so foul a wrong. Mr. Waldron visits Carl Bramwell and induces the minister to promise that he will not compete with Robert for Hester's hand. From this point the story proceeds.]

Another Visitor to Lawson's Garret.

FROM the time that Miss Waldron had become acquainted with the fact that a Popish Frenchwoman dwelt in idolatrous darkness within sight of the very walls of the chapel, where the Gospel was preached every Sunday, though in a language unknown to her, she had resolved upon making her the subject of one of those direct efforts which had often so signal an effect upon the poor women of her district and mothers' meetings. She ordered from John Morley a packet of English tracts translated into French, and with these and a French Bible in her large satchel, she sallied forth, the morning after her father's interview with Carl, to seek the dwelling of the benighted foreigner.

It was about midday, and Madame Lawson was regaling herself with a savory ragout, highly seasoned with garlic, which she was wont to have cooked in her landlady's oven. She had added to her repast a glass or two of Burgundy wine, supplied to her by Robert Waldron, which she could only take at those meals when her son was absent, for fear of his discovering the secret of her distinguished visitor. She was in her most exhilarated mood. The noonday happened to be one of the rarely bright moments of November, and the high window of her garret caught the sunshine, while all the court below was in gloom. There was no fire in the grate, but a warm chaffrette filled with wood-ashes from the oven stood under her feet.

The three little bronze crucifixes over the empty fire-place shone full in the brightest of the sunbeams, and were the first objects upon which Miss Waldron's eyes fell as she entered the garret.

Miss Waldron had not the proficiency in French which her brother possessed. She had never been out of her native isle, and her father, entertaining a true old-fashioned British contempt of foreigners, had never invited any to his house. Her acquaintance with the language was, in consequence, almost limited to a perusal of Telemachus and the works of Madame de Genlis, which she had gone through with her dictionary and a master. Madame received her with a torrent of patois, of which she barely understood one word; but Miss Waldron was not to be daunted. She laid her packet of tracts upon the table and seated herself on a distant chair.

"You are a Frenchwoman," she said, austerely.

Yes, Madame was a Frenchwoman from Bourgoyne, and she could not speak one word of English—not one word. To speak English was like swallowing fish-bones.

"You are a Papist," observed Miss Waldron, who had scarcely understood the previous remarks.

Papist! She did not comprehend what was Papist.

"Your religion is Papist," said Miss Waldron, pointing to the little crosses and rosary.

Yes, yes; that was her religion. She was a Catholic. That was her chaplet: she said her chaplet twice a day, sometimes oftener, if she was sad. When she felt very sad, she said a little prayer first, and then sang a song. Would she like to hear a song?

Without waiting for permission, the gay old lady started off with one of her merriest songs; her eyes growing smaller and brighter, and the cunning little wrinkles starting out more and more wickedly at every line. Miss Waldron could not catch a word of the song, but she trembled at the thought of what she might be listening to, and her face grew a dull red. She moved uneasily in her chair, and glanced toward the door. At the last line of the song Madame winked—positively winked at her visitor; and then crossed herself in so sudden a manner that Miss Waldron was still more dismayed.

"I am Miss Waldron," she said, intrenching herself behind the dignity of her name.

Waldron! Bah! She could not speak such a word. But was it not the name of the fine young milord Robert who did her the honor of paying her a visit sometimes? Quite an English milord, but with a beautiful toilet and with rings on his fingers, who could speak French like a Frenchman.

Miss Waldron was puzzled. It was not at all in Robert's line to visit poor old women; yet she knew that he could speak French fluently, and it was not probable that another person, possessing equal proficiency, could be found in Little Aston. But what could bring Robert there? The thought of Hester flashed across her like a ray of light.

"He is my brother," she answered, slowly, and with some difficulty, as she pondered over a totally unprepared phrase. She had arranged beforehand a conversation which ought to have proceeded like a catechism, but she was completely thrown out. She stammered and hesitated, but at last she was compelled to put her question in a bald, unvarnished manner. "Does he meet a girl called Hester Morley here?" she asked.

The smooth clean face of Madame assumed the innocence of a child, combined with virtuous indignation. She answered firmly in the negative, with a gesture of utter repudiation; but Miss Waldron's aroused suspicions were not to be rocked to sleep again. Hester came here, and she had learned that Robert did so too. What could it mean? Could it have any meaning but one?

"I am afraid," she said, in very incorrect French, for she was agitated, and her tongue tingled to speak in strong English, "that you are a very wicked woman. I knew you were a Papist and a Frenchwoman; but I am afraid you are worse. I came here with the purpose of doing you good, but I fear it is impossible. I shall speak about you to my father, Mr. Waldron, of Aston Court, who is a magistrate.

Madame Lawson could not understand many words of this speech, but she could see that the visitor was very greatly displeased. It occurred to her that she had come on a mission of suspicion and espionage, and she resolved to throw her off the scent. Her brown eyes—eyes which betray nothing—met Miss Waldron's gaze, and a sinister air of intelligence spread over her face.

"Mademoiselle Hester comes to see me sometimes," she said, very distinctly, "but never, oh! never, when milord Robert comes. There is a young priest at the chapel where Mademoiselle makes her prayers; and in England, the priests marry. He is very handsome and young, like Mademoiselle Hester. It is possible he may marry himself with her."

Miss Waldron's heart sank very low. That such a calamity was possible she could not conceal from herself; but it had never been put into words and uttered in her hearing. She was lost in distressed and perplexed thought, not able to ply the old woman with clever questions. Madame regarded her with a crafty smile. Grant had once brought Carl to see her, but the visit had made little impression upon her, except as awakening an odd interest in the priest who could marry if he chose. She was conscious that she had made a happy hit, though she did not know exactly where it wounded.

"Does Hester love the young priest?" asked Miss Waldron at last, unable to cloak the inquiry more skilfully.

"It is necessary to love one's director," she answered, with a leer full of insinuation; "and he is so handsome, like la petite. It is also his duty to love all his people."

Both Madame and Miss Waldron had been too engrossed to catch the sound of the staircase creaking under a footstep; but at this moment a sallow and withered face, with two eyes set in it like burning lamps, appeared at the half-open door. Madame uttered a little scream, and dexterously snatched the bottle of Burgundy from the table, putting it by a sleight of hand into its hiding-place under her bed. But the new-comer paid no attention to her movements. He had taken off his old paper cap, and fastened upon Miss Waldron a gaze which did not permit his eyelids to wink. She experienced a very peculiar sensation of discomfort under the fixed scrutiny of these burning eyes.

"It is my son, Madame," said Lawson's mother, introducing him with an air of ceremony.

"Can you speak English, my good man?" inquired Miss Waldron.

"Certainly," replied Lawson; "but before we go any further, may I ask what your name is?"

"Miss Waldron, of Aston Court," she said, with emphasis and dignity.

"So I guessed," he cried, clinching his hands; "you are a lady, and I'd be sorry to frighten you. But it is as much as your life is worth to come here. I am Mr. Morley's workman, and love Miss Hester. I knew her mother and the second Mrs. Morley. Now you'll see you'd better not come here again. This is my house, and I will have nobody in it belonging to you or yours."

"I came here to convert your mother," said Miss Waldron, with great courage.

"Then she must go unconverted," he said, his tone rising to a higher pitch; "if you and yours are to go to heaven, then me and mine must go elsewhere. It is not safe for you here. John Morley and me are waiting—waiting till the right time comes; for there is deadly hatred betwixt us and you. You had better go at once, while I warn you. I'm a quiet man, but you had better go."

His voice had risen shrilly with each sentence, till now it rang in her ears with a shriek, which the children at play below heard, and stopped suddenly to listen. Miss Waldron seized her satchel and fled; and, as she hurried through the court the window above was opened violently and her loosened packet of tracts fluttered down about her like a flock of frightened doves.

As Miss Waldron issued from the low passage leading to the court, Carl was hurrying past with long strides, and with his head bowed down as if heavy with momentous thoughts. She uttered a cry of joyful relief, and almost flung herself upon his arm. There was so evident a fright, both in her flurried manner and the startled expression on her face, that Carl gazed about him and peered down the narrow alley to ascertain the cause of it. She sobbed hysterically; and having sufficient presence of mind to take advantage of the opportunity, she did not attempt to control her agitation, as she must have done had she been compelled to pursue her way alone, or had she met any other acquaintance. She leaned heavily and helplessly upon the arm of the embarrassed Carl. The street was quiet, but he glanced up and down it with a feeling of dismay. There needed but one or two observant passers-by to attract a whole crowd about them from the surrounding houses. The key of the chapel vestry was in his pocket, and the chapel was on the other side of the street.

"Would you like to sit down for a few minutes in the vestry?" he asked.

"Oh, yes! yes!" said Miss Waldron, between her sobs.

Carl led her across the street, and once again he cast a keen glance about him There were only a few children to be seen at play. But no; coming up the pavement was a light and tall figure, dressed in a soft gray dress which he knew very well to be Hester's. She was on the sunny side of the street, dazzled perhaps by the white wintry sunshine; for she did not seem to see them in the shade, though he was a long time in fitting the key into the lock, in the hope that she would recognize them, and he could make a sign to her to come across to them. Miss Waldron did not see her.

"There is Miss Morley," said Carl; "shall I run over and call her to come to you?"

"No," answered Miss Waldron, plainly enough, and without a sob this time; "I would much rather not see her at this moment. I have something very extraordinary to tell you, Carl."

The name Carl seemed to fall from her lips unconsciously in her state of excitement; but he felt a nervous tremor at the sound of it. He opened the vestry door and went in, with Miss Waldron still supporting herself upon his arm. He placed her in his own chair beside the table, and stood opposite her before the empty fireplace. Above it hung usually the portrait of a distinguished divine, in a full-bottomed wig and white bands, at the back of which was a small looking-glass. Carl had turned the portrait with its face to the wall the preceding Sunday; and now, instead of the countenance of the eminent minister, he saw his own troubled features, with the straight eyebrows knitted and the lips pressed sternly together. Miss Waldron began to sob less deeply, but she sat with her head averted, and with an air of modest confusion which almost drove him frantic.

"Do you feel better?" he asked; "can I do anything for you?"

"I am better," she answered, faintly; "in a minute or two I will tell you all."

For that minute or two Carl set himself to conquer his impatience and irritation. Why should he feel so different to-day from what he had felt only the day before yesterday? She was his friend still; and he had only heard Annie's partial, and no doubt absurd, notion that she was something more than a friend. A true friendship between man and woman ought to be able to bear a greater shock than the misapprehension and misconstruction of others.

He almost detested himself for the ready and ridiculous vanity which had caused him to give credence to the story; yet the hot blood mounted to his beating temples as he caught a side-long glance from Miss Waldron.

"Carl," she said, in a voice as if it was still necessary to gasp for breath at each word, "I may call you Carl now, I think."

What could he answer? He bowed his head gravely, but without raising his eyes from the floor.

"I am a little older than you," she continued, with a frank air, "and I am so used to hear your dear sister call you Carl. That is how I slipped into it. To call you Mr. Bramwell now would seem formal. I am thankful it is only you who have seen my agitation. It is foolish and silly, I know, but then I am nothing but a weak foolish woman."

"You have been very much alarmed," remarked Carl, falteringly.

"Oh, exceedingly!" exclaimed Miss Waldron, her hand pressed upon her heart; "and I am so grateful to the Providence which sent you here at this moment It is but another proof that our steps are all ordered."

On his part Carl felt no particular thankfulness for having been found on the spot at that special moment; but he rebuked the thought as it suggested itself to him.

"I must tell you all," said Miss Waldron, "but to you only. It must be a secret between us two. I would not have my father made uneasy for the world; and if I need any counsel or protection, you will give me both. I can count upon you, dear Carl."

"Certainly," he replied.

ABSALOM'S DEATH.

S. S. Lesson for August 17, II Sam. 18. Golden Text, Prov. 14 : 32. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Absalom's Sin—Its Penalty under the Levitical Law—A Capital Offence—Absalom Led by the Devil—His Supreme Desire—The Only Security — The Outbreak of Civil War — David's Charge to his Generals—The Decisive Battle —Absalom Caught by his Hair—His Death—David's Overwhelming Grief—Joab's Blunt Reproof—Only the Persistent Sinner Shut out from God.

VERY terrible are the judgments which God declares shall come on those children who break the Fifth Commandment, "Every one that curseth his father or his mother shall surely be put to death: he hath cursed his father or his mother: his blood shall be upon him" (Lev. 20 : 9). "Whoso curseth his father or his mother, his lamp shall be put out in obscure darkness;" "The eye that mocketh at his father, and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young eagle shall eat it" (Prov. 20 : 20; 30 : 17).

Absalom, the beloved son of a godly father, was set upon his own aggrandizement. The devil had made him his dupe, possessed him with this and he could see nothing else. Everything which stood in his way must be sacrificed, even though it were the very father who loved him as his own life. Had Absalom been told, some years before, that it would come to this, very likely he would have recoiled in horror from such a thought. But, dear reader, if you are living only for yourself, you know not to what awful lengths the devil may lead you. There is no safety from the worst of sin but in Jesus. It may be that the unhappy prince made gain of his father's sin, and excused himself by saying, "Well, if my father can commit adultery and murder, he cannot have much to say to me, if I faithfully follow in his steps; I don't make any profession, and anyway I am no hypocrite!" But this taking dishonest and wicked advantage of his father's sad fall could not be accepted by God as any excuse for him. Absalom was rushing on headlong to meet God's declared judgment.

King David divided his forces under three leaders, Joab, Abishai, and Ittai the Gittite. His first thought was to go forth with them himself. David's heart was on both sides of this TERRIBLE CIVIL WAR.

Oh, how truly had evil arisen out of his own house! If Absalom gained the victory, what then about his soul? If Absalom were conquered and slain, again what about his soul? David did not inquire of the Lord, he just let the three commanders overrule him. In the state of depression in which he then was, it was easier for him to let others decide, "What seemeth you best I will do?" There was, however, one charge which he made to each of the three in command, "Deal gently for my sake with the young man, even with Absalom." David could not say, "with my son," for Absalom was not doing a son's part, and it was his relation to his father which made his sin so heinous. But he could not call him "rebel." Absalom deserved no mercy; he ran in the face of God, but the father was as much alive in David's heart as though Absalom were his joy, and stay, and comfort. Such is the heart of God to His own children. He created that love in David's heart. Believer, He bears it toward you. "All the people heard when the king gave all the captains charge concerning Absalom." The battle was a fearful one; involved thousands in his own destruction, and rendered many women widows, many children fatherless. But the royal forces prevailed; there were believers who trusted in the Lord on the side of the king.

THE GUILTY PRINCE

Why did not David inquire of the Lord? There must have been in him some latent misgiving or unbelief. Perhaps he thought that if he trusted the whole matter over to God, He would execute vengeance upon Absalom, and his fatherly heart so yearned over his son, that he dare not face it. All along we see David bearing the burden himself; trusting his captains with the safety of his son, instead of putting him wholly into the hands of God. Had he trusted God, who knows but that Absalom might have been brought to repentance; have confessed and abandoned his sin, and become truly converted to the Lord? David's care and anxiety may have simply hindered the Lord; while his hands were on these painful circumstances, he kept God's hands off, and hastened the judgment on his son.

Most sadly misplaced was David's confidence in his captains. They, regarding Absalom with no father's eye, but as an unworthy, unnatural son, and a wicked rebel, wished nothing so much as his death, in the interests of the country and of David. "Cursed is the man that trusteth in man and maketh flesh his arm" (Jer. 17 : 5); "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put any confidence in man" (Ps. 118 : 8). David had to learn this lesson by bitter experience. His anxiety for his son was not only mistrust of God, but actual rebellion against Him, for he wanted to reverse God's sentence against one who was dear to him. In his heart, no doubt, he felt that as Absalom deserved only judgment, he could not appeal to God on his behalf, and so he must do the best for him himself, thus giving the lie to his own teaching, "Cast thy burden on the Lord, and He shall sustain thee" (Ps. 55 : 22).

The battle was a fearful one, and there was great slaughter and great destruction of those who were entangled in the wood. Absalom himself was stopped in his wicked career in a most unexpected way. The very hair which was his pride and the admiration of all his flatterers proved his destruction; for in riding under an oak it became entangled in the branches; the mule he rode on left him, and there

HE HUNG HELPLESS.

There was no escape for him. He might have weighed the chances whether one of his own followers or one of his father's should first perceive him. Who was to decide this? God. Had Absalom been a man of prayer and of faith, he would have cried unto the Lord. But God so ordered it that one of David's army discovered him, and told Joab, who reproached the man that he did not slay him. And when the man replied by quoting the king's command, and saying it was as much as his life was worth to lay hands on Absalom, Joab cut him short, saying, "I may not tarry thus with thee. And he took three darts in his hand, and thrust them through the heart of Absalom, while he was yet alive in the midst of the oak." Ten of Joab's young men, emboldened by their captain, finished the work, and before they left the spot, they cast Absalom's dead body into a pit, and "laid a very great heap of stones upon him." Thus this poor sinful prince reaped the reward of his sin and folly, the God against whom he had rebelled fulfilled His own Word, and put out "his lamp in obscure darkness."

DAVID'S GRIEF.

Joab sent Cushai with the tidings of victory to David; Ahimaaz outran him, and came first to the king. But he prevaricated when David asked him about the safety of Absalom, and it was Cushai, whom Joab sent, from whom he learned at last the real truth. "The king was much moved, and went up to the chamber over the gate, and wept; and as he went, thus he said, O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my son!" Oh, how different was his mourning now to the resignation with which he learned the death of his infant son, when he said, "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me" (II Sam. 12 : 22). Then David was in communion with God, restored from his backsliding, and in the exercise of full trust he could see the infant was safe with God. Now, on the contrary, he had no hope for Absalom's future; his own plans about his safety had all failed; from anxiety he went to despair, and became almost unconscious of all else but his grief. Whenever a man sets his heart strongly upon a thing, makes all his plans, and thinks to compass his ends by his own forethought, and then, after all, the whole thing breaks down, this leads him to despair. This is the secret of many a suicide; some speculation on which everything was staked has failed, and nothing but ruin remains; his whole will is against accepting the circumstances, and there is no recognition of the hand of God. David had not seen how, in undertaking this matter himself, he had failed to submit to the will of God, and how he had failed in trusting Him.

JOAB'S REPROOF.

When Joab was told how the king mourned for Absalom, and when he saw how the people were discouraged, and felt as though they were without a head, Joab came to the king, and spoke in his rough, blunt way, "Thou hast shamed this day the faces of all thy servants, which this day have saved thy life, and the lives of thy sons and of thy daughters, and the lives of thy wives, and the lives of thy concubines; in that thou lovest thine enemies, and hatest thy friends. For thou hast declared this day, that thou regardest neither princes nor servants: for this day I perceive, that if Absalom had lived, and all we had died this day, then it had pleased thee well." It was plain speaking, but it was the truth, and David was roused by it. A little later, and he would have lost his kingdom. It is Satan who drives us to despair. He magnifies the dark side of a trial, nails us down to consider the consequences of our past sins, and then says, "You are under judgment, consequently you are shut out from God." Satan is a liar. The prodigal son was under judgment in the far land, but when he arose, and came to his father, the judgment came to an end. Thank God, there are no circumstances, with the exception of a continuance in sin, which shut us out from God. Jesus has redeemed us from sin, and from all its consequences, but for these things He will be inquired of.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Violence of the Scourge in Southern France abated during the past week. The deaths both at Marseilles and Toulon decreased, as did the number of seizures. At the close of the week, however, a fresh outbreak occurred. The European correspondent of the New York Times cables a despatch he received from a physician in the Pharo Hospital at Marseilles, in which he says: "Following the notable falling off in deaths at Marseilles during the past week, we have now to report a slight increase. There has been a cessation of the mistral—the cold wind from the north-west—and a dense and suffocating heat pours itself down upon the city, accompanied by heavy fogs, which completely envelope the town and harbor. This combination of great heat and moisture has acted disastrously. As at the beginning of the epidemic, there have been several cases in which death ensued with great suddenness—cases foudroyants—and we have to record the melancholy death of Dr. Patras, which occurred eight hours after he was stricken down with the disease. To-day one of the students died, and the case was equally violent and distressing. Simultaneously three cases have occurred on board an English steamer in port." The same authority places the total number of deaths from the plague to the end of July at 2300. The suddenness of death appears to be the most remarkable feature of the disease. Of the total number of deaths from cholera this year probably the great majority died inside of nine hours after they were seized with their illness. Some have not died until after being sick a week or more, but the majority of cases were settled one way or the other within eight or ten hours. At the start there is diarrhœa and vomiting; this usually lasts but a short time; then follow the cramps and the icy chills, and this stage has commonly been reached by the time the patient has arrived at the hospital. If the circulation can then be restored and kept up there is some chance of recovery, though the chance is slight. But if the circulation cannot be kept up death is certain to ensue. Some patients die delirious, others in a comatose state.

China Continued to Threaten War Throughout last week, and the French Government strengthened its fleet, which occupies a position in front of Foochow. A panic prevailed in the city, which was increased when it was observed that the French ships were clearing their decks for action. Foreigners sent their wives out of the city and armed for their own defence. An English gunboat in the harbor sent a detachment of marines to assist in defending the foreign settlement. It was feared that if the French opened fire, an indiscriminate attack on foreigners would be made by the Chinese population. In spite of this threatening state of affairs it is still hoped that war will be averted by the payment of the indemnity.

The Irish Dynamiters, Egan, Daly, and McDonnell, were convicted on Friday last. McDonnell was released on parole, Egan was sentenced to penal servitude for twenty years, and Daly to penal servitude for life. Daly defended himself with remarkable ability. He admitted that he had buried the nitro-glycerine in the garden, and that he had explosives in his possession, but he contended that this fact did not constitute treason felony. He claimed that it was beneath the dignity of the British Crown to stigmatize him as an assassin on the evidence that had been given. He characterized this evidence as a tissue of falsehood and perjury from beginning to end. He was, he said, guilty of treason and felony only as every Irishman who dearly loves his country, who prays for her peace and would die for her freedom, is guilty of the same crime. In spite of his eloquence, the fact remains that he and those of his countrymen who actively assist in the dynamite operations have alienated the sympathy of the whole world from the Irish cause. No one with conscience and sense approves of the indiscriminate slaughter of innocent persons.

Two Items of Intelligence from France are significant signs of the condition of society. The new law facilitating divorce was passed last week, and the following day three thousand cases were set down for trial. The other fact is that the Senate voted to abolish the practice of offering prayer at the opening of its sessions.

The Failure of the International Conference on Egyptian affairs is admitted. Mr. Gladstone told the House of Commons that the Conference had failed to attain the objects for which it had met. The delegates were unanimous in their views respecting the prospective charges in Egypt and the necessity of a fresh loan, but England and France differed irreconcilably respecting the charges and the receipts. France refused to assent to any diminution of the dividends payable under the law of liquidation. England was unable to accept any plan which did not provide for the necessary charges of administration. The French plan, Mr. Gladstone said, would have entailed financial confusion in Egypt. Mr. Gladstone explicitly stated that he had never proposed to renew the dual control, which fact is gratifying. It was a curse to Egypt, and had much to do with bringing on the war. Mr. Gladstone said he had no proposals as yet to submit to the House. The Anglo-French agreement had ceased to be in force, and England's responsibility in Egypt had been greatly increased.

Mr. H. M. Stanley, the American Explorer, has returned to Europe from the Congo. He was met on his arrival at Ostend by the King of the Belgians and the directors of the African International Association, of which the King is president. The entire party remained a night in Ostend, and Mr. Stanley was entertained at a banquet given by King Leopold and the Duc d'Aumale. Mr. Stanley said that he had returned to Europe considering that he had completed the work of establishing satisfactory trading stations along the Congo River from its mouth to Stanley Pool, a distance of fourteen hundred miles by river. When he left the Congo country he was suffering badly from bronchitis, but was much benefited by the sea voyage. He eulogized the trading prospects of the country in the vicinity of the Congo River. Mr. Stanley considered that General Gordon commands perfectly practicable routes of escape from Khartoum, whether by way of Zanzibar on the east, or down the Congo to the west coast if the Nile is blocked. He did not believe that there was any necessity to send an expedition to his relief.

CAPTAIN ALLEN GARDINER, Pioneer Missionary to Terra del Fuego.—Scenes in his Life.

THE LATE COMMANDER ALLEN GARDINER, R. N.,

Pioneer Missionary to Terra del Fuego.

Birth and Boyish Predilections—Voyages and Appointments—A Memorable Era in his Life—Death of his Wife—Consecration to Pioneer Missionary Work—Explorations in Africa—Among the Indians of South America—Difficulties—Crosses over to Patagonia — A South American Missionary Society Formed—An Unpatronized Expedition—Among Hostile Natives—Accumulated Disasters—Starved to Death—The Present South American Mission.

THE reports recently received of the increasing usefulness of the mission in the extreme south of South America encourages the hope that that region of darkness may yet be enlightened by the Sun of Righteousness. The missionaries laboring there write hopefully of their work, and report that they have tokens that God is blessing their efforts. As we read this welcome intelligence, our thoughts are carried back to the man whose heart was so drawn to the inhabitants of that region that he braved the perils of man and of nature to carry the Gospel to them. The effort cost him his life, and the whole of the little party he led died with him. That man was Captain Allen Gardiner, whose portrait appears on the first page, and of whose life the following is a brief sketch :

Allen Francis Gardiner was born at Basildon, England, on June 28th, 1794, and died, in 1851, at the age of fifty-seven. His father, Samuel Gardiner, was a God-fearing man, and early instilled into the mind of his sons, of whom Allen was the fifth, principles of truth, which subsequently developed and ripened into abundant and widespread fruitfulness and blessing.

BOYISH PREDILECTIONS.

Very early in life Allen chose the navy as his profession. His boyish imagination was fired by a desire for adventure which manifested itself in various ways, some of them amusing, and all of them significant. On one occasion he was found asleep on the floor, when he ought to have been in bed, giving as his reason when aroused that it was his intention to travel all over the world, and that he therefore wished to accustom himself to hardships, of which his hard bed was the first in order. These incidents were carefully noted by the family, and in after years, when he became famous, they were published as proofs of his early ardor.

HE ENTERED THE NAVAL COLLEGE,

Portsmouth, on February 13th, 1808, at the age of fourteen. There he remained for two years, and became proficient in the theory of his chosen vocation. He first went to sea as a volunteer in the Fortune, Captain Vansittart, on July 20th, 1810, at Plymouth, and was transferred to the Phœbe, Captain Hillyar, at the Isle of France, in March of the following year. The following year he exchanged into the Dauntless, and sailed to Madras, Penang, Malacca, Singapore, Manila, and Macao. A little later the ship sailed to Australia, and thence to Chili and Peru, and eventually Allen Gardiner invalided from the ship, while she was at Sydney, and took passage to the Cape of Good Hope, from whence he sailed to England, and landed at Portsmouth on October 31st, 1822.

Allen Gardiner's connection with the Dauntless marks

A MEMORABLE ERA IN HIS LIFE,

for it includes the time in which he steadily set his face toward the service of God, and in which he began to take that deep interest in the aborigines of South America, and especially of Chili, which never afterward left him. It was on this voyage, moreover, that he made his first acquaintance with Christian missionaries, and had an opportunity of acquainting himself with the blessed effect of their devoted and self-denying labors at Singapore, and again at Tahiti. From his journal at this period we extract the following, under date "Cape Town, August, 1822 :

"The last time I visited this colony, I was walking in the broad way, and hastening by rapid strides to the brink of eternal ruin. Blessed be His name who loved us, and gave Himself for us ; has been wrought in my heart, and I am now enabled to derive pleasure and satisfaction in hearing and reading the Word of God, and in attending the means of grace. I trust that this alteration has indeed been effected by the Holy Spirit of God."

On July 1st, 1823, he was married to Julia Susanna, daughter of John Reade, Esq., and in the following year was again called to active service in his profession. He served three years more, visiting various ports in the Old and New World. He obtained his

PROMOTION AS COMMANDER

September 13th, 1826 ; but though he retained his early fondness for the service, and often applied for employment, he was never after this period actively engaged in it.

Mrs. Gardiner's health had never been robust, but in 1833 consumption developed itself with an ominous rapidity. Though everything was done that love and skill could suggest, she gradually declined, and on May 24th, 1834, died full of hope and peace through faith in the atoning sacrifice of Christ. Her last days were most bright and happy, and writing of the event a year later, the bereaved husband says : "Oh, what assurance of pardon, what joy, and peace, and heavenly tranquillity, and ardent desire to be with her Saviour did He infuse into her soul !"

From this time he devoted himself afresh to the service of God, and with all the force of his strong character set himself upon a new course. He chose the work of and went first of all to Africa, explored the Zulu country, and started the first missionary station at Port Natal. A few years later he devoted many months to an attempt to obtain entrance into New Guinea. Animated with love to Christ, and full of apostolic fervor, he went from island to island of the Indian Archipelago, endeavoring to find opportunity of introducing Christianity ; but all his efforts were baffled. The work, however, which has rendered his name famous, was that he was enabled to perform in South America, more particularly on the perilous shores of Terra del Fuego.

Having devoted his time and fortune for more than three years to the cause of the Gospel at Port Natal and in the Zulu country, he left South Africa on the breaking out of war between the Zulus and the emigrant Boers His mind naturally reverted to and of Chili, whose heroic maintenance of their own independence had, years before, excited his admiration, while their continued Paganism was in his view a standing reproach to the Christian world.

Captain Gardiner left Table Bay, in South Africa, on May 15th, 1838, and conducted his family to Rio Janeiro, thence to Buenos Ayres, and across the Pampas to Mendoza, and as soon as the season was sufficiently advanced, they crossed the Cordillera into Chili, and found themselves in the territory of

THE ARAUCANIAN INDIANS.

The method adopted for crossing the river Biobio is shown in one of the frontispiece pictures. The stream is exceedingly rapid, and the usual mode of crossing it was at that time by a raft. This raft consisted merely of four trunks of trees about eighteen feet long, lashed together by hide-thongs to two transverse poles, one at each extremity, and, when laden, was scarcely an inch in the highest part above the surface of the water. The real novelty, however, was

THE METHOD OF NAVIGATION.

Captain Gardiner says in his journal : "One of my horses was noted as an excellent swimmer, and his powers were now to be tried in a most ludicrous manner. His tail was first smoothed out, and the hair being doubled back, was firmly knotted to the end of a tow-rope ; a naked la then sprang upon his back, and in plunged th horse and his rider. By a simultaneous effor of those on the shore, the raft he was destine to tow was at the same instant pushed off int deep water. The boy succeeded, by the aid o his heels, his hand, and his voice, in urging o the snorting and half-affrighted animal until h conveyed us to the opposite bank, where he wa immediately disengaged, and the raft secure by the rope until we landed."

From 1838 to 1841 Captain Gardiner visite one tribe of Indians after another, his self-im posed mission being attended with huge diffi culties and at every turn. Many of these people he foun friendly to himself and favorable to his purpos of planting the standard of the cross of Chris among them ; but much of his effort was suc ceeded only by disappointment through th machinations of the Spanish padres, or priests of the Roman Catholic Church. Being a Chiloe, July 31st, 1841, he writes :

"Having at last abandoned, with great reluc tance, all hope of reaching the Indian popula tion in the part where they are most civilize and least migratory, my thoughts are necessaril turned toward the south. Happily for us, an I trust eventually for the poor Indians, th Falkland Islands are now under the British flag . . . . I purpose crossing over in a sealin vessel, and, if possible, bringing back with m two or three in order to teach them English, and thus pre pare them to become interpreters to the mis sionaries who, we trust, may eventually settl among them. Who can tell but that the Falk land Islands, so admirably suited for the pur pose, may become the key to the aborigine both of Terra del Fuego and of Patagonia !"

In consequence of the peaceable and friendl demeanor of the Patagonians, Captain Gardine was encouraged to believe that a good wor might be carried on among them, with ever hope of blessing. In 1844 a special society wa formed for South America alone. Its head quarters were established, and soon afterwar the principal of a public school, Mr. R. Hunt volunteered to go out and become the firs catechist in Patagonia. He and Captain Gard ner were landed at Oazy Harbor, in the Strai of Magellan, with three small huts, and neces sary provisions for three months. This was i the month of February, 1845. Before long however, it was necessary to abandon Patago nia, at least for a time.

SWIMMING WITH AN INDIAN.

But Captain Gardiner was not to be daunte by difficulties. He heard the Saviour's com mand to preach the Gospel even to the ends o the earth, and at his own expense penetrate with unabated heroism into Bolivia and Terr del Fuego. The difficulties he had to encoun ter were not spiritual and moral only ; ther were natural obstacles to overcome. One o these is depicted on our frontispiece picture. It was an event which occurred at Pilcomayo o March 23d, 1846. Captain Gardiner wished t cross the river, but found it was much too hig to be forded. He therefore engaged an India to swim across with him, and away they wen leaning together on a bundle of reeds. Th current was very rapid, but the captain, assiste by the Indian, breasted it gallantly, and a length stood safely on the opposite side, muc to the astonishment of the Indians, who wer surprised to see that a white man could swim a well as themselves.

We must turn now to the final effort whic ended Captain Gardiner's exertions for the ben efit of the South American Indians. Anxious indeed did he desire that some branch o Christ's Church would but after vainly submitting the question to h countrymen, he applied to the Moravian churc at Herrnhuth, in Silesia. The captain himse went to Herrnhuth to plead the cause, and was much gratified at meeting there some of the Moravian bishops and clergy from Africa, the West Indies, and other parts of the world, who had come to the synod which it is their custom to hold once in ten years. The proposal was fully discussed, but the final reply was given a year and a half afterward, declining the undertaking. Equally vain were two applications which were made to the Church Missionary Society and the Church of Scotland.

At length, mainly through the generosity of a private lady, a missionary expedition was fitted out under Gardiner's superintendence, and the little company sailed from Liverpool on September 7th, 1850. Three months later the party were landed at Picton Island, Terra del Fuego, one of the group of islands separated from the mainland of South America by the Straits of Magellan. All the islands are bleak and almost barren, mere rocks, the highest of which are covered with perpetual snow. Here little beside disappointment and danger attended them. Affairs reached a crisis in the following December, when food began to run short. On December 22d, 1850, some of the missionaries went out in one of their boats called the Pioneer, in the hope of obtaining provisions, and did not return to their anchorage till after midnight. The captain says:

"At daylight we were awoke by the voices of the natives, two of whom were preparing to enter the boat, which to our great concern we found immovable, the tide having left her aground. We united in prayer. The two natives observed us, and as we proceeded they became more quiet, and at length seemed in some degree awed. (See illustration.) Before our second boat, the Speedwell, which was now making for the shore, could approach, five more men made their appearance. Taking it for granted that which was the only conclusion we could draw from the overbearing conduct of the two who had been with us since daylight, we landed with our guns and walked toward them, and when within a few paces, we knelt down upon the beach and committed ourselves to the mercy and protection of our Heavenly Father. By and by we commenced our usual Sunday service. The natives were still close to the boat, but as we proceeded, they gradually became quiet, and their demeanor was greatly subdued. As soon as we were afloat again, both boats returned to their former anchorage in Banner Cove."

There was no mistaking the hostility of the natives, but the irresistible might of God kept them from annihilating the little party of Christian pioneers. Winter was coming on, and in the missionaries' quarters there was an almost UTTER ABSENCE OF FOOD.

Sickness also had prostrated some of the number, and death had invaded their ranks. A vessel had been long expected with provisions for the party, but it did not arrive. The anxious glances cast seaward took in no welcome sail. They watched, but it was all in vain.

In January, 1852, H.M.S. Dido left the Falklands, and arrived at Banner Cove on the 19th. The captain of the Dido says: "Our notice was first attracted by a boat lying upon the beach about a mile and a half inside of Cape Kinnaird. I sent Lieutenant Pigott and Mr. Roberts to reconnoitre and return immediately. They returned shortly, bringing some books and papers, having discovered and that of Mr. Maidment unburied. On one of the papers was written legibly, but without date, 'If you will walk along the beach for a mile and a half you will find us in the other boat, hauled up in the mouth of the river at the head of the harbor on the south side. Delay not, we are starving.'

"I landed early next morning, January 22d, and visited the spot indicated, where we found the wreck of a boat with part of her gear and stores, and the remains of two bodies. They were those of Mr. Williams, a surgeon, and John Pearce, a Cornish fisherman, and the papers clearly show the death and burial of all the rest of the mission party, seven in all. The two boats were about a mile and a half apart. Near the one where Captain Gardiner was lying was a large cavern, called by him Pioneer Cavern, and in it Mr. Maidment's body was found. Captain Gardiner's body was lying beside the boat, which apparently he had left, and being too weak to climb into it again, had died by the side of it. We were directed to the cavern by a hand painted on the rock, with 'Psalm 62 : 5-8' under it." (See illustration.)

In perusing this affecting narrative, the emotions which it excites are various. But regretful thoughts give place to wonder and admiration, and thankfulness for the grace of God, which was so strikingly displayed in not one alone, but all, so that they were examples to each other of patient endurance and unfailing faith. They endured as seeing Him who is invisible. They suffered the loss of all things in this world without repining, for their treasure was above; and though the outward man perished, the inward man was renewed day by day, till the earthly tabernacle was left for a home not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

THE SOUTH AMERICAN MISSION is now successfully at work, and in Terra del Fuego, the Falklands, and the Fuegian Archipelago, the Gospel is being preached, and many of the natives have gladly accepted Christ, and been baptized in His name. This mission was definitely founded in 1854, and ten years later chaplaincies were appointed on the east and west coasts of South America. The Falklands have been created a diocese, and a bishop appointed. The region of the mighty Amazon River is being made to ring with the news of salvation, and the wild districts of Terra del Fuego are being penetrated with the Gospel of Christ. An effort is now being made to raise $10,000, with which to purchase a suitable steamer for cruising among the islands and facilitating the operations of the missionaries.

FAITH-HEALING IN AUSTRALIA.

THE Adelaide Observer, a secular journal, of April 16th, 1884, contains the following narrative from its special reporter of a visit he paid to one of the faith-healing meetings now being conducted in that city by Mr. J. W. Wood, of Victoria:

"I wended my way toward the Christian Crusaders' Hall one evening this week. I learned that the service was conducted in the usual style for a certain time, after which any one present was called upon to give testimony as to cures which had been effected for him. Mr. Wood then delivered a short address preparatory to his receiving patients.

"The worshippers were as a rule well dressed, intelligent-looking people, who evidently did not belong to the lower orders of the city. Respectable tradesmen, with their wives and children, and young women, the majority of whom were conspicuous by their good looks, formed the greater part of the congregation, while here and there a poorer costume showed that the wearer was in a lower walk of life.

"At eight o'clock punctually Mr. Turnbull began the service by announcing a hymn, which was sung without any musical accompaniment, although as befits their rank, have an excellent band. The last verse of the hymn was sung kneeling, and then Mr. Turnbull indulged in prayer. The practice of keeping up a running fire of interjections, such as 'Bless the Lord,' 'Hallelujah,' 'Amen,' 'God be thanked for it,' when the speaker made any telling point, was followed by the worshippers.

"Mr. Turnbull next delivered a short address on the power of healing by the laying on of hands. He contended that the illness was the work of the devil, and that it had to quit when the power granted by Christ was brought into conflict with it. He stated that that day he had gone with a man and his wife, who was suffering from a burning fever, to Mr. Wood's residence. The woman could scarcely believe in the power, for she thought that the 'Lord loveth those whom He chasteneth;' but Mr. Wood convinced her that sin, death, and hell were the work of Satan, that Jesus had come to destroy them, and that the Father was a loving Father, who had no desire to see His children suffer. At length she fully comprehended the assurance, and in ten minutes after the laying on of hands the fever had gone, and a great swelling which she had had in her side had also disappeared. Mr. Turnbull added that facts were most stubborn things, and this cure was a fact which had come under his own personal observation, and he could testify to its accuracy.

"A lesson from chapter 16 of the Gospel of St. Mark, 14th and succeeding verses, was made the basis for the second address by Mr. Turnbull, in which he argued that the words, 'And these signs shall follow them that believe. They shall lay their hands on the sick, and they shall recover,' was divine authority for Mr. Wood to exercise the power which had been given to him. He pointed out that the first part of the Apostles' mission was to heal the sick, and then to attend to the spiritual wants of the people. This was the way in which Mr. Wood acted.

"At the call of the preacher,

were given as to the result of Mr Wood's mission. The first person who spoke announced that he had seen a barmaid who was suffering from an ulcerated throat and low fever, completely relieved by Mr. Wood, although they had resisted medical and hydropathic treatment. The girl had formerly been unable to eat, but immediately after her interview with Mr. Wood she found herself quite able to partake of food. Mrs. Morgan, the directress of the hydropathic establishment, Hurtle Square, then recounted how she had been suffering from heart disease for twenty years, and that the pain she had been subjected to was fearful; but since Mr. Wood had exercised his power in regard to her all the pain had disappeared, and she was better than she had been for years. These statements were made with every appearance of sincerity, and subsequent questioning showed that the people believed in the reality and efficacy of the cure.

"Then Mr. Wood stepped upon the platform. I saw that he was a man of medium height, of rather spare build, with pale features, and with a long dark beard. His manner was quiet but thoroughly earnest, and from his mode of speech it was clear that he was not a man who had gone through a severe college course. He began by saying that he thought facts would go further to establish the truth of the doctrine they believed in than anything else. He recognized that was from God, who had made him an instrument for exercising the power of healing by the laying on of hands. He had only to state that since he came here on Friday last over one hundred persons had been brought to the Lord and had been healed by His mighty power. He only knew of one other person in Victoria who possessed this power, and since they had become conscious of it many thousands had been healed. He did not think that there was any person who had been so treated who, if he had not been healed at once, had not become greatly relieved. He pointed to St. Mark, as quoted by Mr. Turnbull, to show that the power he possessed was not of man, but that of God. Sacred history proved that this gift existed among the Christians for four hundred years after Christ, but during the persecutions that followed the power seemed to have become dormant, and it had continued so until the present time, when it had been revived by the Lord to show His power to unbelievers, and to combat the works of the devil."

"During this address I had been considering where Mr. Wood conducted his operations, and a question or two put to a worshipper beside me revealed the fact that the manifestations of his power were made in a room in another part of the building. I watched and saw one man who had

into the room even with the assistance of a stick emerge from it, dispensing with the use of the stick, and he shouted aloud as he re-entered the hall. He was met with loud cries of 'Glory be to God!' and 'Blessed be His name!' and afterward when he reached the platform he cried aloud to be permitted to pray. His supplication was brief, and then, dropping his stick, he bent down, covered his face with his hands, and cried with joy at his spiritual and physical recovery. This scene of course created some little stir among the worshippers, although entirely unknown to Mr. Wood, who in the mean time had another patient in the room with him. Observing that he did not quite close the door of the room after a woman had entered it, I pushed it open a little in order to observe his

METHOD OF TREATMENT.

A man who was suffering from some lameness which did not permit of his bending his knee when he walked entered the room. I saw that the apartment contained only a lamp, a table, and a chair. Mr. Wood received his patient at the table, and put the question to him, 'Do you believe you are saved through Christ?' A reply being received in the affirmative, he next asked, 'Do you believe in the power of healing through Christ?' A similar answer being given, Mr. Wood then placed his hands on the man's head, and standing opposite to him, with his face as close to his as possible, he uttered a short prayer, in which he asked for assistance from Christ to expel the ailment from the man's body. He then proceeded to stroke him downward with his hands, beginning at the head and continuing down the side until he reached the affected leg. He then commanded the devil through Christ to leave the leg, and stroked the limb further downward until the foot was reached. He inquired then if the man felt any pain in his knee, whereupon he was told that it had gone into the ankle. The stroking process was again applied, and the patient stated that all the pain had disappeared. He was then dismissed, but was told before he departed that if the pain returned he was to stroke the part affected and ask Christ to take it away.

From inquiry I found that this is the method employed in all cases. The man who had been so treated informed me that he had been suffering from acute rheumatism in the knee for eight months, and that the medical officers at the hospital had not been able to cure him. He then proved by moving his leg upward that the stiffness had disappeared, and when walking into the hall, unconscious of my observation, his step was as firm as that of any other person.

"Mr. Wood, it appears, is a man who is very well known in Victoria. He has been in business for years in Melbourne, and is said to be in an independent position so far as worldly affairs are concerned. He has been engaged in evangelical work for a considerable time past in Melbourne, and was one of those who were the means of introducing Mr. Varley and Mrs. Hampson to the colonies. It seems that some months ago he felt that he must know more of the divine life, and so for some time he gave himself entirely up to prayer. During this period he underwent great bodily and mental trial, with the result that he felt that God had given him some great blessing. However, he did not know what that gift was until one day, when praying with a sick person, he happened to lay his hands upon him, and instantly the process of healing was accomplished. He will not put his hands upon people who do not thoroughly believe that they are saved, and until they have professed faith in Christ and in this power of healing. No fee is charged, nor is any one expected to pay anything."

THE WITNESS-STAND.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"We are witnesses."—Acts 3 : 15.

Scientists Confuted by Facts—Scientific Proof Unreliable—Testimony not Logic the Basis of Faith—The Power of the Gospel—Proved by Witnesses—I. Its Power to Convert—Testimony from Heathendom—From the Church—From Experience—II. Its Power to Comfort—A Clumsy World—The Test at the Grave-side—III. Its Power to Give Composure in Death—The First Funeral—A Nervous Mother Tranquil—No Lack of Witnesses—All Who Have Tried it—Discovery of a NewStar—An Opera-Singer's Magnanimity.

In the days of George Stephenson, the perfector of the locomotive engine, the scientists proved conclusively that a railway train could never be driven by steam-power successfully and without peril; but the rushing express trains from Liverpool to Edinburgh, and from Edinburgh to London, have made all the nation witnesses of the splendid achievement. Machinists and navigators proved conclusively that a steamer could never cross the Atlantic Ocean; but no sooner had they successfully proved the impossibility of such an undertaking than the work was done, and the passengers on the Cunard, and the Inman, and the National, and the White Star lines are witnesses. There went up a guffaw of wise laughter at Professor Morse's proposition to make the lightning of heaven his errand-boy, and it was proved conclusively that the thing could never be done; but now all the news of the wide world, by Associated Press put in your hands every morning and night, has made

ALL NATIONS WITNESSES.

So in the time of Christ it was proved conclusively that it was impossible for Him to rise from the dead. It was shown logically that when a man was dead, he was dead, and the heart and the liver and the lungs having ceased to perform their offices, the limbs would be rigid beyond all power of friction or arousal. They showed it to be an absolute absurdity that the dead Christ should ever get up alive; but no sooner had they proved this than the dead Christ arose, and the disciples beheld Him, heard His voice, and talked with Him, and they took the witness-stand to prove that to be true which the wiseacres of the day had proved to be impossible; the record of the experiment and of the testimony is in the text: "Him hath God raised from the dead, whereof

WE ARE WITNESSES."

Now, let me play the sceptic for a moment. "There is no God," says the sceptic, "for I have never seen Him with my physical eyesight. Your Bible is a pack of contradictions. There never was a miracle. Lazarus was not raised from the dead, and the water was never turned into wine. Your religion is an imposition on the credulity of the ages." There is an aged man moving in that pew as though he would like to respond. Here are hundreds of people with faces a little flushed at these announcements, and all through this house there is a suppressed feeling which would like to speak out in behalf of the truth of our glorious Christianity, as in the days of the text, crying out, "We are witnesses!"

The fact is, that if this world is ever brought to God, it will not be through argument, but through testimony. You might cover the whole earth with apologies for Christianity and learned treatises in defence of religion—you would not convert a soul. Lectures on the harmony between science and religion are beautiful mental discipline, but have never saved a soul, and never will save a soul. Put a man of the world and a man of the Church against each other, and the man of the world will in all probability get the triumph. There are a thousand things in our religion that seem illogical to the world, and always will seem illogical.

Our weapon in this conflict is faith, not metaphysics; faith, not profundity, faith, not scholastic exploration. But then, in order to have faith, we must have testimony, and if five hundred men, or one thousand men, or five hundred thousand men, or five million men get up and tell me that they have felt the religion of Jesus Christ a joy, a comfort, a help, an aspiration, I am bound as a fair-minded man to accept their testimony. I want just now to put before you three propositions, the truth of which I think this audience will attest with overwhelming unanimity.

I. The first proposition is, We are witnesses that the religion of Christ is ABLE TO CONVERT A SOUL.

The Gospel may have had a hard time to conquer us, we may have fought it back, but we were vanquished. You say conversion is only an imaginary thing. We know better. "We are witnesses." There never was so great a change in our heart and life on any other subject as on this. People laughed at the missionaries in Madagascar because they preached ten years without one convert; but there are 33,000 converts in Madagascar to-day. People laughed at Doctor Judson, the Baptist missionary, because he kept on preaching in Burmah five years without a single convert; but there are 20,000 Baptists in Burmah to-day. People laughed at Doctor Morrison, in China, for preaching there seven years without a single conversion; but there are 15,000 Christians in China to-day. People laughed at the missionaries for preaching at Tahiti fifteen years without a single conversion, and at the missionaries for preaching in Bengal seventeen years without a single conversion; yet in all those lands there are multitudes of Christians to-day.

But why go so far to find

to save a soul? "We are witnesses." We were so proud that no man could have humbled us; we were so hard that no earthly power could have melted us; angels of God were all around about us, they could not overcome us; but one day, perhaps at a Methodist anxious seat, or at a Presbyterian catechetical lecture, or at a burial, or on horseback, a power seized us, and made us get down, and made us tremble, and made us kneel, and made us cry for mercy, and we tried to wrench ourselves away from the grasp, but we could not. It flung us flat, and when we arose we were as much changed as Gourgis, the heathen, who went into a prayer-meeting with a dagger and a gun, to disturb the meeting and destroy it, but the next day was found crying, "Oh! my great sins! Oh! my great Saviour!" and for eleven years preached the Gospel of Christ to his fellow-mountaineers, the last words on his dying lips being, "free grace!" Oh, it was free grace!

There is a man who was for ten years

A HARD DRINKER.

The dreadful appetite had sent down its roots around the palate and the tongue, and on down until they were interlinked with the vitals of body, mind, and soul; but he has not taken any stimulants for two years. What did that? Not temperance societies. Not prohibition laws. Not moral suasion. Conversion did it. "Why," said one upon whom the great change had come, "sir, I feel just as though I were somebody else!"

There is a sea-captain who swore all the way from New York to Havana, and from Havana to San Francisco, and when he was in port he was worse than when he was on the sea. What power was it that washed his tongue clean of profanities, and made him a psalm-singer? Conversion by the Holy Spirit. There are thousands of people in this house to-night who are no more what they once were than a water-lily is nightshade, or a morning lark is a vulture, or day is night.

Now, if I should demand that all those people in this house who have felt the converting power of religion should rise, so far from being ashamed, they would spring to their feet with more alacrity than they ever sprang to the dance, the tears mingling with their exhilaration as they cried, "We are witnesses!" And if they tried to sing the old Gospel hymn, they would break down with emotion by the time they got to the second line:

"Ashamed of Jesus, that dear friend
On whom my hopes of heaven depend?
No! When I blush, be this my shame:
That I no more revere His name."

II. Again, I remark that "we are witnessess of the Gospel's

POWER TO COMFORT.

When a man has trouble the world comes in and says, "Now get your mind off this; go out and breathe the fresh air; plunge deeper into business." What poor advice. Get your mind off of it! when everything is upturned with the bereavement, and everything reminds you of what you have lost. Get your mind off of it! They might as well advise you to stop thinking. You cannot stop thinking, and you cannot stop thinking in that direction. Take a walk in the fresh air! Why, along that very street, or that very road, she once accompanied you. Out of that grass-plat she plucked flowers, or into that show-window she looked, fascinated, saying, "Come see the pictures." Go deeper into business! Why, she was associated with all your business ambition, and since she has gone you have no ambition left.

Oh, this is

when it tries to comfort a broken heart. I can build a Corlear's engine, I can paint a Raphael's "Madonna," I can play a Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony" as easily as this world can comfort a broken heart. And yet you have been comforted. How was it done? Did Christ come to you and say, "Get your mind off this; go out and breathe the fresh air; plunge deeper into business?" No. There was a minute when He came to you—perhaps in the watches of the night, perhaps in your place of business, perhaps along the street—and He breathed something into your soul that gave peace, rest, infinite quiet, so that you could take out the photograph of the departed one and look into the eyes and the face of the dear one, and say, "It is all right; she is better off; I would not call her back. Lord, I thank Thee that Thou hast comforted my poor heart.

There are Christian parents here who are to the power of this Gospel to comfort. Your son had just graduated from school or college and was going into business, and the Lord took him. Or your daughter had just graduated from the young ladies' seminary, and you thought she was going to be a useful woman and of long life; but the Lord took her, and you were tempted to say, "All this culture of twenty years for nothing!" Or the little child came home from school with the hot fever that stopped not for the agonized prayer or for the skilful physician, and the little child was taken. Or the babe was lifted out of your arms by some quick epidemic, and you stood wondering why God ever gave you that child at all, if so soon He was to take it away. And yet you are not repining, you are not fretful, you are not fighting against God.

What has enabled you to stand all the trial? "Oh," you say, "I took the medicine that God gave my sick soul. In my distress I threw myself at the feet of a sympathizing God; and when I was too weak to pray, or to look up, He breathed into me a peace that I think must be the foretaste of that heaven where there is neither a tear, nor a farewell, nor a grave." Come, all ye who have been out to the grave to weep there—come, all ye comforted souls, get up off your knees. Is there no power in this Gospel to soothe the heart? Is there no power in this religion to quiet the worst paroxysm of grief? There comes up an answer from comforted widowhood, and orphanage, and childlessness, saying, "Ay, ay, we are witnesses!"

III. Again, I remark that we are witnesses of the fact that religion has in the last moment. I never shall forget the first time I confronted death. We went across the cornfields in the country. I was led by my father's hand, and we came to the farmhouse where the bereavement had come, and we saw the crowd of wagons and carriages; but there was one carriage that especially attracted my boyish attention, and it had black plumes. I said, "What's that? what's that? Why those black tassels at the top?" and after it was explained to me, I was lifted up to look upon the bright face of an aged Christian woman, who three days before had departed in triumph; the whole scene made an impression I never forgot.

In our sermons and in our lay exhortations we are very apt, when we want to bring illustrations of dying triumph, to go back to some distinguished personage—to a John Knox or a Harriet Newell. But

I WANT YOU FOR WITNESSES.

I want to know if you have ever seen anything to make you believe that the religion of Christ can give composure in the final hour. Now, in the courts, attorney, jury, and judge will never admit mere hearsay. They demand that the witness must have seen with his own eyes, or heard with his own ears, and so I am critical in my examination of you now; and I want to know whether you have seen or heard anything that makes you believe that the religion of Christ gives composure in the final hour.

"Oh, yes," you say, "I saw my father and mother depart. There was a great difference in their death-beds. Standing by the one we felt more veneration. By the other, there was more tenderness." Before the one, you bowed perhaps in awe. In the other case, you felt as if you would like to go along with her.

HOW DID THEY FEEL

in that last hour? How did they seem to act? Were they very much frightened? Did they take hold of this world with both hands as though they did not want to give it up? "Oh, no," you say; "no, I remember as though it were yesterday; she had a kind word for us all, and there were a few mementoes distributed among the children, and then she told us how kind we must be to our father in his loneliness, and then she kissed us good-by and went asleep as calmly as a child in a cradle."

What made her so composed? Natural courage? "No," you say, "mother was very nervous; when the carriage inclined to the side of the road, she would cry out; she was always rather weakly." What, then, gave her composure? Was it because she did not care much for you, and the pang of parting was not great? "Oh," you say, "she showered upon us a wealth of affection; no mother ever loved her children more than mother loved us; she showed it by the way she nursed us when we were sick, and she toiled for us until her strength gave out." What, then, was it that gave her composure in the last hour? Do not hide it. Be frank and let me know. "Oh," you say, "it was because she was so good; she made the Lord her portion, and she had faith that she would go straight to glory, and that we should all meet her at last at the foot of the throne."

Here are people who say, "I saw a Christian brother die, and he triumphed." And some one else, "I saw a Christian sister die, and she triumphed." Some one else will say, "I saw a Christian daughter die, and she triumphed." Come, all ye who have seen of a Christian, and give testimony in this cause on trial. Uncover your heads, put your hand on the old family Bible from which they used to read the promises, and promise in the presence of high heaven that you will tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. With what you have seen with your own eyes, and from what you have heard with your own ears, is there power in this Gospel to give calmness and triumph in the last exigency? The response comes from all sides, from young, and old, and middle-aged: "We are witnesses!"

You see, my friends, I have not put before you to-night an abstraction, or a chimera, or anything like guess-work. I present you affidavits of the best men and women, living and dead. Two witnesses in court will establish a fact. Here are not two witnesses, but thousands of witnesses—on earth millions of witnesses, and in heaven a great multitude of witnesses that no man can number, testifying that there is power in this religion to convert the soul, to give comfort in trouble, and to afford composure in the last hour.

If ten men should come to you when you are sick with appalling sickness, and say they had the same sickness, and took a certain medicine, and it cured them, you would probably take it. Now, suppose ten other men should come up and say, "We don't believe there is anything in that medicine." "Well," I say,

"HAVE YOU EVER TRIED IT?"

"No, I never tried it, but I don't believe there is anything in it." Of course you discredit their testimony. The sceptic may come and say, "There is no power in your religion." "Have you ever tried it?" "No, no." "Then, avaunt!" Let me take the testimony of the millions of souls that have been converted to God, and comforted in trial, and solaced in the last hour. We will take their testimony as they cry, "We are witnesses!"

Some time ago Professor Henry, of Washington, discovered and the tidings sped by submarine telegraph, and all the observatories of Europe were watching for that new star. Oh, hearer, looking out through the darkness of thy soul to-night, canst thou see a bright light beaming on thee? "Where?" you say; "where? How can I find it?" Look along by the line of the cross of the Son of God. Do you not see it trembling with all tenderness and beaming with all hope? It is the Star of Bethlehem.

"Deep horror then my vitals froze,
Death-struck, I ceased the tide to stem,
When suddenly a star arose—
It was the Star of Bethlehem."

Oh, hearer, get your eye on it. It is easier for you now to become Christians than it is to stay away from Christ and heaven. When began her musical career she was hissed off the stage at Vienna by the friends of her rival, Amelia Steininger, who had already begun to decline through her dissipation. Years passed on, and one day Madame Sontag, in her glory, was riding through the streets of Berlin, when she saw a little child leading a blind woman, and she said, "Come here, my little child, come here. Who is that you are leading by the hand?" And the little child replied, "That's my mother; that's Amelia Steininger. She used to be a great singer, but she lost her voice, and she cried so much about it that she lost her eyesight." "Give my love to her," said Madame Sontag, "and tell her an old acquaintance will call on her this afternoon."

The next week in Berlin a vast assemblage gathered at a benefit for that poor blind woman, and it was said that Madame Sontag sang that night as she had never sung before. And she took a skilled oculist, who in vain tried to give eyesight to the poor blind woman. Until the day of Amelia Steininger's death, Madame Sontag took care of her, and her daughter after her. That was what the queen of song did for her enemy.

But, oh, hear a more thrilling story still. Blind immortal, poor and lost, thou who, when the world and Christ were rivals for thy heart, didst hiss thy Lord away—Christ comes now to give thee sight, to give thee a home, to give thee heaven. With more than a Sontag's generosity He comes now to meet your need. With more than a Sontag's music He comes to plead for thy deliverance.

THE COMING OF THE LORD.

ITS CONSISTENCY WITH CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE.

By the Rev. Dr. E. R. Craven,

Pastor Third Presbyterian Church, Newark, N. J.

The Central Doctrine—Said to be Inconsistent with Other Doctrines—The Spirit as a Renewer—Paul Called in an Appearing—Consistent with the Continuance of the Spirit's Work—The Whole World not to be Converted before Christ Comes—Illustration of an Obstructing Column.

THE central doctrine of Pre-Millenarianism is this: That an Advent of Christ, in His glorified body, is ever imminent for the establishment of what is generally known as the Millennium. We believe that when the Gospel of the Kingdom has been preached as a witness in every land (as it has already been)—that when the elect number of the Gentiles has been gathered in—we believe that then the Redeemer shall come to Zion; that then He shall destroy Antichrist by the brightness of His Appearing; that then He shall gather now-blinded Israel to His side; that then "the kingdom and dominion and greatness of the kingdom under the whole heavens shall be given to the people of the Saints of the Most High."

The Catholic doctrine, which this is said to contravene, is, that it is the office of the Spirit to apply the redemption purchased by Christ—that the Spirit is the Renewer. This doctrine we believe and proclaim as completely, we think, as any class of men. It may be said, however, that whatever our thoughts may be, the doctrine of a Pre-Millennial Advent is logically inconsistent therewith—inconsistent either with the continuance of the Spirit's office after the appearance of Christ, or with His dignity in the exercise thereof.

That our doctrine is not, in Jehovah's esteem, inconsistent with the idea of the continuance of the Spirit's office in a glorious and miraculous Appearing of Jesus is manifest from

THE DECLARATIONS OF THE SCRIPTURES.

The Apostle Paul was called and converted in such an Appearing (Acts 9: 3–10). And yet he writes to Titus (3: 5): "According to His mercy He saved us (not you, but us, including Himself) by the washing of regeneration and the renewing of the Holy Ghost." The Apostle, be it remembered, was "as one born out of due time" (1 Cor. 15: 8), not late, but early. He was born, not as a lagging member of a brotherhood already called, but as the elder brother of blinded, persecuting Israel, "the pattern of them that should afterward believe" when the Lord should rend the veil from their hearts. He was the type of those to be in like manner effectually called in the day when the promise spoken by Zechariah (12: 10) shall be fulfilled—"I will pour upon the house of David and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem the Spirit of grace and supplications; and they shall look upon me whom they have pierced." The glorious Appearing unto Paul was but the harbinger—the morning star—of the day which shall yet be; the work of the Spirit wrought in him was but the earnest of that which shall then be wrought in now benighted Israel.

It may be said, however, that while our doctrine is not inconsistent with the continuance of the Spirit's work, it is inconsistent with His dignity in that continuance. This objection can proceed on only one of two foundations, both of which I will briefly consider.

The first is that our doctrine implies that the Spirit cannot renew the world by

EXISTING INSTRUMENTALITIES

—that the Spirit is unable to renew it without the presence of Jesus. We hold no such heresy as this, nor is it logically connected with our doctrine. That the Spirit will not thus act without the presence of our Lord we believe and affirm—that He cannot, we deny.

There is indeed a secondary, a subordinate sense, in which it is necessary Christ should appear in glory before the Spirit performs His great work of renewing the nations—a necessity arising from what is essential to the fulfilment of prophecy—from what is essential to the realization of declared purposes. Thus, for instance, it was necessary that Christ should be born in Bethlehem and that He should be sacrificed in Jerusalem. Not necessary in the nature of things—another town than Bethlehem, another city than Jerusalem, might have been chosen. Not necessary as a matter of ability that He should have been born at all, or that He should have been sacrificed at all. He could have destroyed His murderers. But necessary in order to the fulfilment of prophecies concerning Him, necessary to the carrying out of the declared purposes of Jehovah. This use of the term is often confounded with the former, and hence, I suspect, the objection. In this secondary sense, and in this only, is it affirmed by any that it is before the general renewal of the world by the Spirit.

Cognate with the general objection we have been considering is another—viz., that our doctrine is inconsistent with the doctrine that the Spirit is to convert the world simply through the instrumentality of the preaching of the Gospel by a militant Church. We admit the inconsistency—nay, we proclaim it—affirming that the doctrine with which ours is inconsistent is neither scriptural nor Catholic.

Every prevalent error, I may remind you in passing, has its basis in truth. It is a truth that the Church was commanded to go forth and preach the Gospel among all nations—it is a truth that during the absence of her head, by such labor under the influences of the Spirit, she propagates herself, gathering from among all nations the elect number of the Gentiles—the bride preparing for the bridegroom. Now, it is manifest that this gathering is of the Redeemer—which Coming is in order to the inbringing of the Millennium. We therefore say, and the Church has ever said, that in laboring to spread the Gospel we are laboring to bring in the latter day of promised glory. And here is the confusion. On our platform we are striving in order to that end, but not directly thereto. The distinction I contemplate between striving in order to an end, and striving directly thereto, may be made clear by a simple illustration:

In the dominion of some earthly king there stands a granite mountain that retards the march of improvement. Broken into fragments, it would not only cease to retard progress, but its particles disintegrated would themselves become the instruments of blessing. The monarch commands his servants to labor to break in pieces that mountain. In obedience to his commands they go forth with pick and shovel and barrow to attack that which resists and to utilize that which they gather. They labor in every part, and from every part they gather with toil that which is useful. Now, there are two objects of labor conceivable—the one is that laboring in every part they shall dig down the mountain—this is labor directly to the end; the other object is that laboring in every part and gathering that which is useful, as do the others, they may prepare shafts and chambers in which some skilful engineer shall pour his dynamite, and in a moment, when the right time comes, blast that which hindereth unto usefulness—this is labor in order to the end.

Now, our belief is that the latter is the form of labor assigned to the Church, which in these modern days has been by multitudes interpreted as the former. Our belief is that when the Church has accomplished her appointed work—when the right time shall arrive—the Master shall come with the mighty outpourings of His Spirit; and that the mountain of ignorance and sin shall flow down at His presence.

Such, we believe, is the doctrine of the Word of God. Does it, as is alleged by some, cut the nerve of missionary effort. It was by the hope begotten and fostered by this doctrine, that the Apostolic Church was energized; the hope that they might see the King in His beauty ere their eyes closed in death—that their tongues might swell the glad hosannahs that should welcome His approach—that they, by labor wrought by their redeemed hands, might hasten even unto their own day the coming of the time when He, the Redeemer, might see in fulness, the fruit of the travail of His soul, and be satisfied.

Oh, glorious doctrine! oh, glorious hope sprung from its bosom! Wonder you if those into whose hearts it has entered have been the pioneers, the foremost laborers in missionary effort? With heart and with voice we must ever echo the cry of him who once leaned on Jesus' breast and longed for His reappearing: "Even so; come, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

The Lady and the Workmen.—At a Recent meeting the Rev. John Scott said: "A Christian lady in the West End knew of some workpeople who were interested about their souls. However, she could not get them out a long distance to the meetings of Moody and Sankey, so she sent a cab for them. With the cab I got a message, saying, 'I am sending a cab full of men I am specially interested in; I hope you will see that they get a good seat so that they may hear the Gospel.' Most of these men left the meeting 'new creatures' in Christ Jesus."

A Convert and his Stepmother.—Mr. Scroggie, in asking prayer for young converts in their difficulties, says: "I spoke to a young man in a hall in Scotland one Sabbath evening, who told me he would have trusted Christ on the Sabbath night before but for a little trouble he had at home. He and his stepmother, who was very kind to him, had had a little difference, and they were not on friendly terms. He said he could not go home and be a Christian and live in that state. I advised him to take Christ there and then, and gave him this verse in Proverbs: 'In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths.' Then he said, 'I will take Christ now,' and asked me to pray for him. He then said, 'Mutual forgiveness will now secure a happy home.'"

A Successful Emigrant.—Dr. Somerville Remarked: "Some time ago, when I was in our Australian colonies, and had been speaking to a large assembly in a theatre, a woman came to me and inquired, 'Do you know me?' She mentioned her name, and I said, 'Oh, yes, I remember you.' She was a woman whom I had taken out of one of the vile alleys of Argyle Street seventeen years before, and who, after being carefully watched over in Glasgow, was shipped off as an emigrant to Australia; and now I found her at the head of a great establishment, with a number of respectable young women under her charge. She was respectably married, and, as far as I knew, for seventeen years she had been walking faithfully in the way of the Lord. Here was an illustration of what God's grace can do!"

A Brother and Sister Newly-Born.—Mrs. Macfarlane tells a very interesting incident that happened recently: "In the lower part of a circus, in which a Gospel meeting was being held, a young woman was induced to accept Christ, and on the young convert's card her address was taken as —— Duke Street. I was asked by a gentleman, who had to leave to catch the train, to speak to a boy in another part of the building. I was glad to do so. He was a bright, intelligent boy of twelve or fourteen, and in order to gain his attention I asked him a number of questions, among others, where he lived? He told me Duke Street, and I said, 'Is it at No. ——?' (giving the number mentioned by the girl I have spoken to), and he said 'Yes, that is my number. How do you know it?' I told him if he lived at —— perhaps he had a sister in the building? 'Yes, I have,' he said. Then I told him how she had given her heart to the Lord, and how she would be rejoiced to know that he had done the same. He became very interested as I pointed him to the Saviour, and he seemed just ready to grasp the truth. Both he and his sister are rejoicing in Christ."

A Domestic Servant Saved.—Mr. William Sloan related: "We were lately holding some evangelistic meetings in the country, when I got a note from a girl who was interested about a friend in Glasgow. This girl had only been converted about a fortnight. She asked me to write to her friend, who, she said, had long been anxious about her soul. I did so, and I got a letter by return of post, stating that it was inconvenient for me to see her as I proposed; but she would come down to the meeting last night, where I met her. She had come a distance of two miles, and was waiting in the corridor when I got there. I talked to her for some time, directing her as to the way of life, and she went away rejoicing in the Lord. She never entered the meeting, for being an old servant and living a considerable distance away she had to hasten home, but she took Christ with her."

To be Recognized by his Sleeve-link.—Mr. Craig related: "One Saturday some of our men were leaving a meeting at the Christian Institute, and being unable to contain themselves began singing hymns and giving testimony at the street corner. After one man had spoken, telling the story of his life and salvation, a gentleman from the crowd said to him, 'What you have just said is my life. Though I was a rich man I have gone through a large fortune, except some £2000. From this night forward I will take a new course, and follow Christ, instead of existing in sin.' Taking a sleeve-link from his cuff, he continued, 'We are strangers to each other, but to prove to you that I am in earnest, take and keep this link till I advertise for it in a short time; when you see the advertisement, bring it to me, and you will know who I am.'"

Just Out of Prison.—A Minister Said: "A man came to my study, at half past nine o'clock one morning, anxious about his soul. An earnest Christian visitor had been visiting in one of the most degraded parts of the town, and came upon this man. He only left prison on the previous Saturday. He was a quarrelsome drunkard, and going home a fortnight before, he beat his mother-in-law, for which conduct he underwent ten days' imprisonment. He was prayed with and urged to attend a Gospel meeting last night. He said, 'I cannot go, I am in such rags.' He was told that most likely there would be other people there in their working clothes; and finally he promised to go. This morning, he said, 'Instead of looking down upon me, everybody seemed glad to see me.' The result was the poor fellow was thoroughly broken down, and gave himself to the Saviour. He is a most striking trophy of divine grace."

Ringleaders in Village Mischief.—The Rev. M. Bass said: "There were three strong, good-looking young men, who were the very ringleaders of the village in everything that was riotous. A revival of religion took place, and many people were brought to the Lord. These three men did what they could to stop the good work, but were completely baffled. They met together to concoct further measures, when one of them said, 'The people are all growing mad about religion; the idea of young men and old men, young women and old women, behaving in this way; the thing is absurd; the place will soon be too hot to hold us; we must take ourselves off.' This seemed to the other two the best thing they could do; so they made up their minds to go to Greenock, and off they went, and worked at their trade as carpenters. The revival grew stronger, and the three young men made up their minds to return home and see what they could do to stop it, at the same time agreeing together that they would not let their hearts be touched by the Gospel. When they came to the place where the meeting was being held, they could not get a seat where they could be together, so they had to separate and take seats where they could not see each other. They did not meet again for a fortnight, but when they did the three men stood gazing at each other in silence for a second or two. At length one said, 'I have broken my covenant with you, and have taken the Lord Jesus as my Saviour.' 'So have I,' said the second. The third came over, took a hand of each, and said, 'I am so glad that we have all accepted the offered gift; we will now try and fight as hard for Christ as we fought against Him.' And they did so till death took two of them home; the other, an old man, told me this story, and though he cannot now do any active work for Christ, he lives for the Master."

NEW BOOKS.

"THE REFORMED CHURCH in the Netherlands, Traced from 1340 to 1840 in Short Historical Sketches" is the title of a new work by the Rev. Maurice G. Hansen, A.M. These five centuries of Church life are vividly sketched by the hand of a master. No one could have been selected better fitted for the task of writing the history. At once careful as to dates and figures, scrupulously accurate in statements of fact, Mr. Hansen has not thought his work complete when the statistical part of it was performed. He has shown how the Holy Spirit was moving in the Church and arousing it to higher and greater efforts.

Commencing with "the Formative Period," Mr. Hansen describes the state of the country in that dark age, and shows how the influence of the diffusion of learning, of a consecrated martrydom and a reformatory effort within the Church led to development. The next period was "the Defensive Period," covering the time before and immediately after the great Synod of Dordrecht. Then "the Period of Danger," contained within the century bounded by the years 1620 and 1720, when two systems of philosophy permeated and threatened the destruction of the Church. Finally, "the Transitional Period," dealing with the time in which the conflict between the Church and State reached its culmination. Mr. Hansen has written an exceedingly interesting, as well as a most instructive book. It is published by the Board of Publication of the Reformed Church in America, 34 Vesey Street, New York.

A handsome volume of 780 pages, entitled "Still's UNDERGROUND RAILROAD RECORDS," published by William Still, 244 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia, is full of the narratives of hairbreadth escapes from slavery in the anti-bellum days. William Still, the author, was for many years connected with the anti-slavery office in Philadelphia, and had abundant opportunities of obtaining the facts connected with the traffic on the Underground Railroad. He appears to have made a full and complete record of each case as it occurred, and now publishes them with engravings, photographs, and extracts from the newspapers of the day.

From among hundreds of cases recorded in this work describing successful attempts to escape from slavery, we select one as a specimen of the whole. It is that of Henry Box Brown, who effected his ESCAPE IN A BOX shipped by Adams's Express Company from Richmond, Va., to Philadelphia. "Brown counted well the cost before venturing on his hazardous undertaking. Ordinary modes of travel, he concluded, might prove disastrous to his hopes; he therefore hit upon a new invention altogether, which was to have himself boxed up and forwarded to Philadelphia direct by express. The size of the box and how it was to be made to fit him most comfortably was of his own ordering. Two feet eight inches deep, two feet wide, and three feet long were the exact dimensions of the box, lined with baize. His resources with regard to food and water consisted of the following: One bladder of water and a few small biscuits. His mechanical implement to meet the death-struggle for fresh air, all told, was one large gimlet. Satisfied that it would be far better to peril his life for freedom in this way than to remain under the galling yoke of slavery, he entered his box, which was safely nailed up and hooped with five hickory hoops, and was then addressed by his next friend, James A. Smith, a shoe dealer, to William H. Johnson, Arch Street, Philadelphia, marked, 'This side up with care.' In this condition he was sent to Adams's Express office in a dray, and thence by overland express to Philadelphia. It was twenty-six hours from the time he left Richmond until his arrival in the City of Brotherly Love.

"The notice, 'This side up,' etc., did not avail with the different expressmen, who hesitated not to handle the box in the usual rough manner common to this class of men. For a while they actually had the box upside down, and had him on his head for miles. A few days before he was expected, certain intimation was conveyed to a member of the Vigilance Committee that a box might be expected by the three o'clock morning train from the South, which might contain a man. One of the most serious walks he ever took—and they had not been a few—to meet and accompany passengers, he took at half past two o'clock that morning to the depot. Not once, but for more than a score of times, he fancied the slave would be dead. He anxiously looked while the freight was being unloaded from the cars, to see if he could recognize a box that might contain a man; one alone had that appearance, and he confessed it really seemed as if there was the scent of death about it. But on inquiry, he soon learned that it was not the one he was looking after, and he was free to say he experienced a marked sense of relief. That same afternoon, however, he received from Richmond a telegram, which read thus, 'Your case of goods is shipped and will arrive to-morrow morning.'

"Next morning, according to arrangement, the box was at the Anti-Slavery office in due time. The witnesses present to behold the resurrection were: J. M. McKim, Professor C. D. Cleveland, Lewis Thompson, and the writer.

"All was quiet. The door had been safely locked. The proceedings commenced. Mr. McKim rapped quietly on the lid of the box and called out, 'All right!' Instantly came the answer from within, 'All right, sir!'

"The witnesses will never forget that moment. Saw and hatchet quickly had the five hickory hoops cut and the lid off, and the marvellous resurrection of Brown ensued. Rising up in his box, he reached out his hand, saying, 'How do you do, gentlemen?' The little assemblage hardly knew what to think or do at the moment. He was about as wet as if he had come up out of the Delaware. Very soon he remarked that, before leaving Richmond, he had selected for his arrival-hymn (if he lived) the Psalm beginning with these words: 'I waited patiently for the Lord, and He heard my prayer.' And most touchingly did he sing the Psalm, much to his own relief, as well as to the delight of his small audience.

"He was then christened Henry Box Brown, and soon afterward was sent to the hospitable residence of James Mott and E. M. Davis, on Ninth Street, where, it is needless to say, he met a most cordial reception from Mrs. Lucretia Mott and her household. Clothing and creature comforts were furnished in abundance, and delight and joy filled all hearts in that stronghold of philanthropy.

"After his visit at Mr. Mott's, he spent two days with the writer, and then took his departure for Boston, evidently feeling quite conscious of the wonderful feat he had performed, and at the same time it may be safely said that those who witnessed this strange resurrection were not only elated at his success, but were made to sympathize more deeply than ever before with the slave."

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Cleveland Scandal, which has Occupied so much space in the columns of the daily press during the past two weeks, appeared to us a matter so serious to the candidacy of Governor Cleveland, that an unequivocal denial of the charge might be expected. We therefore refrained from mentioning a matter which might prove nothing more than a campaign slander. Now, however, that the papers which are advocating Governor Cleveland's election are not denying the truth of the charges, but are representing them as venial, it is right to lay them before our readers, that they may judge for themselves. So far as we have been able to investigate them, the facts appear to be less culpable than as originally stated, but they still constitute a very grave indictment against a man who is a candidate for the high office of President of the United States. It appears that seven years ago, Mr. Cleveland, who is a bachelor, formed an acquaintance with a widow then employed in a dry-goods store in Buffalo. The acquaintance developed into an illicit connection. The woman became intemperate in her habits, and Mr. Cleveland, desiring to be rid of the connection, employed a solicitor, who caused the woman to be shut up in an asylum for the insane. A child had been born, and that was sent to an orphan asylum. The woman regained her liberty, and abducted the child. She was traced, and found to be suffering from delirium tremens. The child was restored to the orphanage and the woman sent to an inebriate asylum until she was cured. The child was ultimately adopted by a Buffalo family, and the woman received $500 from Mr. Cleveland, and gave a discharge in full of all demands. Charges of drunkenness and general profligacy have also been made against Governor Cleveland, but an explicit denial has been given to them by men of character, who may be supposed to know all the facts. The manner in which the press is dealing with these charges cannot be too deeply regretted. The tendency is to make light of them, to represent such practices as common, and to dwell upon the fact that the faults of the Democratic candidate would be less prejudicial to the national welfare than those of the Republican candidate. That mode of dealing with the subject is unsatisfactory. The people have their own estimate of the importance of the acts alleged. The candidate's cause would be better served by showing that the charges are false, or that Mr. Cleveland has repented, for reasons apart from his candidacy, and has reformed.

The Reduction in the Postal Revenue for the fiscal year just closed will not, it is thought, exceed two million dollars. This is a remarkable showing, in view of the fact that, during nine months of the year, the rate of domestic postage has been reduced one third. The surplus during the preceding year was about two and a half millions, so that if there had been no increase in expenses there would have been a small surplus in the very first year of the reduction. The expenses, however, have necessarily increased with the development of the country, and there was also an increase consequent on the reduction and the requirement of a new outfit of stamps. There will, therefore, be a deficiency, but it will be smaller than was predicted. The exact figures will be issued as soon as the accounts for the year have been made up.

General B. F. Butler has Announced his Intention of accepting the nominations for the Presidency tendered him by the Greenback party and the Labor party. He purposes delaying the issue of his formal reply until Governor Cleveland has responded to the Democratic Convention, so that wherein he "disagrees" with him, he "may do him no injustice." Before any nominations were made a general hope was expressed that the candidates would not be "nobodies." That hope has been gratified to an unusual degree. All the four candidates are prominent men, about whom both their friends and enemies entertain strong feelings.

An Active Prohibition Campaign has been commenced in Connecticut. The Hon. A. R. Heath, of Danbury, is conducting it, aided by local workers in the chief cities of the State. Mr. Heath said last week to a reporter: "We now have St. John and Daniel Clubs in Hartford, New Britain, Norwich, Colchester, New London, Willimantic, Danbury, and Fairfield, with one forming in Bridgeport. That is as far as I've got yet. I shall work right through to November. We shall have a fierce fight this fall, and will make a good battle for the cause. The national officers are informed, they tell me, that they have every reason to expect fifty thousand votes each in New York, Michigan, and Ohio. There will be tremendous gains in the South. Splendid work is being done, and will be done there, and an active canvass continued."

The Steamer Amsterdam, of the Netherlands and American Navigation Company, was wrecked on the east end of Sable Island, off the coast of Nova Scotia, on August 3d. The island has been the scene of many disastrous wrecks, but in this case happily only three lives were lost, although there were 224 passengers and a crew of 54 on board. The steamer sailed from Amsterdam for New York on July 19th. All went well until the day of the disaster, when a heavy fog lay right in the ship's course. The day before good observations had been taken, but afterward an unusually strong current carried the ship out of her course. The captain believed himself to be thirty-five miles below Sable Island, so did not reduce steam. About 10.15 P.M. the vessel ran upon the sandbank. There was but little shock, and it was thought that by lightening the ship she would float again uninjured. The passengers assisted the crew in throwing the cargo overboard, until noon of Aug. 4th, when it was found that the ship was leaking badly. The captain then ordered the boats lowered, and all the passengers and crew were taken in them. The sea was somewhat rough, but the boats succeeded in making land, which was thirteen miles from the wreck. One boat was capsized near the shore, and three persons were drowned. All the others were saved. It is remarkable that although rockets were sent up, and the officials on the island admit that they saw them, no aid was sent from the land to the ship. Complaints of inhospitality are also made by the passengers against the islanders.

The Earthquake Shock, which on Sunday passed through the States on the Atlantic seaboard, from Maryland to Vermont, and from the coast as far West as Ohio, was a new experience for citizens of this section. Visitors from California and Central America who were here on Sunday admit that the shock was a severe one, though, happily, no damage was done. The people, however, were naturally much alarmed, and one of the prisoners in jail at Hartford, Conn., died soon after the shock, his death being accelerated, if not caused, by the fright the earthquake gave him It was about seven minutes past two in the afternoon when the shock was felt in New York and the adjacent cities. A low rumbling noise was heard like distant thunder, accompanied by a vibratory motion, such as is felt in a frail house when heavily-laden wagons are driven rapidly past the walls. The floors and walls of the houses could be distinctly seen to quiver, especially in those solidly built of brick or stone with little timber in their construction. Pendant articles, such as chandeliers, shook and trembled, and articles placed against the walls fell forward to the floor. It was a strange sensation for those who had never felt an earthquake shock before, and a sudden feeling of panic and a sense of vague, incomprehensible danger stirred nearly every one, causing a general rush into the streets. The direction of the wave was from north-east to south-west. In thirty seconds it was all over, but it seemed minutes to those alarmed. The shock was not felt upon the rivers, but the boats moored to the piers on both sides were violently shaken from stem to stern. A large stone forming part of the steeple of the church at Seventh Avenue and St. John's Place, Brooklyn, fell to the ground with a crash, terrifying the pedestrians who were promenading the streets in the neighborhood. The Egyptian obelisk in Central Park trembled from apex to pedestal, but was not injured. A few grains of sandstone fell upon the pedestal from the crack just above the claws, but the fissure did not widen. On the span of the Brooklyn Bridge the shock was not felt at all, nor was it felt even at the towers. The clearest idea obtainable of the shock may be gained from the following summary which the Sun makes of the various reports it received: "There were almost as many different notions about the cause of the roar and shock as there are different occupations. For instance, the men at Police Headquarters, with an eye to business, thought burglars had blown open the safe in the Treasurer's office up-stairs; employés in the newspaper offices thought the presses had suddenly been set going on a jump; in crowded tenement houses a cry of fire was raised; the occupants of the municipal building in Brooklyn, where a severe gas explosion had occurred, thought it was another explosion; residents in the neighborhood of big factories thought a boiler had burst; the Greenpoint police were sure that another oil tank had been blown up; the toll collector at the entrance to the big bridge supposed a car had run off the track in the depot over his head; workmen reconstructing a burned bridge in New Jersey thought the timbers were falling; the employés of the elevated railroads, being accustomed to the continuous shaking of those structures, thought nothing about it, and the Italian residents of the city, who have had much experience of earthquakes in their own country, obeyed an irresistible impulse to run into the centre of the streets and wait for the buildings to fall. They appear to have been the only people who recognized the fact that it was an earthquake."

The Fund for Supplying Colored Ministers with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has received several additions since our recent announcement, which have been acknowledged by mail. One of the colored ministers in North Carolina writes: "I wish the brother who gave you the money to supply the paper could just know how much good it has done me in my work. He would thank God that he so spent his money. I hope God will bless him. We have often prayed during the year that God would reward him for his kindness. The paper has been a blessing to me and to my congregation." Many minsters whose terms are near expiration are earnestly hoping that in some way THE CHRISTIAN HERALD may visit them another year.

Prayer at the Opening of a Savings Bank in Newark, N. J., last week, has given occasion to much ridicule in the columns of the daily press. The new bank is called the Security Savings Bank, and is established as a successor to the defunct savings institution. The president, at the opening of the bank, called the managers together and addressed them on the responsibilities of their position. He then suggested that, as the basis of the new enterprise was one of trust, they should all pray to be delivered from temptation. A Baptist minister present thereupon rose and prayed earnestly for the honest administration of the bank. Christian men will see nothing to ridicule in this proceeding. Recent events have shown how powerful in the present day are the temptations to breach of trust which assail those who have charge of money belonging to other people. How appropriate then for those exposed, to ask God's help in the ordeal before them (Prov. 3 : 5).

Union Missionary Conference. An Unde-nominational Missionary Conference will be held on the ground of the Niagara Falls International Camp-Meeting Association, August 18–23. Returned missionaries representing various evangelical churches will be present and participate in the services. It is expected to be an interesting occasion. Good accommodations can be had at moderate charges. Following the Missionary Conference will be an International Camp-Meeting, August 25–30, and a Temperance Convention, September 1–6.

The Corner-Stone of the Pedestal for the Bartholdi Statue of Liberty Enlightening the World was laid on Tuesday, August 5th. The little island in New York Bay, where the statue will stand, was full of spectators of the interesting ceremony. The Consul-General of France made a cordial speech on the occasion. In the niche under the corner-stone were placed various articles of interest; among them copy of the Constitution of the United States; copy of the Declaration of Independence; copy of the Farewell Address of General Washington; a bronze medal struck in honor of General Washington when Commander-in-Chief of the armies of the United States, Boston, 1776; nineteen bronze medals representing the Presidents of the United States succeeding Washington; proofs of United States coins of 1884; copies of the daily papers of New York; American Almanac for 1884; and list on parchment of the Grand Lodge of Masons of the State of New York.

Troops have been Sent to Clear the Settlers from Indian Territory. Complaints have been made for some time past that white men have been intruding into the parts of the Indian country known as the Oklahoma land, the Cherokee strip and the Pan Handle. Several companies of troops entered the Territory on August 7th, and all persons found there, estimated at about 2000, were removed. The men were turned over to the United States Marshal in whose district they were found. The women and children were taken to Kansas and Arkansas and allowed to go. All improvements were destroyed—the houses, outbuildings, and fences razed to the ground. The cattle, horses, and farming implements are to be turned over to the Interior Department and to be disposed of as that Department may decide. It is asserted that some of the settlers are bona fide. The authorities assert differently, and say that no one is entitled to settle in either of the three disputed tracts of land. Some men are reported to have lived in the Oklahoma land and the Pan Handle for several years, and to have made extensive improvements. The order to remove applies to them as well as to those who have recently entered the Territory. The Indians will be thankful that Mr. Hayes and Carl Schurz are no longer in power.

Ex-Speaker Keifer has again Failed to Ob-tain a vindication. This time it is his district which has refused him. The result of the primaries held on August 2d was a complete defeat for the ex-Speaker; he did not carry a single ward. Much interest was taken, the entire number of stay-at-homes being less than 200. At the convention on August 7th John Little, of Greene County, was nominated in his place. General Keifer made a speech, in which he accounted for his defeat by saying that "the mass of the people in the district opposed his course." There is not much surprise at this result in the country; the only wonder is that the district bore with him so long. It is reported that he intends taking the stump for Mr. Blaine, but the Republican managers will act wisely in declining his offer. He might do Mr. Blaine's interests more harm than good. Honest people would be apt to inquire why Keifer was anxious for Mr. Blaine to be elected. Keifer will have one more session in Congress, and then will join his friend Robeson in retirement, from which it may be hoped that neither of them will ever emerge. The country will never forget them. If it could, it would be better for them and for the citizens who sent them to Congress and for the Republican party.

The Bodies of the Dead Members of the Greely expedition were brought to Governor's Island, New York, on Friday last. The scene was a most impressive one as the iron coffins were removed from the ships of the relief expedition and taken to the island. Eleven artillery caissons, each drawn by four horses, stood waiting to receive them. Each coffin, covered with the American flag, was then removed from the tug and placed on a caisson by a detachment of six soldiers in charge of a corporal. As the remains of the heroic dead were borne by them Secretary Lincoln, General Sheridan, General Hancock, and General Hazen remained with uncovered heads, and the troops presented arms. Even the throng of spectators were awed into silence by the impressiveness of the scene. All this while minute-guns were sounding from Castle William. The bodies in the coffins were those of Lieutenant James B. Lockwood, Lieutenant Frederick F. Kislingbury, Sergeants Edward Israel, David C. Ralston, David Lynn, and William Cross, Corporal Joseph Ellison, and Privates Whistler, Schneider, Henry, and Ellis. They were carried with appropriate ceremonies to the chamber prepared for them in the hospital. The saddest thought about the ceremony was that the brave men were dead through official blundering.

Bad Boys are Wanted by a Well-Known Sunday-school superintendent. Mr. John Wanamaker, who has so long presided over the famous Bethany Sunday-school in Philadelphia, which now has more than 2200 names upon its roll, stated in an address before the New Jersey Association at the Central Congregational Church, Philadelphia, that during the whole twenty-five years of his superintendency of that school no scholar had ever been expelled. He says the bad boys are the ones they most want, because such most need the restraining influences of a Sunday-school. Neither bad boys nor bad men are in demand in other walks of life, but it is the glory of the Saviour and His followers that such are specially invited to Him (Matt. 9 : 13).

HELPS TO FULL ASSURANCE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God."—1 JOHN 5 : 13.

John's Writing Simple and Practical—The Design of his Epistle—I. To Whom it was Written—To all Those who Believe—Believers who do not Know—Theoretical and Practical—II. Its Purpose and End—To Give Assurance—A Mixed-up State—The Knowledge Attainable and Desirable—III. How it Conduces to the End—The Tests Supplied—Truthfulness in Confession—Darkness of Those who Profess Perfection—Test of Obedience—Separation from the World—Purification—Answered Prayers—Familiarity with God—IV. The Appendix—No Confidence in Confidence—Only One Ground of Faith.

How very simple this all is! John had an eagle's wing with which to soar aloft, and an eagle's eye with which to penetrate into great mysteries; and yet of all the writers of the Old or New Testament he is one of the simplest. He never endeavors to show you the greatness of his mind or the grandeur of his rhetoric; on the contrary, he speaks as a child to those who are children in the school of love. I would that all of us who try to teach others would remember this, and sink ourselves in our lesson.

It is equally notable how practical John is. When he writes he always has a worthy intent in every line; "These are written," saith he, and he explains the design with which he penned the record. These epistles are not written to dazzle you, nor to lead you into speculation, nor to gratify your curiosity; but these are written "that ye may know that ye have eternal life."

THE PRACTICAL OBJECT

may seem to the high-soaring votaries of modern thought to be commonplace; but John had a deep veneration for matters which moderns despise. When he tells us his design, it is that he may help to accomplish his purpose; for by informing men of understanding what he is writing for, he stirs them up to see his purpose and to fall in with it. "These things have I written unto you that believe on the name of the Son of God; that ye may know that ye have eternal life, and that ye may believe on the name of the Son of God." Dear friends, if this be the design of the inspired apostle, let us not be slow to co-operate with him; but let us pray this morning for the full assurance of faith, that we may know of a surety that eternal life is pulsing in our hearts. May you who have not believed in Jesus feel a fervent desire within your spirits to take that preliminary step, and become believers in the Son of God.

I. First, then, briefly, to whom was this written? It is important to observe of a letter; for I may be reading a communication meant for somebody else, and if it should contain good tidings, I may be deceiving myself by appropriating the news. This epistle, and this particular text in it, were written for all those who believe on the name of the Son of God. In part of the epistle he says, "I write unto you, little children;" then he says, "I write unto you, young men;" further on he says, "I have written unto you, fathers;" but now he writes to babes, to young men, and to fathers under the one comprehensive description of those who have believed on the name of the Son of God. Our discourse is, therefore, for all of you who are believers in Christ. No person, young or old, is excluded from this text, unless he is an unbeliever.

To unbelievers this text is not written; it is for all who trust in Jesus; but it is for none beside. If you inquire why it is not addressed to unbelievers, I answer, simply because it would be preposterous to wish men to be assured of that which is not true. "He that believeth not shall not see life;" how, then, could he have an assurance of possessing it? Faith is a necessary preliminary to assurance; you must have the blade of faith before you can have the ripe corn of assurance. I speak, therefore, to all of you who have come to Christ, however imperfect and undeveloped your spiritual life may as yet be; but I invite none beside to the banquet of joyous confidence.

We may gather from this address being made to all the people of God and to none beside, that there are some believers in the world, and true that they have eternal life. A very large number of true believers do not know this cheering fact. For instance, certain Christians believe that even if they are now saved they may yet be lost; that even if they have the life of God in them, that life may die out. Beloved, I pray for you that you may know that you have eternal life, and not a temporary life. The life which the Holy Spirit imparts to the believer is not a thing of days, and weeks, and months, and years; its dwelling-place is in the region of eternity. How much comfort God's dear children lose by not apprehending the absolute immortality of the new life I will not venture to say; but this much I will declare—that to me it is the very crown and glory of the Gospel, that if I receive Jesus into my soul, and the Holy Spirit imparts to me the new life, I have received an everlasting blessing. Has not Jesus said, "I give unto my sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of my hand?"

Again, a large number of Christ's people who may be perfectly sound in the doctrinal view of the nature of this life do not know that they possess it at this present moment if they are believers. I find even the commentators, when they try to write upon this text, and most of the preachers who have left us printed sermons upon it, read the text as if it said, "that ye may know that ye shall have eternal life." They speak about the full assurance that we shall one day enter into glory. I beg their pardon, the text does not say anything of the kind; it is, "that ye may know that ye have eternal life," even here, at this present hour. The spiritual life which is in the believer at this moment is the same life which shall be in him in heaven. The in the bud; the same life, only less developed. We shall not in the article of death receive another life than that which we have while we are sojourning here below. Death sets a seal on that which is, but it produces nothing. There is to be a very palpable change wrought upon the body; but as to the spirit, the life of God which is in it now is the life which will dwell in it throughout eternity. Our believing life is eternal life.

Yet again, there are some Christians who believe all this, and are perfectly right in theory, but yet they each one cry, "I want to know that I have eternal life. I want a fuller assurance of salvation than I have already obtained." That is also our desire for you; for if you know you have believed in Jesus you certainly are quickened with eternal life, and ought to know it. But it is only to you that have believed that the text speaks. If you have not believed in the glorious name of the Well-beloved, then come at once and put your trust in Him. This is the Gospel to every unbeliever: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved."

II. So, secondly, I have now to mention to what end John has written. When he says, "that ye may know that ye have eternal life," I think his first meaning is that you may know that everybody who believes in Jesus Christ has eternal life. This is not a fact about you and a few others only, but it is —every man that believes on the name of the Son of God has eternal life. We may not doubt this; it is not a matter of inference and deduction, but a matter of revelation from God. You are not to form an opinion upon it, but to believe it, for the Lord hath said it. I beseech you, never question the statement. Settle it in your mind; for if you have any doubt about it you have undermined the Gospel, and rejected the witness of the Lord, and denied the Holy Ghost. You will not behave thus wickedly; therefore glorify God by believing His testimony.

A GENERAL TRUTH

I think that John in this passage meant, and we will consider him as meaning, something more—namely, he would have us know that we personally have eternal life by having us know that we do personally believe in Jesus. It is one thing to know that every believer has eternal life; but it is quite another thing to know that I am a believer so as to have eternal life myself. I have read of one who fell into the water, and as he was sinking he saw a rainbow in the sky above him. "Ah," thought he, "God has made a covenant not to destroy the earth with a flood, and yet it is no comfort to me, for I fear I shall be drowned." The largest provisions of grace avail us nothing unless we have a personal interest in them. It is true that every believer has eternal life, but what if I am not a believer?

It is a very singular thing that people should not know whether they believe in Jesus or not, for it is an ascertainable piece of knowledge. I know whether I think; I know whether I resolve; I know whether I doubt; I ought, therefore, to know whether I believe. But you see human nature received a terrible twist at the Fall, and it has fallen into so that the eyes of the understanding are all asquint, and the air around is very dank. Perhaps you ask me to speak for myself, and I assure you that I do so; but at the same time I do not hesitate to say the same of you. You, my clever friend, who are so wonderfully clear-headed, I should not wonder but what you are the foggiest and blindest of the whole company. The worst darkness is that which so blinds a man that he thinks he can see better than other people. We are all by nature in such that we need not wonder at any strange statement or feeling. When you hear brethren assert that a person who is not assured that he believes must necessarily be an unbeliever, you may say to yourself, "That friend does not know everything." There is no estimating the possible inconsistency and contradiction of the human mind. I have been in a state of mind in which I have questioned the possibility of their being a grain of grace in me, and yet I have clung to Jesus with a death grip. At such times my mind has worked morbidly, and its way has been turned upside down. Bunyan speaks of being "much tumbled up and down in his thoughts;" and that nearly hits my mental condition. It is very possible for a man to be a very strong believer and yet to question whether he has a spark of faith.

I am personally taught to be tender of poor doubters, for I have often been one myself. I would sometimes give all that I have to be able to feel myself to be even the least in the Lord's family. Just now I enjoy a full assurance, but I am and therefore I have bowels for others because I am myself compassed with infirmity.

So far is human nature out of joint that it is necessary for me to say what it seems superfluous to say—that full assurance of our possessing eternal life is possible. The Church of Rome teaches that no man can be assured that he has eternal life, except some few to whom supernatural revelations may be given. That sort of doctrine lingers in the air of Protestantism; many people think the same, though they do not say so. Impossible to know that you are quickened! It ought to be impossible to have any doubt about it. Rationally, a living man should know that he is alive. No man should give sleep to his eyes or slumber to his eyelids while he has a doubt about his eternal state. It is possible, and if it is possible it is very desirable; for when a man knows that he has eternal life, what a comfort it is to him! And I go a little further: it is our duty to obtain full assurance. We should not have been commanded to give diligence to make our calling and election sure if it were not

RIGHT FOR US TO BE SURE.

I am sure it is right for a child of God to know that God is his Father, and never to have a question in his heart as to his sonship.

I sorrowfully remind certain of you that, as you have not believed, you have neither part nor lot in this matter, and the beloved disciple speaks not to you.

III. Thirdly, I come to where I would lay the stress of the discourse this morning—what has John said in this epistle which conduces to our full assurance? How does he help us to know that we are believers, and consequently to know that we have eternal life? I cannot attempt a full résumé of this most blessed epistle; but I shall select a few items from very many. An exposition of this epistle, written to show how it enables men to know that they have eternal life, would be a very valuable thing; and I feel confident that without the slightest forcing of a single sentence it could be shown that the whole letter bears upon assurance.

The matter which may be argued about is this: "Do I believe in Jesus? Am I a believer in such a sense that I have eternal life?" Let us look at the epistle for help in this inquiry.

You will find, first, that John mentions as an evidence truthful dealing with God, in faith and confession of sin. Naturally men walk in darkness or falsehood toward God; but when we have believed in Jesus we come to walk in the light of truth. Read in the first chapter of the epistle from verse 6 to 9. "If we say that we have fellowship with Him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth; but if we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin. If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us. If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." The believer does not attempt to deal with God as if he had no sin; for that were to make Christ useless, seeing there would be no need of His blood to cleanse. He does not say that he now lives without sin; for that were to make his cleansing a thing of the past, whereas the Spirit teacheth that it is a present matter, concerning our present walk with God. To is to walk in the dark; for the claim is a false one. The man who walks in the light comes before God as a sinner, whom the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth from all sin. So, then, you may take this as an evidence that you are a saved man, if you deal truthfully with God; if you confess your guilt before God, if your only hope of being cleansed from it lies in the blood of Jesus Christ, then you have come to act toward God on the line of truth, and He accepts you.

Next, John gives us obedience as a test of the child of God. Look to the second chapter, and begin to read at the third verse: "And hereby we do know that we know Him, if we keep His commandments. He that saith, I know Him, and keepeth not His commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him. But whoso keepeth His word, in him verily is the love of God perfected; hereby know we that we are in Him. He that saith He abideth in him ought himself also so to walk, even as He walked." Come, then, beloved brethren, do you obey the will of the Lord from your heart? Do you press forward after perfect holiness? Then His servant you are whom you obey. Rest assured beyond all question that you are one of Christ's sheep, for He says, "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me." "He that doeth righteousness is righteous." If grace has made you obedient it has given you eternal life.

Follow me as I call attention, next, to the evidence of love in the heart. In the second chapter read at the ninth verse: "He that saith he is in the light, and hateth his brother, is in darkness even until now. He that loveth his brother abideth in the light, and there is none occasion of stumbling in him." Then go on to the fourteenth verse of the third chapter. "We know that we have passed from death unto life, because we love the brethren. He that loveth not his brother abideth in death." This will greatly help you to decide your case.

DO YOU HATE ANYBODY?

Are you seeking revenge? Are you unforgiving? Then you are not dwelling in the light; you are of Cain and not of Christ. Do you feel that you love your enemies, and that, in fact, you are no man's enemy, because love is the principle of your life? Be of good courage and enter into full assurance, oh ye whose bosoms glow with the sacred flame of fervent love to God and men.

Next to that comes separation from the world. Read in the second chapter at the fifteenth verse: "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him." This is backed up by the first verse of the third chapter: "Therefore the world knoweth us not, because it knew Him not." Have you met with opposition from the ungodly? God has put an enmity between the two; do not therefore be surprised at it. Did not our Lord say, "If the world hate you, ye know that it hated me before it hated you. If ye were of the world, the world would love his own; but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you"? Thus slander, abuse, and other forms of persecution may turn to your comfort by showing that you are of that sect which is everywhere spoken against.

The next evidence you will find in the third chapter, the third verse, namely, purification. "Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." Do you every day endeavor to keep clear of sin; and, when you have sinned, do you at night go with bitter repentance to God, and beg to be delivered from it? Are you fighting against your besetting sins? Do you contend against the customs of the world? Have you come to be a warrior against evil? Let that be an evidence that there is in you a new spirit which was not there by nature, and let that prove to you that you are quickened into newness of life.

Furthermore, we find an evidence in answers to prayer: "And whatsoever we ask, we receive of Him, because we keep His commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in His sight."

DOES GOD HEAR YOUR PRAYERS?

Then you are pleasing in His sight. Are you in the habit of speaking with Him, and does He reply to you? then you are agreed with God. Does He grant you the desire of your heart? Is it not because you delight in Him? He heareth not those who wilfully live in sin; but if any man doeth His will him He heareth. You may look upon every answered prayer as another token of the love of God toward you in Christ Jesus your Lord.

Adherence to the truth is another help to full assurance. Read the whole fourth chapter: "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God; because many false prophets are gone out into the world." In the sixth verse he says, "We are of God; he that knoweth God heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us." I read in a certain learned divine the other day a declaration that the evangelical doctrine which we preach is not Christianity, but Paulinism. By that utterance this divine condemned himself. John saith, "We are of God; he that knoweth God heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error." He who hears not the apostles hears not their Master. He who dares say that Paul has not given us the Gospel is not of Christ; for Jesus saith, "He that receiveth you receiveth me, and he that receiveth me receiveth Him that sent me." Against the detestable spirit of this age, and against everything else that would corrupt the Gospel of Christ, it is the mark of the true seed to stand opposed. If you bear witness to the truth, the truth bears witness to you. Blessed are those who are not removed from the hope of their calling.

One of the best evidences of true faith, and one of the best helps to full assurance, is a holy familiarity with God. Oh, beloved brother, if you have come to speak with God as a man speaketh with a man, if you dwell in Him, if every day you say more to God than you do to men, and if you find more joy in fellowship with God than you do in all the world beside, then you are one of His. When you have no longer that slavish fear which makes you stand back, but that child-like confidence which draws you nearer and yet nearer unto God, then are you His child.

IV. I would now finish, only I dare not leave out the last point—to John's design. The apostle puts it, "That ye may believe on the name of the Son of God." I think he means this—you are never to get into such a state that you say, "I have eternal life, and therefore I need not trust simply in the blood and righteousness of Jesus Christ. Years ago I was born again, and so I can now live without the daily exercise of faith." "No," says the apostle, "I am writing this to believers, and I tell them that while they may have full assurance, it cannot be a substitute for habitual faith in the Lord Jesus." Personally, I wish to say, it is some thirty-four years since I first believed in the Christ Jesus, and then I came to Him as having nothing in myself, and I took Him to be my all. At this moment I possess a comfortable and clear assurance that I have eternal life; but my ground of confidence to-day is exactly what it was when first I came to Christ. I have no confidence in my confidence, I place no reliance upon my own assurance. My assurance lies in the fact that "Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners," and that "Whosoever believeth in Him hath everlasting life;" I do believe in Him, and therefore I know I have eternal life. Brethren, do not stir beyond that. Keep to your first faith. However far you go in other directions, stand fast in your undivided faith in Jesus.

If you think it wise to examine these signs and evidences which I have given you, do so; but if you think to get food out of them you will find a bare cupboard. If you think you can live without Christ, on what you have known in the past, you are greatly mistaken. It is like trying to live on stale manna. None of you would have done that in the wilderness; you would soon have turned up your noses at it. When it was more than a day old it "bred worms and stank." Everything you look to apart from Christ will rot in due time, so that you will loathe it. Beloved, every vessel, whether it be a great flagon or a little cup, must hang upon the one nail which is fastened in a sure place. If you get from Jesus, you wander into a land of darkness.

Whether I be a child of God or not is a question I will not discuss to-day. I am a sinner, and Jesus Christ came to save sinners, and they that trust in Him are saved. Therefore I trust Him! Therefore I am saved! The Word of God declares it. Blessed be His name forever and ever. Amen.

MISSIONARY EXPERIENCES IN SOUTH AFRICA.

Dr. Vanderkemp, a devoted Dutch missionary, who spent his life in labor for Christ among the Boers in South Africa, died suddenly, leaving his work unfinished. The Christian who is in the habit of regarding every event as under the watchful care of his Almighty Father knew that this sudden loss to the Church was permitted for some wise end; but to ordinary observers it appeared nothing less than a calamity. Dr. Vanderkemp had labored many years without seeing any fruit of his labors; but just as he was passing away there had appeared signs of interest in his message on the part of some for whom he had prayed and to whom he had earnestly preached. It seemed, when the news of his death was carried to his home, that the impressions he had so longed to see would be dissipated now that he was dead, and the men who were asking their way to Christ would cease to ask when the voice which had been used of God to arouse them was still in death. But it was not so. God had an instrument ready to take up the work laid down by this dead servant.

John Campbell, a young Scotchman, was sent by God, after special preparation, to labor in the sphere suddenly left vacant. His youth had been a wicked and profligate one; but, as often happens, his conversion had stirred up within him an earnest desire to atone for his past sins by the consecration of himself and all his future life to the Lord's service. He labored with much success in his own country, and eventually entered the ministry there; but his heart was set on mission work among the heathen. When the news of Dr. Vanderkemp's death arrived, he volunteered to go to his field of labor, and was accepted. He went to South Africa, and there took up the work which Dr. Vanderkemp had so devotedly prosecuted. The two pictures on the next page depict incidents in a journey he made to Cape Town after several years of work among the Boers and their slaves.

On his way he visited the stations of the society, and preached constantly "the glorious Gospel of the blessed God." At Stellenbosch, one of the stations, he found a venerable servant of God, Mr. Bakker, who labored especially for the instruction and salvation of the miserable slaves of the locality. He attended a slave-meeting on the Sabbath, which he found truly interesting (see illustration). "About one hundred and eighty were present. Mr. Campbell's companion, Mr. Kicherer, addressed them. Every one seemed to hang upon his lips. One was singularly earnest in listening, which attracted Mr. Kicherer's attention so much as to induce him, in the middle of his discourse, to ask him several questions about Jesus, which he answered with a happy smile on his sable face. I shall never forget his answer, when asked if he loved the Lord Jesus. 'Oh yes, massa; dearly love Jesus Christ, massa!'

"I afterward inquired," says Mr. Campbell, "respecting this slave, and was informed he had long been an excellent Christian. Formerly his master would not permit him to attend the preaching of Mr. Bakker, and one day threatened to give him a severe flogging if he did so. The poor fellow, with Christian gentleness, said in reply, 'I must tell the Lord that,' and silently left the room. This simple saying so wrought upon his master's mind that he permitted not only him to go, but likewise all the slaves in the house."

At Lattakoo Mr. Campbell preached to the natives, having obtained permission from Mahootoo, the Queen of the country. He held several services, and as he was about to depart he was informed that the Queen desired him to wait upon her. The customs of the sable courts would have been outraged by his failing not only to go, but to present the dusky Majesty with some token of his homage. This was a difficulty which was happily solved by the discovery, among the baggage of the party, of a large wax doll dressed in European fashion, which was devoted as a sacrifice to the customs of the court. Mr. Campbell duly appeared before the Queen, bearing the doll (see illustration). He made his obeisance, and presented the toy, which," says Mr. Campbell, "excited in the Queen and the ladies of her court considerable astonishment; she held it up before her, earnestly looking to it for several minutes without one remark. Her married daughter touched it very gently, now and then laughing most immoderately."

A Slave Service among the Boers.

WHAT A CHINESE BOY DID.

A BOY was admitted into a missionary school in China, his mother being dead. He remained several years, and not only learned the truth, but received it into his heart. When only fourteen years of age he went to his friends during what we call the Christmas holidays. One afternoon he went into a village temple. As he looked at the idols an old man (sixty-five years of age) came in with tottering steps, and laying a few incense sticks before an idol, knelt down and began to pray. Then he passed to the next idol, and so on the whole round of them.

The little boy thought to himself, "Here's an old man who has not long to live, and he does not know the way to Heaven. But I'm only a boy. I can't tell him."

"What is to be done? he has no one to teach him," thought the boy, as he saw him pass from idol to idol, and, as he thought, the tears run down his cheeks. These tears were eloquent, as the boy felt forced to go to the aged man and say—

"Would you mind a boy speaking to you? I am young; you are very old."

"What are you crying for?" said the old man. "Can I help you?"

"Sir, I am crying because I am so sorry for you."

"Sorry for me! What about?"

"Because you are aged and cannot live long, and you don't know the way to Heaven."

"What! Do you know the way to Heaven?"

"I know that Jesus has saved me, and He will save you."

"Who is Jesus?" asked the old man.

The boy told him the story of God's love, and the man's heart melted as he listened.

"Boy," he said, "I am over sixty years of age, and I never heard such words. Have you had dinner?"

"No, sir, not yet."

"Come home with me, then, and you shall tell the old lady the story you have told me."

The boy went home with the old man and told the story of the love of God, while the aged couple listened with great interest. He was invited again and again, and stayed in their house nearly the whole of his holiday; and the result was that, through this youthful servant of Christ, they were both led to the Saviour before they ever saw or heard of a missionary.

Four years after, Mr. J. Hudson Taylor, who recently related this story, accompanied the youth to the home of this aged couple, and found them truly devoted Christians, and, naturally, warmly attached to the lad. Said the old man,

"But for this boy, my wife and I would have died in darkness."

MAMIE'S FATHER.

IT was raining heavily. The clouds hung low from the zenith to the horizon, and the downfall was as steady and persistent as though the business had been long neglected and a heavy arrear of work must be done up. Pedestrians hurried along under umbrellas when they were obliged to turn out, and every one who could find an excuse for staying under cover did so.

The Rev. Ernest Randall, D.D., looked at the scene from the window of his study, and, shrugging his shoulders, settled down for a day's hard reading. He was a man of about forty, with delicate, sharp-cut features, prematurely bald, and having the quick, penetrating look of the eye and pallor of cheek which denote the earnest scholar. In his college days he had been first of his year; but having settled down to the pastorate of a large church, his opportunities for study had been curtailed. He desired to make his church the centre of a wide circle of Christian usefulness, and none knew better than he that success in such an object could only come from close personal application.

Scarcely had the clergyman seated himself, when a knock was heard on the door, and a little flaxen head was put timidly inside. "Papa, dear," said a child's voice, "there's a man in the hall wants to see you so badly, and Mary won't let him come in because he's dirty and his boots are muddy."

The information was not welcome, but the clergyman's conscience would not allow him to ignore it. "Tell Mary to let him in, my dear," he said, kindly. A minute later a middle-aged workman, with a shock head of hair and fierce-looking mustache, came in, muddy boots, dripping umbrella, and all. Dr. Randall turned his chair round, and gazed inquiringly at his visitor.

"Your servant did not want to let me in, doctor," he said, "but I promised my wife I would see you, so here I am. I'd have waited on your stoop all day and all night before I'd have gone back without keeping my promise. You don't know me. I don't belong to your church, nor for the matter of that, to any church. I'm a workingman when I am allowed to work, but I tell you honestly I don't believe in your profession."

"Why do you come to me, then?" Dr. Randall asked. "Can I do anything for you? If I can, I will, even though you don't believe in my doctrines."

"That is very kind of you, sir. Many men would refuse under the circumstances. That is why I told you; I never sail under false colors. The fact is, I have a little girl at home, very ill. The doctor tells us she will die." The man's voice, which was a harsh and grating one, softened here and was a little broken, as if there was a lump in his throat. "She wants to see you, doctor. I never expected to be in a clergyman's house or to have a clergyman in mine, but I'd do anything to please Mamie now; so if you'll come I'll thank you and make you welcome. That's the address," handing a slip of paper.

"Certainly I will come," said Dr. Randall; "but will you not wait for me? I will go with you. I suppose your opposition need not prevent our walking together?"

"If you ain't ashamed of walking with a man like me in his working clothes, I am not likely to object. I'm only too glad to have you come."

In a few minutes the clergyman and the workingman were plodding side by side through the streets to the quarter where the sick child lay.

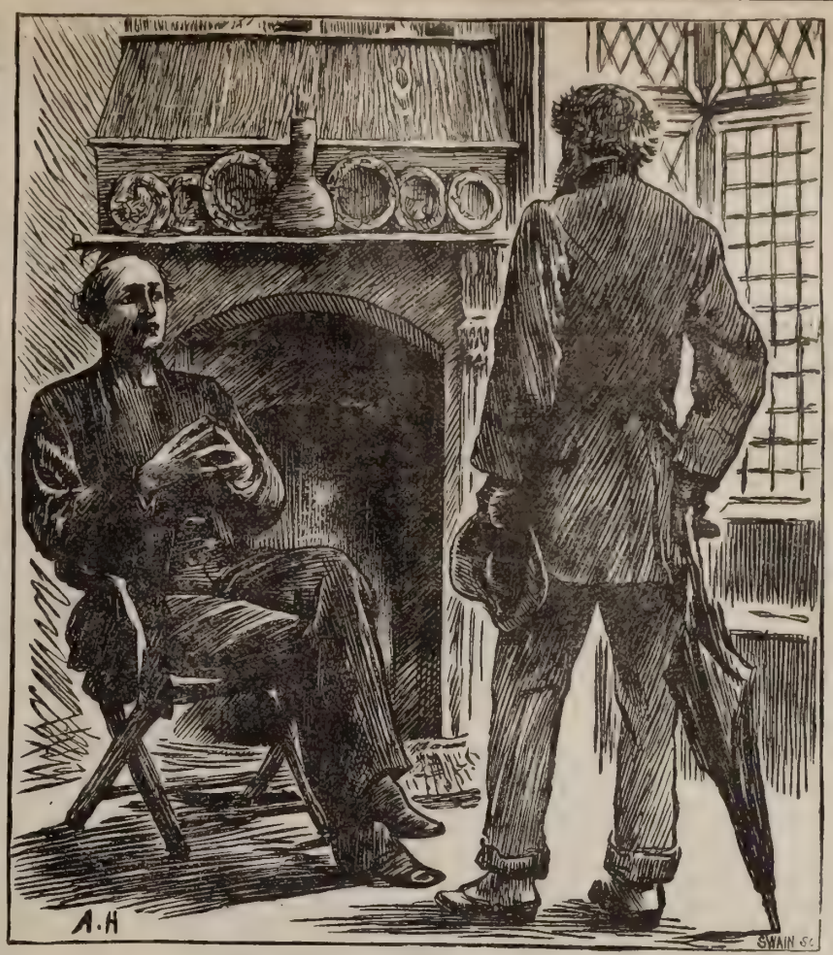
The man opened his door softly and ushered his companion into a poorly furnished room, while he went himself to his daughter's bedroom. He returned at once, and beckoned the clergyman to follow him. A child of twelve years old, with a cluster of golden curls about her face, lay on a bed, while at her head a woman sat weeping.

"I am going to die, sir," said the child, "and I asked father to go for you, because I want you to do something for me. I am in your Sunday-school, and I've heard you preach often when father did not know. I want you to make father a Christian."

"Are you a Christian yourself, my dear?" said the clergyman, laying his hand gently on the throbbing brow.

"I am not sure, sir, but I love Jesus very much. He was so good and so kind, and He died for us, and I expect He will keep His promise to take care of me when I am dead. I do not know much, but I love Him because He loved me. Please tell father that Jesus loves him too."

There was something so pathetic in the child's earnestness in the matter, in her forgetfulness of self in her anxiety about her father, that Dr. Randall felt his eyes grow moist, and he could scarcely trust himself to speak. He turned round to the father, who was standing behind him, and laying his hand on his shoulder drew him to the bedside. He rightly thought there could be no more potent voice than that of the dying child.



Mamie's Father Visits Dr. Randall.

"Father," she said, "promise me you will listen to this gentleman; he can tell you all about Jesus. You don't like church and church people, but you would love Jesus if you knew all about Him. I should die happy if you promised. You do not know that Jesus loves you, but He does. Does he not?" she asked, turning to Dr. Randall.

"He will never learn how deeply," said the clergyman. "Jesus loves him as no other can love."

"Father, dear father," said the child, "do learn about Him. I am going to leave you, but Jesus will bring you to me when you die."

The man flung himself on his knees sobbing. The clergyman, still with his hand on his shoulder, knelt beside him and prayed that his eyes might be opened and that Jesus would reveal Himself. The prayer was answered. Argument would have failed, but the knowledge of Jesus, the loving, tender Saviour, broke a heart that would have resisted all other force. Mamie did not die; she lived to see her father a devoted, humble disciple of her Saviour.

A CELEBRATION AT MR. SPURGEON'S ORPHANAGES.

An interesting meeting was held in the large quadrangle of the orphanages on July 16th. The proceedings began with the opening of a handsome block of buildings intended to serve as the headquarters of the Orphanage staff. The brief ceremony was conducted by Mr. Spurgeon, the most interesting feature connected therewith being the unveiling of a window, erected by the family of the late Mr. Higgs, one of the Tabernacle deacons, as a memorial of their father. The window represents the visit of Mr Spurgeon and Mr. Higgs to Mrs. Hillyard to receive from that lady's hands the £25,000 which she gave to found the Orphanage. Next came a "welcome home" to Mr. Thomas Spurgeon. In returning thanks, Mr. Thomas Spurgeon, who appeared to be in very feeble health, said he had journeyed from New Zealand to see his parents and obtain rest.

The principal gathering which took place during the evening was presided over by Earl Cairns. The open-air platform was again brought into use, and accommodated a goodly muster of friends, Mr. and Mrs. Spurgeon and their two sons forming the centre of the group. After leading in prayer, Mr. Spurgeon briefly introduced the chairman. He had long felt a desire, he said, to meet Earl Cairns in the flesh; for though he stood at the extremest possible distance from him politically, they were quite at one when it came to be a question of caring for the fatherless. Earl Cairns, in his opening remarks, said he had long wished to see Mr. Spurgeon's Orphanage, and he could not have made its acquaintance under better auspices than he had done that day. He was delighted with all he had witnessed. He could not speak too highly of the home system which had been adopted. He had derived additional pleasure from his visit in being permitted to shake hands with Mr. Spurgeon, whom he had always desired to meet face to face. He rejoiced that God had raised up such a man, and long might he live to be a blessing to the land.

Mr. Spurgeon, who followed the Earl, told how in his work for the fatherless he had found the ready assistance of Christians of all denominations. The chairman had mentioned that the orphanage was free of debt. They did not know what debt meant. They were terribly in debt to everybody, but had no debt notwithstanding. He was glad they had now nearly done building. There was one corner upon which they wished to erect washing-places, but this was a matter they would do one morning before breakfast. Friends must keep on giving, because the boys kept on eating and wearing out their clothes. Somebody advertised untearable fabrics. He never saw any garments of this description, and he did not suppose Earl Cairns's sons ever had clothes they could not wear out. His never did. Boys' clothes would go at the knees, and then somewhere else, and then "the rest which remaineth" was but a remnant.

Canon Fleming, on rising to speak, received something like an ovation. He began by congratulating Mr. Spurgeon upon attaining his jubilee year. His acquaintance with Mr. Spurgeon dated back twenty-five years. He first met him in the city of Bath, at the house of a good Nonconformist named Cox—Bishop Cox, as he was called, until he took to preaching under a railway arch, after which he was termed Archbishop Cox. He had known and read Mr. Spurgeon ever since that meeting. While the good people in their unbounded admiration for Mr. Spurgeon had done all they could to spoil him, he remained to this day thoroughly unspoiled. He admired the man who loved the Church which he believed conscientiously to be the best. He did not care for "isms," for they were apt to make angels into angles; but, if there was an ism he disliked, it was nothigarianism. Every honest Christian must have a religious preference, and Christians never did and never would think alike; and the wonder was not that they should differ, but that, constituted as they were, they should ever be able to agree to the extent they were doing that night.

Mr. Spurgeon, who sandwiched the speeches with some remarks of his own, now mentioned that the gifts and contributions received that day amounted to $4000. One kind friend for twenty years past had sent an amount corresponding with his birthday. This year, in forwarding the £50, the friend wrote that Mr. Spurgeon 'was becoming expensive.'

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

The Penitent Prodigal.

Miss Waldron's narrative contained several details not to be found in the preceding chapter, all tending to cast a lustre on her own conduct, such as might be supposed by an uncharitable spirit to have existed only in her own imagination. She omitted also the mention of Madame's suggestion with respect to Carl himself, though she was tearfully eloquent in connection with her suspicions concerning her brother and Hester being in the habit of seeing one another in the old Frenchwoman's garret. Here Carl possessed a knowledge of which Miss Waldron was ignorant; and nothing appeared more probable to him than that Robert Waldron had seized upon any opportunity of meeting Hester. But that she should consent to these clandestine interviews was a sure, convincing proof that he had won her affection; and she had fallen into the snare through dread of her father. Could this be the sorrow which old Mr. Watson had foreseen for Hester? Had he received some hint of the miserable attachment she had formed? What could he do in the matter?

Carl suffered more intense pain this morning than he had done the night before while listening to Mr. Waldron. There had been the consolation of doubt then, but there was none now. Hester met Robert clandestinely, and it must be because she loved him.

"I ought not to have been alarmed, even then," said Miss Waldron; "I ought to have stayed myself upon a promise."

"Certainly," replied Carl, not hearing what she said.

"But I am only a feeble woman," she continued; "we are not like you and others, with your strong minds. I am afraid you will despise me for the future."

She had never before pleaded her feminine feebleness, but now she looked up to him with an appealing and helpless gaze. From Hester's eyes such a glance would have penetrated the profoundest depths of his heart; but from Miss Waldron it had no such effect.

"Despise you!" he said; "oh, no! why should I? No doubt you had cause for alarm."

"And you will esteem me, and—care for me as much as ever?" she asked, with a recurring sob.

"To be sure," he replied; "why do you trouble yourself afresh, Miss Waldron? There is no more cause for fear. As soon as you feel yourself equal to the exertion, I will see you safe home."

"Carl," she said, in a bashful and hesitating tone, "if you really feel that we are friends, and especially now we have a secret between us, and I have only you to look to for advice and protection, I wish you would leave off calling me Miss Waldron. You may call me by my name, Sophia."

"But nobody calls you Sophia!" exclaimed Carl, with alarmed earnestness.

"But I will allow you to do so," she answered, condescendingly; "it is less distant, and more friendly. To the rest of the world I remain Miss Waldron; to you I am Sophia."

Carl murmured his thanks indistinctly. It needed a great effort to save him from a lack of courtesy. But she was a good woman, a member of his church, a lady, and the daughter of his patron. All these titles gave her so many claims to his respect; and even if it were true, as Annie had intimated, that she distinguished him with her preference, that was no reason whatever why he should treat her with impoliteness or ill-temper. There was a mingled sense of shame and sorrow for her which lent to his manner a sufficient gentleness to blind Miss Waldron's eyes, already dazzled with self-importance. She intimated that she was now ready to undertake the walk home; and leaning confidingly, but not too heavily, upon his arm, they traversed together the watchful streets of Little Aston and the glades of the park, while unutterable sentiments filled the heart of Sophia Waldron.

It was a noticeable sight, and one fraught with tacit inferences, which had greeted Hester's eyes as she turned the corner of the street and saw Carl and Miss Waldron about to enter the chapel vestry upon a day and hour when there was neither a public service nor a more private meeting of any kind. She had not chosen to recognize them; for the question asked by Annie, whether she had not observed something peculiar in Miss Waldron's manner toward Carl, had been rankling in her mind ever since; and the pain it created there set her on her guard, both against herself and them. She was in a transition state of moods and emotions, of which she could not breathe a word to any one.

From the first moment her eyes had looked upon Carl's face, with its fine, clear, happy, and good aspect, so differing in its charm from the handsomer features of Robert Waldron, she had felt that there were other classes of men in the world than those she had met in her narrow sphere. Hitherto she had found no man stronger in nature than herself; for in her heart of hearts Hester knew herself less weak in the presence of trial and temptation than any of the people about her, with the exception, perhaps, of Grant. She was, though Mr. Waldron and Robert did not suspect it, little pliable to outer influences, and not easily moulded into a form foreign to herself. But Carl was stronger than she. She looked up to him from beneath the long fringe of her brown eyelashes, mentally acknowledging him her superior. Sunday after Sunday she listened to him critically, and never caught a false tone or an affected one. She found her mind pondering over his thoughts, and confessing her belief in them. She began to feel as if she was his sole listener; the congregation might be there, but they could not comprehend him as she did.

A very sweet and subtle impression had taken hold of her, that Carl had been more eloquent for her than for any one else in his church. Now and then, when he had soared far above the heads of his simple flock, his kindled eyes had held hers in a fascinated gaze, while he elaborated and concluded his thought; and there had seemed a secret understanding between them, more perfect than that of words. But now Hester discovered that there was a second listener, with whom, perhaps, Carl had a still more intimate and delicate unison; who might have the privilege of suggesting the themes of his eloquence, and who certainly could converse with him familiarly about his sermons.

When Annie had plainly hinted at Miss Waldron's preference for her brother, Hester, yielding to a very natural and feminine feeling of jealousy, had observed that she was a very pious woman. It was all she could say. To her Miss Waldron had ceased to be imposing or clever; and she never appeared engaging. Hester scarcely cared to put herself into comparison with her on the score of beauty; and she felt that she was her superior mentally. But in goodness? In the one thing needful to a good man like Carl, how far she fell behind the lady of Aston Court!

Hester humiliated herself all that afternoon; and, in consequence, was not so pleasant a companion to Lawson as usual. She set vigorously to work to root out the tares from her heart, one of them being her young love for Carl. She made a number of vows, every one difficult of performance. Her busy hands did not pause because of the inward storm; but Lawson saw more than one tear stealing down her cheeks as she smoothed the gold leaf with her delicate fingers. He was himself excited, and could scarcely refrain from telling Hester of the occurrence of the morning. But her cloudy brow, and her mouth set into a firm line of decision and of secret conflict, silenced him.

During the last few months she had grown out of the pensive and almost timid child into a mistress, who was gentle and gracious in her manner, it was true, but who knew her own dignity and upheld it. When she spoke to him this afternoon, her voice was set in a clear but mournful key; and her words were few. Lawson did not dare to tell her how he had encountered Miss Waldron in his mother's room, and had forbidden her ever to intrude there again. He would leave it for madame to relate in her own way.

At six o'clock Hester descended from the workroom and made tea for her father, still busy with herself. She could not decide whether she would go to the week-night service at chapel, or stay at home to pursue her melancholy task of rooting up the tares. She debated the point until it was almost too late, and then she dressed in a panic, and sped in frantic haste up the dark street. The fine morning had merged into an evening of thick, cold rain, which was falling heavily, and splashed upon the pavement as she hurried along. Scarcely a creature was to be seen. Here and there a resolute worshipper, like herself, was trudging along under a wet umbrella, but she knew that the congregation would be a small one. And then it all at once occurred to her, with a chill colder than the rain, that very probably Carl himself would be absent, as he was not very well. She stopped at the door to regain her breath, and to listen if she could hear his voice within. Two or three persons passed her; one of them a poor woman shabbily dressed in a widow's garb, who paused to look inquisitively at her from under her rusty crape veil. Then Hester went in, caught for a moment the full, grave, searching gaze of Carl from his low reading-desk, and going on to her accustomed seat, she sank upon her knees, with a strange, almost intolerable, sense of pain.

For once Hester did not hear a word of Carl's sermon, though she caught the sadness and unwonted languor of his voice. As she left the chapel she saw the carriage from Aston Court still waiting at the door, though Mr. and Miss Waldron were already seated in it. She crossed over the street, and hid in the archway of the court opposite, simply to wound herself with the sight of Carl driving away with her rival. While she stood in the rain and the darkness, he would be whirled off in comfort and luxury. Hester felt for the first time how poor she was. Miss Waldron was rich as well as good, and Carl had made a wise choice.

The worldly sneer had scarcely risen to her lips when she shrank from it instinctively, and drove the suspicion back to the unworthy regions from whence it had come to assail her. She watched the little congregation dropping away by two and threes; and suddenly recalled to mind a childish play of the lost Rose, who had often amused her by watching the creeping sparks die out of a smouldering piece of paper. Why did the memory of Rose return to her now? Carl was just coming out of chapel, the last of all, and ran through the rain to the carriage, into which he sprang with the freedom and familiarity of one quite at home with those inside. She saw it roll away down the street, and then she prepared to follow, slowly and sorrowfully, through the beating of the storm.

But had Carl been the last to leave the chapel, where a few lamps were still burning, though they were being put out one by one? Hester cast a last look toward it, and saw the poor widow in her shabby mourning, sitting desolately upon one of the steps of the portico. She was in a mood for lingering. She was in a mood, too, for pity and compassion toward any form of suffering. There was also a fine, and very insidious sense of pleasure in the idea of engaging in some good work, while Miss Waldron was wrapped in luxury and enjoyment. She would be, for the moment, beating her on her own ground. Hester recrossed the street. The stranger was crouching upon the lowest step, with the rain driving full upon her. She seemed to have reached this place, and then fallen, for she was lying along the stone in an attitude of complete helplessness. Hester stooped, and laid her hand gently on her shoulder.

"Are you ill?" she asked, in soothing tones. "You must not lie here in the rain. If you tell me where your home is, I will take you there under my umbrella."

To walk through the wet streets with a friendless and poverty-stricken stranger on her arm would be a vast triumph over Miss Waldron in her carriage, with Carl by her side.

The woman shuddered, and shrank from the light touch of Hester's hand, crouching lower and lower upon the ground. She had looked up from under the veil at Hester's face, upon which the lamp still lit in the entrance of the chapel was shining. Then she gave utterance to a sob, a suppressed cry, a moan wrung from the extreme anguish of a suffering spirit. She stretched out her hand toward Hester, but did not touch her, in a mute gesture which awoke within her a vague alarm.

"Speak to me," cried Hester; "are you ill? What can I do for you?"

As she spoke the last light was extinguished in the chapel, and the outer doors were closed and fastened by some person within. The noise seemed to arouse the stranger. She rose to her feet, but staggered, and fell back against one of the large, square pillars of the portico.

The continued silence and the agitation of this woman gave a shape to Hester's vague suspicions. A quick terror and chill ran through her frame. The darkness which now gathered about them was a welcome veil; a screen behind which might be acted scenes that must shun the day. The rain also, and the emptiness of the street, seemed to draw closer the curtain which ought to conceal the wretched creature at her side.

"Tell me only who you are," she whispered, in a tone of mingled pity and terror.

"Hester!" moaned the shadow, which she could scarcely distinguish in the dense darkness of the night; and there was no need for any other word to pass through the faltering lips.

Hester sank down upon the steps, and with blank, bewildered eyes gazed into the blackness which hemmed them in. The poor lost Rose had come back at last! The sinful woman whom she had urged Robert Waldron to seek out, and whose mysterious disappearance had been a continual care to her. Her father's wife stood beside her! She felt her cheeks burn and her veins tingle. Now she had a vision of her sin which she had never had before. For a few minutes her woman's heart—a heart which had known womanhood but for a little time—cried out in strong condemnation of the sinner, as well as the sin. She felt that she could not forgive her all at once; nor speak to her any words except those of a righteous anger and abhorrence. She knew now that Rose ought not to have married her father at all, unless she had felt for him such a love as would have lifted her up forever out of reach of the temptation by which she had fallen.

Yet, thought Hester, after the first paroxysm was over, had not God brought them together thus, on the very threshold of His own house of prayer, to teach her that if He did not cast her out, neither ought she, who might herself be tempted, and who was not without sin? She bowed her head upon her hands, and a passionate prayer went up from her burdened heart for help and wisdom in this hour of extreme need.

THE PLAGUE STAYED.

S. S. Lesson for August 24, II Sam. 24 : 15-25. Golden Text, Psalm 103 : 9. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Satan's Temptation—Entertained by David—The Fatal Point—A Warning from God—An Unwelcome Bearer of it—Joab's Dislike of Inconsistency—David's Confession—A Terrible Alternative—When Sickness Comes from God—The Bitterest Drop in the Cup—No Man Sinneth to Himself—The Way of Reconciliation—Practical Lessons.

"AGAIN the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel." "Satan stood up against Israel, and provoked David to number Israel" (I Chron. 21 : 1, 2). David was not obliged to adopt Satan's suggestion. A temptation does not necessitate a sin. Jesus "was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin" (Heb. 4 : 15). But it is very clear that David entertained Satan's suggestion. This is that we should entertain, think over, or consider in any way the suggestions of Satan. But how are we to know which of the many thoughts traversing our minds unbidden are suggestions of the enemy? There is one safe course. Refer them in believing prayer to the Lord as they arise; He will show whence they come.

God gave David a warning, but from a most unpalatable quarter. The man whose conscientious scruples were opposed to him was none other than the worldly Joab. There was something very humbling to David's pride in being rebuked by such a man. Had it been Nathan the prophet, or Zadok the priest, it would have been easy and natural to take warning; but when a man who made no profession of religion, and who, moreover, knew more about David's great fall than anybody else, ventured to become the keeper of his conscience, there was something peculiarly galling to David. It was Joab whom he had charged to set Uriah in the most exposed part of the army in view of his being slain, and he knew that Joab despised him in his heart. It was Joab who had executed God's vengeance upon Absalom, and who had spoken home truths to David about his selfish and unbecoming excess of sorrow for his son; and now that his heart was set upon knowing the number of his people, it was this Joab who must set himself up as more righteous than he. Very often God chooses that one to tell us the truth from whom it comes with the least of welcome. Why? Does He want to tantalize us? No; but to show us that we have more care for our own feelings than we have for the truth itself. Joab said, "The Lord make His people an hundred times so many more as they be: but, my lord the king, are they not all my lord's servants? Why then doth my lord require this thing? why will he be

A CAUSE OF TRESPASS TO ISRAEL?"

(I Chron. 21 : 3.) David's natural heart said: "Why should my nephew, my subordinate, dictate to me?" The very opposition made his desire the stronger, and the king's word prevailed against Joab. Some people can brook anything better than to be opposed and to have the truth told about themselves. Oh, how the heart of man likes to get credit for what it is not!

When Joab set about the matter, he did it imperfectly, leaving out the tribes of Levi and Benjamin. Joab, man of the world as he was, liked consistency. If David counted the Lord to be his strength, his fortress, his high tower, his shield, what need was there to number the strength of forces which he could muster? Worldly men know what is consistent in a man of God much better than he does himself.

God was displeased and smote Israel. And David's heart smote him after he had numbered the people, but not until God had sent Gad the seer to speak to him. Then it was that David said unto the Lord, "I have sinned greatly in that I have done; and now I beseech thee, O Lord, take away the iniquity of thy servant; for I have done very foolishly." "How could such a man fall into such sins?" has often been asked. There was no intrinsic virtue in David, nor is there in any other man.

DAVID'S OWN TESTIMONY

is, "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity, and in sin did my mother conceive me" (Ps. 51 : 5). Whatever good there was in David was purely from the grace of God. Self, the principle on which Satan works, was alive in his heart. It is only as Jesus reigns within us, possessing our wills and our affections, that Satan's temptations can fall powerless. Jesus has destroyed him that had the power of death, even the devil (Heb. 2 : 14), and to Jesus he is a conquered foe.

Although God was displeased with David, yet He did not treat him as an enemy, but rather as a rebellious son. While obliged, as a faithful God and Father, to execute judgment, He did what before was unprecedented; He offered David a choice as to the judgment which should come upon him. "Thus saith the Lord, Choose thee either three years' famine; or three months to be destroyed before thy foes, while that the sword of thine enemies overtaketh thee: or else three days the sword of the Lord, even the pestilence, in the land, and the angel of the Lord destroying throughout all the coasts of Israel." It was

A TERRIBLE ALTERNATIVE.

In either case, hundreds must perish. Either he must see the ghastly emaciation of famine staring at him from thousands of suffering people, and then see them drop and die, reading therein the terrible fruit of his silly vanity. Or he must see foreign hosts desolating the country by war, and the thousands of armed men whom he had so proudly numbered fall by the sword, as though in mockery of the late census. Or, for a much shorter time (only three days) the sword of the Lord, in the shape of pestilence must desolate the land. David said, "I am in a great strait: let me fall now into the hand of the Lord; for very great are His mercies; but let me not fall into the hand of man." "Does sickness then come from God?" some may ask. Most certainly, when God permits it in the way of judgment, it comes from God to us. God may make use even of a lie which some one tells about us, to be a trial of our faith and patience, although we can never charge Him with originating it, and so He may use Satan's rod of sickness. From Job 2 we see that Satan may be at work in producing sickness or other trials, but always subject to God's permission.

Seventy thousand men of Israel fell by the pestilence which prevailed over the land from north to south. The angel of the Lord stretched out his hand over Jerusalem to destroy it. David saw what the message by the prophet Gad led him to expect, the angel which destroyed. The people saw the pestilence; few there were throughout the land who could settle to business, take journeys, or do aught but tremble for terror, for the dead and the dying were everywhere around. But David lifted up his eyes and saw the angel of the Lord stand between the earth and the heaven, having a drawn sword in his hand stretched out over Jerusalem. And David spake unto the Lord when he saw the angel that smote the people, and said, "Lo, I have sinned, and I have done wickedly: but these sheep, what have they done? let thine hand, I pray thee, be against me, and against my father's house;" "but not on thy people that they should be plagued" (I Chron. 21 : 16). This was the bitterest drop in his cup, that others must suffer for what he had done. "None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself" (Rom. 14 : 7). And equally may we say no man he must involve others in the consequences of his sin. Some will say, "But such a responsibility is too terrible." It is for us to bear, and therefore the Lord tells us "to cast all our care on Him, for He [the Almighty One] careth for us."

David and the elders of Israel were clothed in sackcloth, on their faces before the Lord. And "the Lord repented Him of the evil, and said to the angel that destroyed the people, It is enough: stay now thine hand." Then the Lord made clear the way of reconciliation. David knew God too well to attempt any kind of propitiation which should originate with himself.

Gad came to him that day and directed him to rear an altar in the threshing floor of Araunah the Jebusite. David went went up at once to the threshing floor, and Araunah, who, with his four sons, had just seen the angel of the Lord, and hid himself, came forth to meet David. The king made an offer to purchase the threshing floor; but Araunah, Jebusite that he was, said, "Let my lord the king take and offer up what seemeth good unto him: behold, here be oxen for burnt sacrifice, and threshing instruments and other instruments of the oxen for wood. All these things did Araunah, as a king, give unto the king." But David would not accept this lordly offer. "Nay; but I will surely buy it of thee at a price: neither will I offer burnt offerings unto the Lord my God of that which doth

COST ME NOTHING."

The king paid six hundred shekels of gold for the place, and he "offered burnt offerings and peace offerings and called upon the Lord; and He answered him from heaven by fire upon the altar of burnt offering." God left David in no uncertainty as to His acceptance.

The Lord teach us the lessons He would have us learn from this history. First, to take rebuke from God through whomsoever it comes; for if David had been humble enough to listen to Joab, all this evil might have been averted. Then, when we have fallen, to accept the hand of God in judgment, and acknowledge Him at all costs. Perhaps the chief lesson of all is to do nothing without clear direction from the Lord. If David had consulted Him about the numbering of the people, the very beginning of the difficulty would never have existed.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Chinese Town of Kelung was Bombarded and captured by the French last week. The French newspapers explain the proceeding by the statement that the ultimatum presented by the French Government having expired on August 4th, it was necessary to seize a guarantee. Admiral Lespès, therefore, on August 5th, occupied the port of Kelung and the coal mines in the vicinity. M. Patenôtre has informed Li Hung Chang that the duration of the French occupation depends entirely upon the Tsung-Li Yâmên, which can shorten it by paying an indemnity of 80,000,000f. ($16,000,000) in ten yearly instalments. Later reports deny the bombardment, and say that Kelung surrendered without a blow. Directly the cannon from Admiral Lespès's flagship signalled, the men landed from the various ships, and the town was taken possession of in the name of France. The authorities of the town and a majority of the populace fled. Four thousand Chinese troops, recently arrived from Shanghai, retired into the interior. The British Vice-Consul went on board an English gunboat, having perviously sent a protest to Admiral Lespès against the French occupation, and pointing out that Kelung was protected under treaty with England. Warning has been given to the Chinese that Foochow will be seized immediately if the French terms are not accepted. The Chinese are anxious to obtain the mediation of America, but the French attitude is not of a character to encourage hope of the success of mediation.

The Menacing Attitude of France toward Great Britain excites some apprehension in Europe. Since the failure of the Egyptian Conference the disposition manifested by the British Government to manage Egyptian affairs according to its own views has exasperated the people and the press of France Bismarck is suspected of fomenting the ill feeling with the view of still further isolating France by alienating England from her. Figaro, referring to the subject, says: "M. Waddington's successor must display greater energy against the spread of English power. French and English interests are now completely opposed, and a conflict is inevitable in the near future." The rupture of the Conference, the paper says, is a grave enough event, but it hopes it will not have to announce that the latent conflict has passed into open hostilities. France firmly refuses to consent to a reduction of the rate of interest on the Egyptian debt, which Egypt is clearly unable to pay. The British press of both parties and British statesmen, both Liberal and Conservative, urge the government to proceed with a vigorous policy, regardless of the protests of France. Lord Northbrook, an eminent statesman and financier, has been sent to Egypt with the title and functions of High Commissioner.

An Expedition for the Relief of General Gordon is being prepared. Mr. Gladstone, on August 5th, in the House of Commons, asked for an appropriation of $1,500,000 to equip an expedition to the Soudan. He said that the purpose of the expedition was merely to relieve General Gordon and not to crush the Mahdi. It would be sufficient to secure good government in the Soudan. The evacuation of that country was now out of the question. England was bound to protect General Gordon. The expedition will go by way of the Nile to Khartoum. It will consist of 2500 men, partly English and partly Egyptian, and seven cuirassed river boats. The whole expedition will be under the command of General Stephenson, the commander-in-chief of the English forces in Egypt. On reaching Dongola paid contingents from the tribes of Western Soudan will join the expedition.

A Gigantic Radical Demonstration Took place at Birmingham, England, on August 4th. Birmingham is the headquarters of Radicalism, and has taken the lead in all Radical movements for more than half a century. At the demonstration last week fully 200,000 persons participated, and the procession was of enormous length. A meeting was held in the evening to denounce the House of Lords, when twenty thousand people attended. John Bright and Mr. Chamberlain, two of the members of Parliament for Birmingham, addressed the meeting. The reform of the House of Lords, Mr. Bright declared, was urgent and inevitable The creation of new peers to pass the Franchise bill would only get rid of the present difficulty. What was wanted was a limitation of the veto power of the House of Lords. Should the people submit, or should they curb the nobles as their fathers had curbed the kings of England? Mr. Bright then proceeded to explain the manner in which he would like to see the power of the House of Lords restricted. He would allow the peers to retain their present powers during the first session that a bill should be presented to them, but he would absolutely preclude them from vetoing the Franchise bill, or any bill a second time. Many persons, no doubt, would think him too lenient to the peers, but he preferred remedies which, while effectual, would cause the least disturbance to existing institutions. The meeting disapproved of Mr. Bright's moderation, and were clamorous for the abolition of the House of Lords.

An Increase of Deaths from Cholera is Reported from France as a result of the higher temperature. A cable message from Marseilles, on August 9th, says: The intense heat is causing an increase in the mortality among the cholera patients. There have been fourteen deaths in the last twenty-four hours. The return of fugitives to Arles has had a bad effect. There have been six deaths at that place in twelve hours. The area affected by the epidemic is beyond question widening. Yesterday there were five deaths at Salin, a village of only 400 inhabitants, near Arles. At Cette there were seven deaths; at Bézieres, two; at Carcassone, two, and at Bordeaux, one. At Gigeau such a panic prevails that parents have fled, forgetting their children, whom Sisters of Charity are caring for temporarily. A soldier from Avignon, where several deaths from cholera had occurred, died at Algiers. His comrades who accompanied him from Avignon have been isolated. At Vogue, in the department of Ardèche, with a population of 750, there were five deaths yesterday, and thirty persons were under treatment. Numerous cases of sickness which are supposed to be cholera are reported at other points in Ardèche."

Lieutenant Adolphus W. Greely, whose portrait appears this week on the first page of The Christian Herald, is a man whose name now stands prominently before the world as the leader of the expedition which has penetrated farther north than any other exploration party. He was born in 1844 at Newburyport, Mass. He entered the army during the war as a private. On March 18th, 1863, he was made second lieutenant, and in April the following year he became first lieutenant. He was brevetted major March 13th, 1865, for "faithful and meritorious service." He was made captain of the Eighty-first Colored Infantry, April 4th, 1865, and in March, 1867, was honorably mustered out. Upon the reorganization, in 1869, he was assigned to the Fifth Cavalry, and became first lieutenant in 1873, which is his present rank. He is one of the oldest officers in the signal service, having become one of its officers when the bureau was formed. He is tall and slender, and apparently a man who could never survive the hardships of an Arctic expedition. He has a wife and two children. Lieutenant Greely was in his right place at the Signal Service Bureau, where his studious habits and intelligence were well appreciated and led to his selection for the dangerous but honorable command of the Arctic Expedition.

ORIGIN OF THE EXPEDITION.

The expedition was a part of the plan adopted by the International Geographical Congress at Hamburg, in 1879, for the establishment of a series of circumpolar stations for scientific observations. On March 3d, 1881, Congress passed a bill providing an appropriation for the support of observations and explorations in the Arctic seas, on or near the shores of Lady Franklin Bay. Lieutenant Greely was appointed to take command, and the point selected for the station was the most northerly and difficult of access of the whole series of stations projected by the Geographical Congress. The spot chosen was Discovery Harbor, latitude 81° 44′ north and longitude 64° 45′ west. Lieutenant Greely received his instructions in April, 1881. He and the other officers and men of the expedition were to go to St. John, Newfoundland, and charter a steam whaler or sealer to convey the party to Lady Franklin Bay. Lieutenant Greely went immediately to St. John, and there chartered the screw steamer Proteus, a vessel that had been previously in use for Arctic navigation. His assistant, Lieutenant James B. Lockwood, with fifteen men, sailed from Baltimore for St. John on June 14th, 1881. The Proteus sailed for Lady Franklin Bay on July 4th. One month later at that point, and the Proteus returned to St. John, bringing a cheerful letter from Lieutenant Greely, announcing that the party had settled at Discovery Harbor, and were all well. From that time, August 18th, 1881, to July 17th, 1884, no news was received from the expedition.

THE PARTY ENTERED CAMP

ATTEMPTS AT RELIEF.

It was understood before Greely sailed that every year a steamer would be sent to him with fresh supplies and with recruits to take the place of the sick men in his party. In 1882, accordingly, the steamship Neptune was fitted out and placed in charge of Mr. M. W. Beebe. She sailed from St. Johns on July 8th, 1882. On July 28th she passed the Carey Islands. On the 29th she passed Littleton Island, but encountered a barrier of ice that checked further progress. She made another effort a week later to reach the party, and succeeded in getting within one hundred and fifty miles of their camp; but the ice did not open, and accordingly caches were established on Cape Sabine and Littleton Island, and the Neptune returned to St. Johns, N. F. The failure to reach Greely caused much disappointment, but no apprehension as to his safety.

In 1883 Lieutenant E. A. Garlington, of the Seventh Cavalry, was selected to command the second relief expedition. He sailed from St. Johns, N. F., on June 29th, in the steamer Proteus, the ship that landed Greely at Lady Franklin Bay two years before. He was followed by the United States Steamer Yantic, which was to serve as a supply ship. The Proteus reached Pandora Harbor on July 22d. No ice was visible to the north, and Payer Harbor, near Cape Sabine, was entered the same afternoon. After a very short stop the ship proceeded until within four miles of Cape Albert, where the ice prevented further progress.

Garlington, against the wishes of Captain Pike, determined to make an effort to push through the pack. Soon after entering it the vessel was terribly nipped, and the ice began to crush through her sides. The ship settled slowly, hung for a moment on the ice, and then sank out of sight, her yards catching on the ice floe on both sides, and breaking in two as she went down. Some of the stores that had been thrown upon the ice were landed on Cape Sabine. The party reached Upernavik in rowboats, and there boarded the Yantic.

This failure created a decided feeling of alarm for the safety of Lieutenant Greely. Congress voted ample funds to enable the Navy Department to fit out a third expedition. The Bear, a steam sealer, was purchased in Newfoundland, and the Thetis, a steam whaler, in Dundee, Scotland. The British Government presented the steamer Alert, and another vessel, the Loch Garry, was chartered as a collier. The expedition was placed under the command of Commander W. S. Schley, of the United States Navy. The Bear, commanded by Lieutenant Emory, sailed on April 24th. The flagship Thetis followed a week after, and soon after the other ships sailed. The expedition cost upward of $1,000,000.

The rescue party had a continuous battle with the ice, forcing their way by ramming and the use of torpedoes until June 18th, when they entered clear water off Cape York. Being then in a position in which information of Greely might be looked for, parties were at once sent to scour the adjacent hills for records.

FINDING THE PARTY.

In about an hour a cheer was heard, but in the high wind that was blowing it was impossible to locate the direction from which it came. Soon after a seaman came running toward the ship shouting, "We have found the Greely party!" Coming on board he brought records, which had been found by Lieutenant Taunt on the top of Brevoort Island. They were dated October 21st, 1883, signed by Lieutenant Greely, and contained the news of the retreat from Fort Conger, the arrival of the party at Baird Inlet all well, the location of Camp Clay, and stated briefly the quantity of provisions available. The general recall was hoisted on board both ships, the whistles sounded to attract attention to it, and the Bear's steam launch, which had been lowered to assist in the search along the coast, was immediately sent, in charge of Lieutenant Colwell, to the scene of the encampment. Shortly after this Ensign Harlow signalled from shore, "I have found the Greely record. Send five men." He had discovered a record, dated October 23d, signed by Lockwood, and a cache, which contained the scientific papers and instruments.

The rescuers were soon at the spot indicated, and there witnessed

A PITIFUL SIGHT.

A correspondent of the New York Times, on board the Thetis, thus describes it: "Some one was seen on the ice signalling with flags. Your correspondent ran forward and took the message as follows: 'Send doctor with stretchers and Harlow with photograph machine; seven alive.' When it came to the last two words I made him repeat them. With what careful interest I watched them no one can realize. It might be D-E-A-D, but no; A-L-I-V-E waved plainly through the air, and the fate of the Greely party was known on board the Thetis. Boats were lowered at once, manned with strong crews, and a party of officers and men started for the shore.

"Passing a small fire on which pots of milk were warming we came to the tent, under which lay four of the poor fellows. Two lay outside, one with his face swollen so that he could barely show by his eyes the wild excitement that filled his being. The other was muttering in a voice that could scarcely be heard in the howling of the gale his hungry appeal for food. Pushing aside the flags of the tent we saw a sight, the like of which we trust never to see again. Crowded together in the little of the tent that was left standing lay Greely and three of his men in their sleeping bags, their faces black with dirt. Their hollow cheeks and their gleaming eyes made a picture that we will never forget, and told a story that has but few rivals in the histories of miserable sufferings. The short glance revealed four men with the hand of death laid upon them; one, indeed, was gasping his last feeble breath while food and stimulants were forced between his teeth. The death of the other three would have occurred but for the arrival of relief in a very few hours. They could not move, and the gale was killing them in their weak and exhausted condition. So there they lay, waiting for death, unable to cook the pitiful ration of tanned oil, sealskin and lichens that they called their meal.

"Our glance was a short one. They were placed on litters and carried on board; their rags were removed, and they were tenderly warmed and fed." One of the survivors, however, was past saving, and in spite of all that could be done for him he died on board the ship. Another party was sent to the camp to bring away the bodies of the dead. Twelve only were found, the other five having been swept away by the waves, owing to their having been buried near the surface. The survivors were too weak to dig a deep grave.

GREELY'S STORY.

When they were sufficiently recovered, the survivors told their sad story. The most graphic version is that given by Sergeant Brainerd to the correspondent of the Times, and by him telegraphed to that journal. From that we give a few extracts:

"On landing," said Sergeant Brainerd, "we named our station 'Fort Conger,' in honor of Senator Conger. Observations meteorological, magnetic, tidal, astronomical, and other observations were begun at once, the first and third being taken hourly. A house was completed, and the party moved in during the first week in September. From this time we were employed during the remainder of the autumn in laying out depots and extending our knowledge of the country by interior explorations. Twenty musk oxen and a few ducks were shot soon after landing. Darkness began to creep upon us in the middle of October, though it was not until the latter part of December that it was finally upon us for the whole twenty-four hours. Winter amusements were then inaugurated, comprising debates, lectures, the publication of a newspaper, musical entertainments, etc. Each day was a counterpart of the one preceding it. Rules for health and exercise were prescribed and strictly enforced. They were, undoubtedly, of great benefit to us, especially the regulation insuring dryness of bunks and personal cleanliness. No scurvy or any other serious disease occurred during the two years' residence at Fort Conger.

"Christmas and New Year's were celebrated much the same as those days usually are in the Arctic regions, with games, good feeling, and sumptuous dinners. The thanks of the expedi-on are due to Mrs. Greely, the wife of the ommander, for the crowning feature of the ristmas dinner—a superb plum pudding. ther friends had also remembered the party in most substantial manner, as the abundance of nfectionery and the other gifts would testi- ."

On January 16th they were visited by a ter- fic gale, which swept everything before it, stop- ng all observations for several hours, and con- ning the party to the house. It attained a elocity of seventy-five miles an hour, twisting e anemometer cups from their spindles and owing them away. In the latter part of Feb- ary an expedition was sent to examine the ate of the ice in Robeson Channel. The report as favorable. On March 1st another party sited Hall's Rest, Thank God Harbor, and ached their destination on the evening of the ird day, very tired, cold, and depressed, but ere speedily restored under the genial influ- ice of a thimbleful of the English red-heart, hich by chance was discovered in one of their d rum casks. Although stanch advocates of e blue ribbon, this was an occasion when all felt at this course was not only justifiable, but at the case demanded some departure from e usual routine.

THE HIGHEST POINT NORTH.

On April 3d Lieutenant Lockwood, Sergeant rainerd, and the native driver Fred, with a am of eight dogs and a supporting party of six en, with Hudson Bay sledges, left the station extend the exploration of the English expedi- on on the north coast of Greenland. Ad- ancing all their supplies to the Polaris boat amp in Newman's Bay, they made their formal art on April 16th, crossing Breevort Penin- la by the already historical Gap Valley. On pril 29th the supporting party was turned back om Cape Bryant, and the little band of three en, with their dog team and provisions for venty-five days, turned their faces resolutely ward the north, with the intention of doing l that lay in the power of man to do. The orning of May 5th saw them at Cape Britan- a, and they unfurled the American flag over

AN UNEXPLORED LAND.

Before them all was new. They were passing p a coast which trended to the north-east, and hich before had never met the vision of civil- ed man. Their progress was greatly retarded y a severe storm, lasting for seven days; but ey struggled along through the thick atmos- here and driving storms day after day, sur- ounting all difficulties that opposed them. inally, however, while groping their way across wide fiord, all traces of the coast were oblitер- ted by the heavy drift, necessitating a delay of ver sixty hours to seek shelter. In order to conomize their provisions as much as possi- le they partook of only one meal every twenty- our hours. On May 13th the weary party had dvanced as far as the state of their provisions ould admit, and now stood on land at a higher orthern latitude than was ever before reached y mortal man. For 275 years brave navigators ad kept England's flag advanced beyond that f any other nation, but now the Stars and tripes floated proudly in the chilling breezes at higher point than the Union Jack had ever eached, in latitude 83° 24′ north, longitude 40° 6′ west.

After remaining at this point for two days, in rder to obtain satisfactory observations for heir position, the party began their return on he evening of May 15th, reaching Fort Conger n June 1st, after an absence of fifty-nine days. he farthest point reached was named Lock- vood Island, and an adjacent island was called fter Sergeant Brainerd, in honor of the two nen who had advanced the Stars and Stripes o a point nearer the pole than any of their redecessors have ever reached.

EXPLORING GRINNELL LAND.

During the year 1882 Lieutenant Greely made wo remarkable trips into the interior of Grin- ell Land, making important discoveries, which ot only added to their geographical knowledge, but also revealed physical conditions of the country hitherto unsuspected. His first trip was made in April with three men and Hudson Bay sledges. He was absent only eleven days, and travelled 250 miles, advancing into the interior by Conoybeare Bay.

His second trip of sixteen days was made in June and July. Only one companion, Sergeant Lynn, accompanied him. They carried packs during the greater part of the trip, the maximum weight being ninety pounds each. They travelled about fifty miles beyond the turning point of his former trips, discovering the Garfield and Conger range of mountains, Mount Chester A. Arthur, and several lakes and rivers. Lieutenant Greely ascended Mount Arthur 5000 feet, and was satisfied from the trend of the mountains that Grinnell Land, from Lieutenant Aldrich's furthest in 1876 extended due south. Although in the midst of the short Arctic summer the sufferings and hardships endured by Lieutenant Greely and Sergeant Lynn were of such a character as to determine them from repeating the experiment at any later period.

Their sufferings on this trip stand out conspicuously as among the most trying in the annals of Arctic travelling.

PREPARING FOR A RETREAT

The second winter's routine was almost a repetition of the first. During this year, as previously, all birthdays and festivals were celebrated by fine dinners and varied amusements. The sanitary rules were, if anything, more rigidly enforced than formerly. In addition to his other duties, which occupied his time for about eight hours daily, Lieutenant Greely conducted an evening school for those who desired to attend. On February 1st, 1883, twenty-six days before the return of the sun, Sergeant Brainerd was sent toward Cape Baird with a dog team to establish a depot of provisions for the retreat in boats, in the event of a ship not arriving. The depot was supplemented by other loads during the following months, and a preliminary trip was made to Cape Summer, Newman Bay, starting on March 10th. Lieutenant Lockwood, Sergeants Brainerd, Jewell, and Ellison, with the two native drivers, composed the party. A large cache of provisions placed at Cape Summer was the result of this trip. The same party, excepting Ellison, made their final start from Fort Conger on March 27th, with an excellent equipment, intending to travel north-east along the Greenland coast, and extend their discoveries of the previous years. In this they were fated to be disappointed. Six days of rapid travel brought them to Black Horn Cliffs, when their further progress was barred by a lane of water fifty yards wide extending along the coast. The interior of the country was thoroughly explored, but no practicable route for sledging was found.

THE PERILOUS JOURNEY.

The ice began breaking up early in August under the influence of high southerly gales. On the 9th of that month a lane had formed across Archer's Fiord opposite the western entrance. Taking advantage of it the party ran across to Cape Baird with the Lady Greely, having in tow the Valorous and Narwhal. At this point the iceboat Beaumont and depot of provisions were taken, and the party assigned to boats. Leaving this place at midnight the boats passed around Cape Reiber, taking on the 48 rations of corned beef at Cape Cracroft. The depots at Carl Ritter Bay and Cape Collinson were taken. That at Collinson was found deficient of a barrel of bread, a keg of rum, a keg of alcohol, and all small stores—tea, sugar, potatoes, etc. About fifteen miles north of Cape Lawrence they were frozen in the ice for five days, but a north-west gale liberated the boats, and at the same time opened a lane for escape. After many trials, hardships, and narrow escapes- from being crushed by the moving pack the party reached Cape Hawkes on August 26th. Two of the party's boats—the Lady Greely and Valorous were abandoned on September 10th near Cape Camperdown, the party retreating over the floes toward land with their two remainng boats and provisions They advanced at the rate of one mile per day, it being necessary to make four trips. Their only sledge having received a severe strain, it became necessary to abandon the boat Narwhal in order to save it, the loss of which would have been a fatal blow to the party. Twice the land seemed within their grasp, but both times they were driven back into Kane's Sea by southerly gales.

STARVING AND FREEZING.

During a north-west gale the ice floe was caught among the grounded icebergs in Baird Inlet, and the party escaped to the shore on the north side of the inlet on September 29th. They at once began the erection of winter quarters, it being impracticable to cross to Greenland with the single boat and the channel full of rapidly drifting ice. Later the party established themselves at Camp Clay, four miles north-west of Cape Sabine, near the Proteus wreck cache. On November 1st their rations were reduced to eleven from thirteen ounces. For a month previous to this they had been on half rations. By this date the caches were all collected, a careful inventory made, and their calculations made to extend them until March 1st at the established rations, leaving ten days on a slightly increased scale, to enable them to cross Smith's Sound to Littleton Island.

A miserable hovel had been constructed in October, twenty-two by twenty-five feet, covered with canvas, and into this the party crowded. Their sleeping bags were spread on the ground and became frozen down, so that it was impossible to move them. The frost penetrated to the interior of the bags, causing the occupants much suffering. A small pair of scales were made, and the work of issuing provisions was turned over to Sergeant Brainerd by the commanding officer. Rice, Lynn, Ellison, and Frederick were sent to Cape Isabella on November 1st to secure the 144 pounds of English meat. Ellison was badly frost-bitten during a severe gale, in a temperature of 30° below zero. He was brought in on the 12th of November. His feet were removed in February, and his fingers had also to be removed. The minimum temperature in January was 50° below zero. High gales prevailed all winter, preventing the sound from closing.

The party now had to depend on their own resources for food. A few donkeys, ptarmigans, and foxes were shot in March, and a small bear and seal in April. The amount of meat furnished by all was very small.

The fatal blow to the party occurred on April 30th, by the drowning of their remaining native, Jaens, and the loss of his kyack and best rifle. Without the kyack no hope for seals could be entertained. Rice and Fredericks volunteered to go to Baird Inlet to secure the English meat abandoned by them the previous autumn, when Ellison was frozen. Starting on April 6th they took seven days' provisions, at the rate of about twelve ounces of food daily to each. They encountered terrific gales, and in one of them on the fourth day Rice died from exposure and exhaustion in Baird Inlet. He was buried in the ice by his companion, who himself narrowly escaped death. Words cannot convey the feelings of gratitude to those brave men for their daring efforts to succor their companions. Before the departure of Rice he had caught a few shrimp with nets, using donkey skins for bait. Sergeant Brainerd afterward became the shrimper, and continued in the service until the last of the bait was used, a few days before the arrival of the relief ships. These marine animals were very small, there being about 800 to the ounce. By some they are known as sea flies. They possess very little or no nutriment, as the deaths in the party will testify. Sea weed was also used in small quantities until the fisherman was too weak to get more. The last provisions were issued on May 12th, and from that date the party subsisted on lichens, moss, saxifrage, sealskin, both boiled and roasted, and a little tea, until the arrival of the relief ships.

RESCUED NONE TOO SOON.

When rescued a southerly gale had been blowing for over sixty hours. The tents were blown down, and their weight was resting on the party, who were endeavoring to shelter themselves in their bags. For twenty-four hours they had eaten nothing, and their strength was passing rapidly. Connell would most likely have died in a few hours, and the strongest of the survivors would not have been alive in three days more.

During the past few days horrible stories have been circulated to the effect that the party, during their horrible sufferings at Cape Sabine, were so crazed that they ate the flesh of their dead comrades. At present there has been no confirmation of the dreadful statement, and Lieutenant Greely has explicitly stated that he had no knowledge of it. If it was done at all it was done by stealth by individual members of the party when he was too weak to leave the tent.

THE RESULTS of the expedition are thus summarized by the New York Sun:

"The Greely party, up to the day its struggle for life began at Cape Sabine, will be ranked by Arctic enthusiasts as one of the most brilliantly successful of Arctic expeditions. Geographers had hoped for great things from it. It took north a better outfit, especially for sledge travelling, than any preceding expedition. It was believed that, if circumstances were not greatly adverse, it would not fail to extend our knowledge of the shores that bound the great sea north of Grant Land. But the most sanguine geographers did not venture to hope that Greely would bring back with him the large amount of material he has gathered for completing the map of that part of the polar basin.

"In a latitude where one season sufficed to wear out Nares's two ships' crews with scurvy, Greely's little band passed two years with health and vigor, that were impaired neither by Arctic nights one hundred and forty days long nor by the terrible toils of the spring and summer travelling. In a latitude where Hall's boats and sledges advanced less than forty miles north of his winter quarters, Lockwood dragged his sledge about two hundred miles north-east of Discovery Harbor, four miles north of the highest latitude previously attained, and eighty miles further than the point reached by Beaumont on the same route. Dr. Pavy and Lieutenant Lockwood proved that Lincoln Sea during two successive seasons was full of floating ice, instead of being the perpetually frozen ocean that Nares described. Greely and Lockwood, in their journeys into Grinnell Land, virtually outlined its western shores for two degrees of latitude, proving that Grant Land is a peninsula connected with Grinnell Land by an isthmus.

"But, after all, Greely's greatest achievement was his journey last fall nearly two hundred and fifty miles down Smith Sound, at a time of year when successful sledge and boat expeditions have never before been made in that terribly difficult channel. Most geographers believed that the advancing darkness of September, its wild storms, and the crashing and jumbling of the Smith Sound ice floes, made it practically impossible for Greely to reach Cape Sabine in the fall. He triumphed, however, over nature, only to be nearly defeated at last by the inexcusable negligence of man."

Greely had plenty of food with him at Lady Franklin Bay, but he was ordered to retreat from there in the fall of 1883 if not relieved before. It was well understood that in such a retreat he could not carry provisions with him; the Government therefore promised to deposit stores of provisions on his route. They failed to do so, and the horrors of Cape Sabine and the death of seventeen men are the direct result of their deplorable incapacity. Lieutenant Greely and the survivors would have died also if Senator Ingalls and his supporters had succeeded in the efforts they made to delay the relief expedition this year.

RELIGION IN DRESS.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

"Whose adorning let it not be . . . . putting on of apparel."—1 Peter 3 : 3.

The First Wardrobe of Dark Green—Beauty in Nature's Wardrobe—Fashion in Heaven—The Victims of Fashion — Masculine Devotees—Chewing, Smoking, Gluttony—The Influence of Inordinate Devotion to Fashion—I. Fraud—Historical Examples — Men Strangled with their Wives' Ribbons—II. The Foe of Almsgiving—A Deacon's Unanswered Question—III. Causes Distraction in Worship—IV. It Belittles the Intellect—V. Excludes from Heaven—VI. Produces Miserable Life—Two Ghastly Death-Beds.

That we should all be clad is proved by the opening of the first wardrobe in Paradise, with its apparel of dark green. That we should all, as far as our means allow us, be beautifully and gracefully apparelled, is proved by the fact that God never made a wave but He gilded it, or a tree but He garlanded it with blossoms, or a sky but He studded it with stars, or allowed the smoke of a furnace to ascend but He columned and turreted and domed and scrolled it into outlines of indescribable gracefulness. When I see the apple-orchards of the spring and the pageantry of the autumnal forests I come to the conclusion that if Nature ever does join a Church, while she may be a Quaker in the silence of her worship, she never will be a Quaker in the style of her dress.

Why the notches on a fern-leaf or the stamen of a water-lily? Why, when the day departs, does it let the folding-doors of heaven stay open so long, when it might go in so quickly? One summer morning I saw an army of a million spears, each one adorned with a diamond of the first water—I mean the grass with the dew on it. When the prodigal came home, his father not only put a coat on his back, but jewelry on his hand. Paul says in his Epistle, "If a woman have long hair, it is a glory unto her." There will be as much as on earth, but it will be a different kind of fashion. It will decide the color of the dress; and the population of that country, by inexorable law, will wear white and stainless garments.

I say these things as a background to my sermon, to show you that I have no prim, precise, prudish, or cast-iron theories on the subject of human apparel. But the goddess of fashion has set up her throne in this country, and at the sound of the timbrels we are all expected to fall down and worship. The Old and New Testament of her Bible are Madame Demorest's Magazine and Harper's Bazar. Her altars smoke with the sacrifice of the bodies, minds, and souls of ten thousand victims. In her temple four people stand in the organ-loft, and from them there comes down a cold drizzle of music, freezing on the ears of her worshippers. This goddess of fashion has become a rival of the Lord of heaven and earth; and it is high time that we unlimbered our batteries against this idolatry.

When I come to count

THE VICTIMS OF FASHION

I find as many masculine as feminine. Men make an easy tirade against woman, as though she were the chief worshipper at this idolatrous shrine, and no doubt there are men in the more conspicuous part of the pew who have already cast glances to the more retired part of the pew, their look a prophecy of a generous distribution to others of the more cogent parts of my discourse. My sermon shall be as appropriate for one end of the pew as for the other. Men are as much the idolaters of fashion as women, but they throw themselves on a different part of the altar. With men, the fashion goes to cigars, and club-rooms, and yachting parties, and wine-suppers. In the United States the men chew up and smoke one hundred millions of dollars' worth of tobacco every year. That is their fashion.

In London, not long ago, a man died, who started life with seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, but he ate it all up in gluttonies, sending his agents to all parts of the earth for some rare delicacy for the palate, sometimes one plate of food costing him three or four hundred dollars. He ate up his whole fortune, and he came down, and had only one guinea of money left, and with that he bought a woodcock, and had it dressed in the very best style, ate it, gave two hours for digestion, then walked out on Westminster Bridge, and threw himself into the Thames, and died, doing on a large scale what you and I have often seen done on a small scale.

MASCULINE DEVOTEES.

But men do not abstain from millinery and elaboration of skirt through any superiority of humility. It is only because such appendages would be a blockade to business. What would sashes and trails three and a half yards long do in a Wall Street stock market? And yet men are the disciples of fashion just as much as women. Some of them wear boots so tight they can hardly walk in paths of righteousness. And there are men who buy expensive suits of clothes and never pay for them, and who go through the street in great stripes of color like animated checker-boards, and suggest to one that, after all, Tweed in prison dress may have got out of the penitentiary.

Then there are multitudes of men who, not satisfied with the bodies the Lord gave them, are padded, so their shoulders shall be square, carrying around a small cotton plantation! And I understand a great many of them now paint their eyebrows and their lips; and I have heard from good authority that there are multitudes of men in Brooklyn and New York—men—things have got to such an awful pass—multitudes of men wearing corsets!

I say these things, because I want to show you that I am impartial in this discussion, and that in my discourse both sexes, in the language of the Surrogate's office, shall "share and share alike." As God may help me this morning, I shall show you what are the destroying and deathful

INFLUENCES OF INORDINATE FASHION.

I. The first baleful influence is in fraud, illimitable and ghastly. Do you know that Arnold of the Revolution proposed to sell his country in order to get money to supply his wife's wardrobe? I declare here before God and this people that the effort to keep up expensive wardrobes in this country is sending many business men to temporal and eternal perdition. What was it that sent Gilman to the penitentiary, and Philadelphia Morton to the watering of stocks, and the life-insurance presidents to perjured statements about their assets, and has completely upset our American finances? What was it that overthrew Belknap, the United States Secretary at Washington, the crash of whose fall shook the continent?

But why should I go to these infamous defaultings to show what men will do in order to keep up great home style and expensive wardrobe, when you and I know scores of men who are put to their wits' end and are lashed from January to December in the attempt to keep up great home style. Our Washington politicians may theorize until the expiration of their terms of office as to the best way of improving our monetary condition in this country; it will be of no use, and things will be no better, until we learn to put on our heads and backs and feet and hands no more than we can pay for!

There are clerks in stores and banks on limited salaries, who, in the vain attempt to keep the wardrobe of their family as showy as other wardrobes, are dying of muffs, and diamonds, and camel's-hair shawls, and high hats, and they have nothing left except what they give to cigars and wine-suppers, and they die before their time, and they will expect us ministers to preach about them as though they were the victims of early piety, and after a high-toned funeral, with silver handles at the side of their coffin, of extraordinary brightness, it will be found out that in the act of dying and going to Greenwood they swindled the undertaker out of his legitimate expenses. Do not send to me to preach the funeral sermon of a man who dies like that. I will blurt out the whole truth, and tell that he was strangled to death by his wife's ribbons.

The country is dressed to death. You are not surprised to find that the putting up of one public building in New York cost millions of dollars more than it ought to have cost when you find out that the man who gave out the contracts paid more than five thousand dollars for his daughter's wedding dress. The cashmeres of a thousand dollars each are not rare on Broadway. It is estimated that there are five thousand women in these two cities who have expended on their personal array two thousand dollars a year. What are men to do in order to keep up such home wardrobes? Steal —that is the only respectable thing it seems to them they can do.

During the last fifteen years there have been innumerable fine businesses

SHIPWRECKED ON THE WARDROBE.

The temptation comes in this way: A man thinks more of his family than he does of all the world outside, and if they spend the evening in describing to him the superior wardrobe of the family across the street, that they cannot bear the sight of, the man is thrown on his gallantry and his pride of family, and, without translating his feelings into plain language, he goes into extortion and issuing false stock, and skilful penmanship in writing somebody else's name at the foot of a promissory note; and they all go down together—the husband to the prison, the wife to the sewing machine, the children to be taken care of by those who were called poor relations. Oh, for some new Shakespeare to arise and write

THE TRAGEDY OF CLOTHES;

Act the first of the tragedy—A plain but beautiful home. Enter, the newly-married pair. Enter, simplicity of manner and behavior. Enter, as much happiness as is ever found in one home.

Act the second—Discontent with the humdrum of life. Enter, envy. Enter, jealousy. Enter, desire of display.

Act the third—Englargement of expenses. Enter, all the queenly dressmakers. Enter, the French milliners.

Act the fourth—The tip-top of society. Enter, princes and princesses of New York life. Enter, magnificent plate and equipage. Enter, everything splendid.

Act the fifth and last—Winding up of the scene. Enter, the assignee. Enter, the sheriff. Enter, the creditors. Enter, humiliation. Enter, the wrath of God. Enter, the contempt of society. Enter, death. Now, let the silk curtain drop on the stage. The farce is ended, and the lights are out.

Will you forgive me if I say in tersest shape possible that some of the men in this country have to forge and have to perjure and have to swindle to pay for their wives' dresses? I do not care whether you forgive me or not.

II. Again, inordinate fashion is

THE FOE OF ALL ALMS-GIVING.

Men and women put so much in personal display that they often have nothing for God and the cause of suffering humanity. A Christian man cracks his Palais Royal glove clear across the back by holding on to the one cent too tight as he puts it into the poor-box. A Christian woman, at the story of the Hottentots, crying copious tears into a twenty-five-dollar handkerchief, and then giving a two-cent piece to the collection, thrusting it down under the bills so people will not know but it was a ten-dollar gold piece. One hundred dollars for incense to fashion. Two cents for God.

God gives us ninety cents out of every dollar. The other ten cents, by command of His Bible, belong to Him. Is not God liberal according to this tithing system laid down in the Old Testament—is not God liberal in giving us ninety cents out of a dollar, when He takes but ten? We do not like that. We want to have ninety-nine cents for ourselves and one for God. Now, I would a great deal rather steal ten cents from you than God. I think one reason why a great many people do not get along in worldly accumulation faster is because they do not observe this divine rule. God rises up and says: "Well, if that man is not satisfied with ninety cents of a dollar, then I will take the whole dollar, and I will give it to the man or woman who is honest with me."

The greatest obstacle to charity in the Christian Church to-day is the fact that men expend so much money on their stomachs and women expend so much money on their backs they have got nothing left for the cause of God and the world's betterment. In my first settlement at Belleville, New Jersey, the cause of missions was being presented one Sabbath, and a plea for the charity of the people was being made, when an old Christian man in the audience lost his balance, and said right out in the midst of the sermon: "Mr. Talmage, how are we to give liberally to these grand and glorious causes when our families dress as they do?" I did not answer the question. It was the only time in my life when I had nothing to say.

III. Again, inordinate fashion causes

DISTRACTION IN WORSHIP.

You know very well there are a good many people who come to church just as they go to the races, to see who will come out ahead. What a flutter it makes in church when some woman with extraordinary display of fashion comes in! "What a love of a bonnet!" says some one. "What a perfect fright!" say five hundred. For the most merciless critics in the world are fashion critics. Men and women with souls to be saved passing the hour in wondering where that man got his flamboyant cravat or what store that woman patronizes. In many of our churches the preliminary exercises are taken up with the discussion of wardrobes. It is pitiable. Is it not wonderful that the Lord does not strike the meeting-houses with lightning?

What distraction of public worship! Dying men and women, whose bodies are soon to be turned into dust, yet before three worlds strutting like peacocks, the awful question of the soul's destiny submerged by the question of Creedmoor polonaise and navy blue velvet with long fan train skirt, long enough to drag up the church aisle, the husband's store, office, shop, factory, fortune, and the admiration of half the people in the building. Men and women come late to church to show their clothes. People sitting down in a pew, taking up a hymn book, all absorbed at the same time in personal array, to sing:

"Rise, my soul, and stretch thy wings,
Thy better portion trace;
Rise from transitory things
Toward heaven, thy native place!"

I turn Episcopalian long enough to say, "Good Lord, deliver us!"

IV. Insatiate fashion also

BELITTLES THE INTELLECT.

Our minds are enlarged or they dwindle just in proportion to the importance of the subject on which we constantly dwell. Can you imagine anything more bedwarfing to the human intellect than the study of fashion? I see men on the street who, judging from their elaboration, I think must have taken two hours to arrange their apparel. After a few years of that kind of absorption, which one of McAlister's magnifying-glasses will be powerful enough to make the man's character visible?

What will be left of a woman's intellect after giving years and years to the discussion of such questions as the comparison between knife-plaits and box-plaits, and borderings of gray fox fur or black martin, or the comparative excellence of circulars of repped Antwerp silk lined with blue fox fur or with Hudson Bay sable? They

the first stages or the last stages. I have seen men at the summer watering-places, through fashion the mere wreck of what they once were —sallow of cheek, meagre of limb, gone in at the chest; showing no animation save in rushing across a room to pick up a lady's fan; simpering along the corridors the same compliments they simpered twenty years ago. The fools of fashion are myriad. Fashion not only destroys the body, but it makes idiotic the intellect.

EXCLUDES FROM HEAVEN.

V. Yet, my friends, I have given you only the milder phase of this evil. It shuts a great multitude out of heaven. The first peal of thunder that shook Sinai declared, "Thou shalt have no other god before me," and you will have to choose between the goddess of fashion and the Christian God. There are a great many seats in heaven, and they are all easy seats, but not one seat for the devotee of fashion. You could not sail up the harbor of heaven with that rigging. You would be fired on as a blockade-runner. Heaven is for meek and quiet spirits. Heaven is for those who think more of their souls than they do of their bodies. Heaven is for those who have more joy in Christian charity than they have in fashionable attire.

Why, if you, with your idolatry of fashion, should somehow get into heaven, you would be for putting a French roof on the "house of many mansions," and making plaits and Hamburg embroidery and flounces in the robes of eternal life, and you would be for introducing amid the queens of heaven the patterns of Butterick's Quarterly Delineator. Give up this idolatry of fashion, or give up heaven. What would you do standing beside the Countess of Huntingdon, whose joy it was to build chapels for the poor; or with that Christian woman of Boston, who fed fifteen hundred children of the street at Faneuil Hall on New Year's Day, giving out, as a sort of doxology at the end of the meeting, a pair of shoes to each one of them; and those Dorcases of modern society who have consecrated their needles to the Lord, and who will get reward for every stitch they take.

Oh, men and women, give up the idolatry of fashion. The rivalries and the competitions of such a life are a stupendous wretchedness. You will always find some one with brighter array, and with more palatial residence, and with lavender kid glove that makes a tighter fit. And if you buy this thing, and wear it, you will wish you had bought something else.

VI. The frets of such a life will bring the crows feet to your temples before they are due, and when you come to die, you will have

A MISERABLE TIME.

I have seen men and women of fashion die, and I never saw one of them die well. The trappings off, there they lay on the tumbled pillow, and there were just two things that bothered them—a wasted life and a coming eternity. I could not pacify them, for their body, mind, and soul had been exhausted in the worship of fashion, and they could not appreciate the Gospel. When I knelt by their bedside they were mumbling out their regrets, and saying, "O God! O God!" Their garments hung up in the wardrobe, never again to be seen by them. Their God cast them off. Without any exception, so far as my memory serves me, they died without hope, and went into eternity unprepared.

The two most ghastly death-beds on earth are the one where a man dies of delirium tremens and the other where a woman dies after having sacrificed all her faculties of body, mind, and soul in the worship of fashion. My friends, we must appear in judgment to answer for what we have worn on our bodies, as well as for what repentances we have exercised with our souls. Christ announced who would make up the royal family of heaven when He said, "Whosoever doeth the will of God, the same is my brother, my sister, my mother."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Beneficial Trip.—The Rev. Mr. Andrews said at a recent meeting: "One night recently, at the close of our evening service, a young man, who had just come to town from the country to see his father's grave in the southern Necropolis, stayed to be directed to the Lord Jesus. When he came to a decision for the Lord, I asked him, 'How did you happen to enter the Church to-night?' He answered, 'I was passing, and stopped to listen to the outside singing, and (pointing to one of our workers) this young man gripped me and took me in.' That is just how the problem of reaching our non-church going people will be solved. Let every Christian grip one, and bring him or her in, and our empty churches will soon be filled, and multitudes of weary sinners be led to Christ."

A Manufacturer's Success in Life.—The Rev. Mr. Gault said: "Very many of our active business men who, though they are really Christians, profess not to have time to spend in reading the Bible, meditating thereon, and prayer every day; and only do so at any irregular time which may happen to lie on their hands, or when their conscience rebukes them about it. In this they fail to promote their spiritual interests as well as their temporal interests, which would be benefited by setting aside a season for prayer and Bible study every day. One large and successful manufacturer of woollen materials in England set aside two hours every morning before going to business for prayer, meditation, and Bible reading, and to this fact he ascribed his success in life."

A Son's Unavailing Sorrow.—Mr. Gilbert Forbes related: "One night last Autumn a stalwart young man, in a state of great agitation, came to our meeting, and asked for a worker to visit his aged mother, who was dying. It was impossible to comply with the request at the moment, as the meeting was being conducted when he entered the church; but at the conclusion, another worker and myself went with him to his home. It was not by any means an uncomfortable home; on the contrary, it was well furnished, and very clean and cosey. The son, when we entered, fell, rather than sat down, upon a chair, and burst into an agony of weeping and sobbing; 'Speak to her! pray for her!' he cried; 'She wasn't a Christian!' But, alas! it was too late. When we looked, we saw the body of a woman over eighty years old, who had never accepted the Saviour's gracious aid. It will be long ere I forget the stern, dark look which death left upon her features."

Praying for Their Husbands Ten Years.—"I knew two women who prayed for their husbands for ten years. The faith of one of the women grew very weak, and she said to the other, 'I have prayed for my husband for ten years, and I think God does not mean to save him, or else He would have heard my prayers before this. I am now going to give it up.' 'Well,' answered the other, 'I have done the same, but I will not give up praying for my husband till it is the unmistakable will of God to answer my prayers.' This firm and devout reply strengthened the faith of the weaker sister, and both wives continued pleading with God on behalf of their husbands; and within a week of their conversation they had the great joy of seeing them converted to Christ. 'Ask, and it shall be given unto you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you.' This is the word and promise of Him who is true and faithful."

A Bishop Disguised as a Beggar.—Mr. Napier related: "Archbishop Usher heard so much of the holy life led by Samuel Rutherford that he wished to see him at home without himself being known. Disguising himself as a beggar one Saturday evening, he applied for alms and a night's lodging at the rectory. It was freely and hospitably given him. When the household was called into the parlor for family worship, he was invited to join with them. Following her usual practice, Mrs. Rutherford asked him, 'How many commandments are there?' 'Eleven,' was the stranger's answer. Very much shocked at what she deemed his ignorance, she gave him a lecture on the subject, which he meekly listened to without replying. In the morning he made himself known to Rutherford, who asked him to preach, which he did, taking for his text John 13 : 34. Then Mrs. Rutherford saw that there was an eleventh commandment, which included all the other ten.

A Curse on the House.—A Convert Said: "'The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked,' were the words which first awakened me to a sense of my sins. They were not uttered in any meeting, but I read them quietly at my own fireside. I was a heavy drinker, so that my wife had an extra hard time of it when illness entered our family and laid one child after another on a sick-bed. One night, during this trying time, I kept sober enough to watch the children, so that my wife might have a few hours rest. Feeling the time hang heavily on my hands, I read the Bible, which my wife had left lying open on the table, till I came on these awful words. They did not affect me much at the time, but when on Christmas morning one boy died, and soon after another, they recurred to my mind, and I felt that the curse of God was, indeed, in my house. Since then, however, I have found the blessing of pardon through faith in Christ, and His blood has cleansed me from my sins, and secured my peace with God."

THE EARTHQUAKE.

The shock of earthquake which passed through the Middle States and part of New England on Sunday, August 10th, although it inflicted no damage, caused general alarm. Many people, too, were made ill by the peculiar sympathetic affection that generally disturbs those who perceive the strange motion of the earth, and which is very like sea-sickness. Others suffered from nervous distress, which in two cases was so severe as to cause death. Nearly every one was solemnized by realizing the and the existence of forces against which there could be no protection. We cannot be too thankful that there were none of the overwhelming disasters which accompanied the earthquake at Ischia in July of last year. It would be appalling to imagine the fearful destruction of life that would take place in New York, with its twelve and fifteen-story buildings, were such an earthquake to visit it as other lands have experienced. Hitherto the city has been mercifully preserved, though the records of the daily press and our own observation remind us that its preservation is not due to its superior virtue. It has had no more severe shock than that of October 20th, 1870, which, like that of August 10th, did no material injury.

Science has as yet failed to account for these alarming motions of the earth's crust.

THE POPULAR NOTION

is that they are due to the contraction going on as the earth continues to cool, and the increasing tension following, when every difference of atmospheric or astronomical phenomena may have an influence. Another theory advanced is that they are caused by the movement of gases generated in the world's interior. But so complex is the phenomenon of earthquakes, that it has not yet been mastered.

To the Christian observer of the signs of the times, the earthquake recalls pre-eminently the thought of the nearing approach of Christ's Second Advent. True, the earthquakes since His ascension have been numerous, and in the past immeasurably more disastrous than in our times; but as we never sit down to the Lord's Supper without remembering the night of its institution, so the recurrence of these inexplicable and ominous phenomena bring again to the mind the of the Saviour: "There shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes, in divers places. And these are the beginnings of sorrows" (Matt. 24 : 7). All these have come and passed in the interval since those words were spoken; men have looked for His coming, and have died without the sight; but we know that that day will surely come, and that when it does come, it will be preceded by such phenomena. It is our duty to be ever waiting and watching. As rain must have fallen many a day while the ark was building, and have ceased, yet on one day the flood came, and only Noah and his family were saved. So that day will probably find men concerned in speculating on the scientific causes of some recent earthquake, and calculating its direction and its speed, paying no heed to the warning it was sent to convey.

Earthquakes will play an important part in the

TROUBLES THAT WILL COME

on the world after the watchful Church has been withdrawn—caught up to meet her Lord in the air. Zechariah speaks (14 : 4) of a reft in the Mount of Olives, which, when it occurs, will doubtless be attributed to an earthquake, and men will flee as they "fled from before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah." In Revelation also the seer of Patmos, writing of his visions, is careful to note that the woes were in many cases heralded or accompanied by an earthquake. As is opened, an earthquake takes place, which, in its appalling accompaniments, dwarfs all phenomena of the kind in the previous history of the world (Rev. 6 : 12). The sun will turn black and the moon crimson; stars will fall, and every mountain and island will be moved out of their places. Cyclones will be threatened, but will be held back by the four angels at the command of the angel ascending from the east bearing the seal of the living God. In a later chapter (Rev. 11 : 13) the same earthquake is again referred to, with the further information that the tenth part of the city will fall, and seven thousand men will be killed. But the greatest of all the earthquakes the world has ever seen will take place at the close of this dispensation, immediately prior to the ushering in of the Millennium. That will be when the Antichrist and his forces will be overwhelmed, and when Christ Himself will manifestly appear in glory with the angels. Then there will be "an earthquake such as was not since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great" (Rev. 16 : 18).

How near those appalling days may be none can say, but there are signs which indicate that they cannot be far removed from our time. Gradually but surely the nations of the world are being ranged in the lines in which they will stand—like pieces on the world's chess-board—at that time. The old Roman world is being reconstituted, and statesmen, with no design to fulfil prophecy, are making treaties and alliances which will realize the very

in their visions. Looking beneath the surface, we see, too, the spirit at work which will attain its culmination in those days of trouble. The spirit of impatience of restraint, of frantic longing for the form of liberty which is license, of hatred of the rich and resistance to constituted authority, the increase of communistic socialism, and the desperate schemes of plotters who are working to produce anarchy—all indicate the approach of the predicted era. They are the forces gathering strength, which will ultimately blaze forth with

FRIGHTFUL HORROR.

We are told in the Bible what they will do; we see with our own eyes that they are preparing for their work. They are called social problems now, and the philosophers try to solve them; but solved they never will be. They will grow more and more ominous, more and more intricate, until in the last great earthquake they and those who have hatched them are overwhelmed by the coming of the Prince of Peace.

Let not the memory of this earthquake pass into forgetfulness. It has a voice for the watchful Christian, reminding him of the signs of his deliverance. Unlike the earthquake Elijah felt, God is in the earthquake. Blessed are they who have recognized Him in "the still small voice" in which He speaks to those who love Him and have made full surrender of themselves to Him. They and only they have confidence in looking for His appearing, and can say with joyful hope, "Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly."

OUR FAMOUS WOMEN.

A VALUABLE work, under the above title, has been issued by Messrs. A. D. Worthington & Company, of Hartford, Conn. It contains the biographies of thirty distinguished ladies, some of whom have won fame by their pens, others by their philanthropic deeds. This book derives additional merit from the fact that the lives it contains are not all from the same pen. The editor has exercised conspicuous discretion in selecting authors as well as subjects. In each case, the lady whose life and character are sketched, was personally known to the writer selected to describe her. The reader thus gets reliable and accurate knowledge at first hand, and learns many interesting personal details, which only a personal acquaintance could have furnished. The result has been a work of warm living interest, giving a flesh-and-blood impersonation to names with which we were before familiar, but which have been before this to the general public mere abstractions. We knew these ladies had done great things, and we were proud to claim them as American ladies, but we only knew them by their works; now we are enabled to know them and honor them for themselves.

The book contains the portraits and lives of Louisa M. Alcott, Clara Barton, Rose Terry Cooke, Charlotte Cushman, Mary Clemmer, Mary Mapes Dodge, Mary A. Livermore, Lucy Larcom, Maria Mitchell, Lucretia Mott, Louise Chandler Moulton, Harriet Prescott Spofford, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, Mary Virginia Terhune ("Marion Harland"), Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney, and Frances E. Willard. Also lives of Susan B. Anthony, Catherine E. Beecher, Mary L. Booth, the Doctors Blackwell, Frances Hodgson Burnett, Lydia Maria Child, Margaret Fuller, Abby Hopper Gibbons, Julia Ward Howe, Clara Louise Kellogg, Elizabeth Prentiss, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Elizabeth Cady Stanton, and Anne Whitney.

The book is full of interesting anecdotes, from which we select a few as specimens of its general character.

The experience of

as a Government clerk is one of the most characteristic. She was taking a brief holiday in Washington after a severe ordeal as a teacher, when she became acquainted with a Government commissioner. "Just at this time, through the treachery of clerks, troubles had arisen in the Patent Office. Secrets had been betrayed, and great annoyance caused to inventors who had applied for patents. The commissioner was at a loss what to do, when Miss Barton was recommended to him as a person who could be trusted, and whose clear chirography and aptitude for business affairs well fitted her for the situation.

"Her services were at once secured. But although her new employment was less fatiguing than teaching, it was not without its trials. Hitherto male clerks only had been employed, and these men did not like to see their province invaded by a woman. They were perhaps the more displeased because they had brought her there by their own unfaithfulness, which could no longer profit them. They adopted the characteristic course of making her position as uncomfortable as they could, hoping to drive her from it by personal annoyance. They ranged themselves every morning in two rows against the walls of the long corridor through which she had to pass on her way to her desk, staring hard at her, and whistling softly as she went by. Miss Barton felt the insult keenly, but she determined to bear it for the sake of the principle involved. Day after day she passed through this ordeal, with her eyes upon the floor, seeing nothing of those two lines of indignant masculines but their boots.

"Failing to oust her in this way, they tried slander, but signally failed, her accusers instead of herself receiving their discharge. She suffered no further indignities of the kind, and remained in the Patent Office three years, doing her work so well that her books are still exhibited as models."

AN INSULT IN COLLEGE.

"Miss Elizabeth Blackwell went through an analogous experience when, as a pioneer of feminine study of surgery, she became a student in the college of Geneva, N. Y. It needed firm nerves to sit the one lady among the five hundred male students of the college, listening to the professors' lectures. She restricted herself for some time after her entrance into the college to a diet so rigid as almost to trench upon starvation, in order that no involuntary change of color might betray the feeling of embarrassment occasionally produced by the necessary plain-speaking of scientific analysis. . . .

"How necessary was this circumspection may be inferred from something which occurred in the lecture-room a short time after her admission. The subject of the lecture happened to be a very trying one; and while the lecturer was proceeding with his demonstration, a folded paper, evidently a note, was thrown down by some one in the upper tiers behind her, and fell upon her arm, where it lay, conspicuously white, upon the sleeve of her black dress. She felt, instinctively, that this note contained some gross impertinence, that every eye in the building was upon her, and that if she meant to remain in the college she must repel the insult, then and there, in such a way as to preclude the recurrence of any similar act. Without raising her eyes from her note-book, she continued to write, as though she had not perceived the paper; and when she had finished her notes she slowly lifted the arm on which it lay, until she had brought it clearly within view of every one in the building; and then, with a slight turn of the wrist, she caused the offensive missile to drop upon the floor. Her action, at once a protest and an appeal, was perfectly understood by the students, and in an instant the amphitheatre rang with their energetic applause, mingled with hisses directed against her cowardly assailant. Her position in the college was made from that moment, and not the slightest annoyance of the kind was ever again attempted throughout her stay."

A CHILD'S PROCESSION.

Mrs. Mary A. Livermore is distinguished preeminently as the friend of the poor, the penitent, and the distressed. A friend says of her: "It is doubtful if there is another woman of the day who is more sought by forlorn and friendless women—women needing comfort, encouragement, assistance; women bankrupt in character, charged with crime, and awaiting trial; women who are called 'outcast,' and who are on the verge of suicide—than Mrs. Livermore. It is literally true of her that never in her life has she turned away either man or woman who has sought her in distress.

"Pretty stories are told us of her childhood, which show how early this kindly sympathy was implanted in her soul. As she a little girl went to school she was followed by a procession of timid children, the weak, or sick, or poor and ill-dressed, or otherwise 'unfit,' who were worsted by the ridicule or insult of their rougher and tougher mates. Mary's presence was 'hands off' to the biggest bully, and protection to the feeblest of her dependents. She took the law into her own hands, and was judge, jury, and executioner to the unlucky boy who attempted any insult to her dubious procession of ragged and unkempt children."

PREACHING BY STRATAGEM.

Lucretia Mott was crossing the Atlantic after her visit to Europe, and on board the merchant vessel on which she was, there were a number of Irish emigrants. She desired to hold a service among them in the steerage. "But they objected. They would not hear a woman preach, for women priests were not allowed in the Church. But the Spirit that was pressing on 'the woman preacher' was not to be prevented from delivering its message. She asked that the emigrants might be invited to come together to consider with her whether they would have a meeting. That seemed fair and just, so they came.

"She explained to them how different her idea of a meeting was from a church service, to which they were accustomed; that she had no thought of saying anything derogatory to that service, nor of the priests who ministered to them; that her heart had been drawn to them in sympathy, as they were leaving their old home for the new one in America; and that she had wanted to address them as to their habits and aims in their every-day life in such a way as to help them in the land of strangers to which they were going. And then asking them if they would listen (and they were already listening, because they could not help it), she said she would give an outline of what she wanted to say at the meeting. She was drawn on by the silent sympathy she had secured, until the whole of the Spirit's message was delivered—and only the keenest-witted of her Romanist hearers waked up to the fact, as they were going out, that they had listened to the preaching of 'the woman priest' after all."

A PREACHER PROTECTED BY A LOADED CANNON.

Abby Hopper Gibbons, the prison philanthropist, was fond of relating an incident which encouraged her in her labors among desperate convicts. "Near the close of the last century Dr. Rogers, of Philadelphia, one of the committee of the first society formed in America for relieving the miseries of public prisons, proposed to address a religious exhortation to the prisoners on Sunday. The keeper assured him that his life would be in danger. If the convicts were allowed to assemble together, it was feared that they would overpower the guard and escape, to rob and murder as they went.

"The sheriff finally granted an order for the holding of religious services. But the warden obeyed it with fear and trembling, and actually ordered a loaded cannon to be planted near the clergyman, a gunner beside it with a lighted match, while the motley worshippers were ranged in solid column, directly in front of their grim threatener. This is believed to have been the first attempt ever made in America to hold Sunday services in a jail."

HOW TO LIVE A CENTURY.

A suggestive remark of Amos Bronson Alcott is quoted in the course of the sketch of his daughter, Louise May Alcott. "It was, I think," says the author, "in February, 1882, I stood under an umbrella, in a light snow, waiting for a horse-car. Mr. Alcott came by and stopped to speak to me, with that wise yet genial smile which always seemed like a benediction. He said a few friendly sentences, and then I spoke of his book of 'Sonnets and Canzonets,' and asked, 'How is it, Mr. Alcott, that at eighty-two you are so vigorous and strong, and with a poet's heart alive in you yet?'

"'It is,' he said, 'because I have kept the ten commandments. Men were meant to live a hundred years at least—only they have disobeyed the laws. Let us have several generations of people who live healthfully and keep the commandments, and we may have those who will be able to say, "I think I will not stop at a hundred years. I will live on."'"

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

NOTICE.

AT the commencement of the new volume on January 1st, 1885,

The Christian Herald

WILL BE

ENLARGED.

The size of the pages will be increased in length and width, so that fifteen pages will contain as much reading matter as is contained in sixteen pages of the present size. The price of the paper will not be increased.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Another Statement Respecting the Tariff has been issued by Mr. Nimmo, chief of the Bureau of Statistics. This is the first statement showing for a full year the value of merchandise entered for consumption and the duties collected thereon, under the operations of the tariff act of March 3d, 1883, that act having taken effect on the first day of July, 1883. Merchandise for the fiscal year ended June 30th, 1884, was 41.72 per cent, as against 42.65 per cent. This statement exhibits a fall of less than one per cent in the average rate of dutiable merchandise. It appears, however, that there has been a change in the foreign mode of shipping, by which cases and coverings are now excluded from the calculation. Taking that into account, Mr. Nimmo thinks the reduction would be equal to five per cent on the value of dutiable goods. It will be remembered that the Tariff Commissioners placed the rate of reduction at twenty per cent, and estimated the result at forty or fifty millions. The actual result was a reduction of less than twenty millions.

The Imminent Financial Disaster before the country, arising from the enforced coinage of silver dollars, is causing general alarm among financiers and statesmen. At the American Bankers' Convention, held at Saratoga last week, the Hon. Hugh McCullogh presented the danger in forcible language. He said: "By continuing to coin the silver dollar we are not increasing to any considerable extent the amount of metallic money in circulation. We are filling the Treasury with dollars for which there is no demand. Instead of increasing the circulating medium, we are doing what must eventually produce some contraction. Unless our policy is changed the Government will, erelong, be compelled to pay a part, if not the whole, of the interest on its bonds, and of the principal at maturity, in silver dollars. When this point is reached gold will no longer be a circulating medium in the United States. It will be virtually demonetized, and become an article of merchandise. It will be locked up by the banks, hoarded by the people, or sent abroad. This will be contraction of the severest and worst possible nature, the effects of which upon the national credit and upon all our manifold enterprises will be to the last degree damaging." Citizens who understand this peril ought to exact a promise from the candidate for Congress for whom they vote, that he will work for the repeal of this most baneful law.

Mr. Blaine has Taken a Wise Course in commencing suit against a newspaper for libel. He has instructed counsel to sue the Indianapolis Sentinel for damages for having published a statement charging him with immorality. He denounces the statement as "utterly and abominably false," both in its direct assertions and its implications. Mr. Blaine says: "I am sure that honorable Democrats alike with honorable Republicans will justify me in defending the honor of my family, if need be with my life." Mr. Blaine is right, though as this is not war time there is no need for him to put his life in peril. Every one will wish him success in his suit, and it may be hoped that his action will do something toward checking the tendency displayed by the press of both sides to make this a campaign of mud.

The First Month of Prohibition in Iowa has passed with encouraging results for the temperance party, the Iowa correspondent of the Advance thus answers the question everywhere asked, "Does prohibition prohibit?" "It does wherever public sentiment demands it, and a fair trial can be secured. Saloons in the large river towns are run in defiance of the law, though it is asserted that in Burlington there have been several convictions and not more than half a dozen saloons are open. Here in Des Moines there is an evident determination to enforce the law. Several of the saloon-keepers have quit the business entirely. Others sell ginger ale and pop. Others are vending whiskey, wine, and beer, but secretly, and with one eye on the sheriff. Several arrests have been made, and so far every one has been convicted. On the whole, the outlook is favorable. Though the law has its defects, the temperance people can make it an instrument of which the saloon-keepers are afraid. The end is not yet. The fight will be a bitter one, but the cause is of God, and will go on."

Ex-Governor St. John's Statement of the claims the Prohibition party has on the support of the people, deserves the careful attention of Christian patriots. Speaking on August 14th at the Lyon's Camp Meeting, at Rochester, N. Y., he said: "All political power is inherent in the people, and the people propose to use it to protect their homes against the destructive influence of the 175,000 legalized saloons in this country. No evil to-day is so great as the liquor traffic. It is guilty of every crime known in the catalogue of crimes. It robs the poor of their money and the nation of its honor and manhood. It destroys homes, stuffs ballot-boxes, scoffs at virtue, and revels in vice. It has no conscience and knows no God, and ought to be condemned by the laws of the land. The Prohibitionists present to the country the only living issue of the hour that reaches the heart and conscience of the people, and they propose to press the matter until this measure is triumphant and blesses every home in the land. The political party, in the face of this great evil, that is afraid to stand up for the right ought to be and will be beaten. You say you do not want to throw away your vote. Remember that no vote was ever lost that was cast for a principle. Let it not be forgotten that the party or individual that dies battling for the right goes down with the blessed promise of a glorious resurrection. Prohibition is right, God is just, and the victory is sure to come."

General B. F. Butler's Address to the Irish-Americans in Boston, on August 14th, reveals the reason to those who did not know it before, why he has changed from party to party, and why comparatively so few people have any confidence in him, in spite of his conspicuous abilities. General Butler, in the course of his address, said: "As there is a God of nations and a God of battles, there can be but one outcome in Ireland—either freedom, or some hill which will be named Bunker Hill the second. We have a Government ready to stand by the rights of American citizens everywhere. There has been some difficulty about this. It is not impossible, with the blessing of God and the votes of the people, that we may find a Chief Executive somewhere who will improve matters." The only Irish-Americans who in visiting Great Britain require protection are the men who mix needle-points in the feed of horses and cattle, and who carry dynamite to explode in thoroughfares crowded with inoffensive people. All other Irish-Americans visit their native country with impunity, and need no protection from America. If General Butler desires the election of a President who would protect cowardly murderers, the less he says about "the blessing of God" the better. It is an ignoble way of angling for the Irish vote.

The Murderous Affray in Tennessee, Resulting from public hostility to the Mormon missionaries, cannot be justly regarded as a religious persecution, although that is the aspect in which Mormon sympathizers represent it. It was a lawless attempt to resist the spoliation of homes. During the past four years emissaries from Utah have been working in Lewis, Hickman, and Wayne counties, and they succeeded in making converts, in spite of the opposition of the general public. On August 10th a Mormon service was being held at Cane Creek, Lewis County, when a band of masked men, armed, appeared at the doors. The two men guarding the entrance to the meeting were killed, but not until one of the attacking party had also been shot. Two Mormon elders were shot down, and it is believed that a third, who was chased into the woods, was also killed. The perpetrators of this crime ought not to escape punishment. Their act was lawless and barbarous, and the State will be disgraced if they are not called to account for it. The fact that Mormonism is responsible for the Mountain Meadow Massacre and numberless other crimes does not justify retaliation in kind. If the citizens honestly desire to prevent the Mormon impostors deluding their daughters, there are legal ways of doing it, one of which is to send a different class of men to Congress.

Miss Clara Barton, the President of the American Association of the Red Cross, has been appointed by President Arthur to represent the United States at the International Convention of the Red Cross to be held at Geneva, Switzerland, on September 1st. She sailed on August 16th on the steamer City of Chester. Miss Barton anticipates a busy time at the convention. She said: "The questions to be discussed are important and interesting. We shall consider the training of nurses in the time of peace and all sanitary questions connected with service in the field; the relation in time of war between the military authorities and the societies; the means to be employed for establishing the identity of killed and wounded; the preparation of additional articles to the convention of Geneva conceived in the spirit of those of 1868; and the measures to be taken by the societies to prevent the abuse of the Red Cross badges. There are in all twenty-one important questions to be discussed."

The Work of the Civil Service League is not ended by the reforms effected by the Pendleton law. At the annual meeting of the League at Newport, R. I., Mr. George William Curtis said: "The immediate duty of the year before us is to urge to completion the repeal of the four years' laws, to secure the passage of other State reform bills, and to carry the reformed system still further into the municipal service. Unprecedented progress has been made in all these directions; but until this reform of administrative methods has become as much the irrevocable national and State policy as the personal freedom and equality before the law of every citizen, the work of this League and of the associations is not finished."

Another Bank Wreck, the Work of the Cashier, was announced on August 11th. Before the opening of business on that morning a notice was posted on the doors of the Wall Street Bank, in New York, that, owing to "irregularities" on the part of the cashier, the bank would remain closed until matters were investigated. It was stated that the deficiency amounted to half a million, which the cashier had misappropriated. He had absented himself from business, and the deficiency was discovered in his absence. He has not been found. It would appear that the bank directors have long been engaged in a risky business, of which one feature was the over-certification of cheques, and since the bank was taken out of the national system the practice has been extended. In a business of that kind the cashier's irregularities are not easily discovered. It is hoped that the depositors, who have in all about a million there, will not lose. The failure, however, inflicts another blow on public confidence, which has not yet recovered from the recent panic. Directors appear to forget that in failing to perform the duties of their position they deceive the people whom their names attract to the concern they are supposed to manage.

The Children's Missionary Ship, the Morning Star, launched on August 6th, will, it is expected, be ready for her trial trip on September 10th. She has been chartered to Honolulu, and Captain Bray hopes to start thither in her in November. She will carry sufficient freight to pay the expenses of the voyage. The ship's dimensions are: length, 131 feet 3 inches; beam, 29 feet 9 inches; depth, 12 feet 2 inches; gross tonnage, 471. Her engine is to be of 150 horse-power; masts, 3; rate of speed, 7 knots per hour. This is the largest steamer ever built for missionary uses. Her tonnage is 471.05. The carved figure-head upon her prow is a woman holding an open Bible in her left hand and pointing to it with the index finger of her right. On the stern is a large silver star, with golden rays shooting out from it, over which is the name, Morning Star, and beneath it, Boston, Mass. Several friends of Captain Bray have thoughtfully provided for his comfort and that of his wife, who sails with him, and of the missionaries who will be the passengers on the Morning Star on her voyages, by making useful presents as additions to the ship's equipment. Among them is a fine organ.

The Effort being Made by Herr Most and his friends to canonize Stellmacher should not be misunderstood by the workingmen. At the crowded meeting held in New York on August 11th, the chairman described Stellmacher as "a workingman, and therefore a noble man and an honest man." Workingmen of intelligence would consider that remark flattery; they know enough of their companions to be aware that there are workingmen who are neither noble nor honest, though happily the majority are both. Herr Most told them that they should honor Stellmacher's memory, should regard him as being enshrined in a Pantheon, and should swear eternal allegiance to his principles. The fact is that Stellmacher had no principles. He was a base, cowardly murderer, who, having committed two murders at least, was caught, tried, and executed in Vienna the other day. He was a worse man than Guiteau, who, in his wrong-headed, idiotic way, had an idea that he was somehow serving his country. Herr Most prophesied that Europe would some day be a group of republics, without a crowned head on the whole continent. He may be right; prophecy leads us to expect such a state of affairs; but we are warned that it will be of short duration, and will develop a despot more tyrannical, remorseless, and wicked than the world has yet seen—the Antichrist—whom Jesus will destroy at His coming.

The American and Foreign Christian Union, whose appeal for aid in the evangelization of France was recently mentioned in these columns, is, we learn, actively engaged in planting churches in various districts in which the pure Gospel has not been preached. The work being performed by Mr. McAll and other pioneers is through its efforts deepened, extended, and rendered permanent. The most cordial sympathy exists between the American and the English missions, as both are working for the same object and the same Master; but the modes of operation are different, and the missions are entirely distinct. Dr. Safford, of 43 Bible House, will be pleased to receive subscriptions and furnish information respecting the work.

An Interesting Scene was Witnessed Recently at Jerry McAuley's Cremorne Mission. Mr. Sutherland, better known by his old "stage name" of Senator Bob Hart, heard, during a visit to Boston, where he went to labor among his former theatrical associates, that an actor with whom he had played in the days before his conversion, had fallen into dissolute ways. He promised to seek the man out and try to lead him to Jesus. His efforts were fruitless; the man was not to be found. The matter preyed upon his mind, and one day he spent a long season in prayer to God that he might find his friend. That night, as he was on his way to Cremorne, he met him, and led him in triumph into the mission. There Mr. Sutherland and Jerry McAuley prayed for him until he was brought to his knees to pray for himself.

At the Meeting of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, held at Ocean Grove, N. J., on August 5th, Mrs. Whittenmeyer forcibly presented the Prohibition argument by referring to the state of public opinion in Maine and of the subterfuges to which men resort to evade the law. She said: "When the liquor traffic hides in coffins and ash pans you may be sure that the law in Maine does prohibit. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union has been lifting, little by little, this great burden from the people. Railroads and large corporations are calling for total abstainers, offering thereby a premium on total abstinence. We want to go down to the bed-rock and put Prohibition into the Constitutions of the States."

An Effort to Circulate Dr. Deems's Address to the School of Christian Philosophy, among the people of India, is being made. Among the audience listening to Dr. Deems at Key East was the Indian Methodist preacher, Baboo Ram Chandra Boze, whose portrait and life, appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 31, 1880. When Dr. Deems concluded, the Indian was so impressed with the clearness with which the speaker had set forth the condition of religion in this and other Christian lands that he said: "I could not but feel that if his discourse were published and circulated among educated natives in India it would do good, as these young men are being brought by gross misrepresentations to the erroneous belief that Christianity is dying in Christendom. I therefore stood up, stated my convictions, and requested the Institute to arrange to have it printed here, and circulated in India along with other select papers read under the auspices of the Institute." The Institute is without funds for the purpose, but it is thought that friends of Christian missions would subscribe for the project indicated by the Indian preacher. Sixty dollars were given on the spot. Subscriptions should be sent to Mr. Charles M. Davis, 4 Winthrop Place, New York.

UNDERSTANDEST THOU WHAT THOU READEST?

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And Philip ran thither to him, and heard him read the prophet Esaias, and said, Understandest thou what thou readest? And he said, How can I, except some man should guide me? And he desired Philip that he would come up and sit with him."—ACTS 8: 30-33.

A Remarkable Coincidence—Occurred by God's Directions—A Wild Young Man Converted—Hope of Reading Men—The Curse of Bad Books—Philip's Outspokenness—A Reciprocation of Intrusion—I. The Most Important Thing to be Understood—Contained in Philip's Text—II. The Test of Understanding—An Old Minister's Opinion of Unitarians—Signs of the Ethiopian's Conversion—Desire for Baptism—Rejoicing—A Student's Question—Bengel's Visitor—III. How to Obtain Understanding.

How this negro chamberlain of the Queen of Ethiopia came to be a proselyte we do not know. The book which he was so fond of reading may have been the means of leading him to worship the God of Abraham; certainly it has answered that purpose thousands of times. At any rate, he followed the light he had, and though he had not yet come to the full glory of Christianity, it was more than probable that he would do so, because he was evidently prepared to follow truth wherever her flaming torch should lead the way. Oh, that there were more candor among men in these latter days, and less of the prejudice which puts scales upon the eyes of the mind!

Having become a proselyte to the faith of Israel, the eunuch made a long and perilous journey to Jerusalem. After he had enjoyed the solemn feast he returned; and while he travelled along he read the Word of God. The book of the prophet Isaiah was the portion chosen for his meditation. Does it not strike you as being remarkable that he should be reading at that moment the best text that Philip could have selected? He had reached a portion of Scripture from which, without the slightest digression, the evangelist preached unto him Jesus as the slain lamb, the willing sacrifice for guilty men. The like and the Holy Spirit constantly occurs in conversions. What the man has read in the book, the preacher is often moved by the Spirit of God to declare from the pulpit; for God has servants everywhere, and His secret directions are given out, so that all these servants, though they are little aware of it, are led to work together for the same predestined end. How often have the talks of young men by the wayside been reproduced by the preacher, and such singular coincidences have struck their attention, and been the means of impressing their hearts! God grant there may be something of that kind tonight—I know there will be. Into this place years ago there strayed a wild young man; he heard me preach, he believed in Jesus, and he has long been an honored deacon of a suburban church. Are there not other men here to whom the like salvation shall come?

This eminent nobleman is reading. That is a commendable occupation; reading is in itself somewhat of a hopeful sign. In these days we need hardly exhort young men to read. "Give attendance to reading," said the wise Apostle Paul, and that was excellent advice for Timothy. Let all Christian men

BE READING MEN.

But, then, Philip's question contains these words, "what thou readest," and that suggests a necessary inquiry. I am afraid much that is read nowadays had far better be left unread. Multitudes of books are fruits of an accursed tree—the tree of evil knowledge, which is watered by the rivers of perdition. The fruits of this upas tree will yield no benefit to the minds that feed thereon, but much of solemn damage, by perverting the judgment or polluting the imagination. Souls have been ruined to all eternity by reading a vile book. Count it no trifle to have heard bad language; but count it a more serious evil to have read a bad book which has wounded your soul, and left a scar upon your conscience. The writer of an evil book is a deliberate poisoner, secretly pouring death into the wells from which men drink. The printers and publishers of such works are accomplices in the crime.

It was a very sharp-pointed question that Philip put to this gentleman. He made honest and earnest use of a rare opportunity for reaching one of the upper ten. We find it tolerably easy to put questions to a man who is poor, but how shall we approach the rich? We have sermons for the working-classes, and it would be a fair and useful thing to have sermons for the House of Peers, and evangelistic addresses for the Commons! Are there any bigger sinners anywhere than you might find in those two chambers? The rich are neither better nor worse than the poor; the various classes have bad and good in each of them, in much the same proportion. I am persuaded that there are noble lords and honorable gentlemen who would be all the better for a little teaching upon the things of the kingdom of God; for instance, it might do many of them good to hear a plain sermon from, "Ye must be born again." Why is it that we are so apt to be plain spoken with working-men, and not with their employers? I admire Philip for his

to the royal treasurer. I fear the world can seldom charge the Church with being too violent in its appeals. Look at what the ungodly will do to us. Where can you live in a street of London, especially in this part of the town, without having night made hideous with their loud licentious songs and shouts? They force upon us their irreligion; may we not introduce our religion in return? If we go up to a man straight away, and speak to him in the name of Christ, perhaps he will say, "You intrude." Well, we are not the only people that intrude, for many intrude their filthy tongues upon us as we go down the streets, and force their infidelity upon us in the daily prints. The world sets the fashion, and if we follow its customs it has no right to complain.

This was the question, "Understandest thou what thou readest?" Ah, my brothers, you and I have need to understand the Bible. I will suppose you read it—let me hope I am not mistaken; but when you read it, do labor, above all things, to understand it. The Bible was meant to be understood, and it benefits us in proportion as we get at the meaning of it. The mere words of Scripture passing over the ear or before the eye can do us little good. I heard a person say once, concerning a great doctrine which I hold to be very plainly taught in Scripture, that he had read the Bible through—I think he said six times—on his knees, but he could not find that doctrine. I replied, "Brother, that is an awkward position in which to read the Bible. I should have sat upon a chair, and studied the page in a natural and easy posture. Moreover, I should not have galloped through it at the rate at which you must have raced over the chapters. I should rather have read a little at a time, and tried to understand it."

'Understandest thou what thou readest?" that is the question. Desiring to press that matter upon you, I am going to speak upon three questions somewhat briefly. The first is, What is most essential to be understood in this Book? secondly, What is the test of a man's understanding it? and, lastly, What can be done to obtain such a desirable understanding?

I. What, then, is

to be understood in this Book? I do verily believe that it is contained in the passage which the eunuch was reading. It is a very singular passage. A section of the Bible begins at Isaiah 53, and goes onward through several chapters. The passage from which Philip's text was taken contains the most essential thing for every young man to know. Let him know and understand the sixth verse of the fifty-third of Isaiah; it begins with "all" and ends with "all;" therefore carry it in your memories—"All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." What is wanted is that we first understand that we have all gone astray. He who does not know that he has gone astray will not care for the Shepherd who comes to fetch him back again. Christ did not come to save you because you are good, for you are not good; nor because you have merit, for you have no merit. He would not have come to save you if you had possessed merit. Why should He? There would have been no need. I hear rattling down the street at a great pace, and I wonder where he is going. It never occurs to me that he is rushing to call upon a hale and hearty man. I am persuaded that he is hastening to see one who is very ill, perhaps one in dying circumstances, otherwise he would not drive so fast. It is just so with Jesus Christ. When He is hurrying on the wings of the wind to rescue a child of man, I am sure that the soul He visits is sick with the malady of sin, and that the Physician is making haste because the disease is developing into corruption and death. He came not "to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance."

THE DOCTOR'S BROUGHAM

"Who rightly would his alms dispose
Must give them to the poor;
None but the wounded patient knows
The comforts of a cure."

Jesus will not waste His grace on those who are already good. "He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich He hath sent empty away."

Oh, that you would also understand the second half of Isaiah's verse, "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all"! There is more in that statement than in all the teachings of Aristotle; there is more truth worth knowing in that one sentence than in all the books of the Alexandrian Library. The Lord Jehovah lifted up the sin of man, and deliberately laid it upon His dear Son. His Son, willingly bearing that load as our Substitute, went up to the tree, and there He bore what was due for all that weight of sin, even the penalty of darkness, desertion, and death. By bearing the chastisement He put away sin, and hurled it into His own sepulchre, wherein it is buried forever. Now, every man who believes in Jesus may know that his sin was laid upon Christ, and borne by Christ, and put away by Christ. A thing cannot be in two places at one time. If my sin was laid on Christ, it is no longer laid on me. I sometimes think if men did but understand this they would be sure to accept the Lord Jesus.

I heard of

who went to visit one of his poor people. He heard that she was in deep poverty, and therefore he went to take her help. When he came to her house, he could not make anybody hear, though he knocked loud and long. Seeing her some time after, he said, "Janet, I knocked at your door with help for you, but you did not hear me." "What time did you come, sir?" said she. "It was about twelve o'clock." "Oh," she said, "I did hear you, sir, but I thought it was the man calling for the rent." Just so. Men do hear the calls of Christ, but they are wilfully deaf, because they think He wants them to do something. But He does not want anything of you; He wants you to receive what He has already done.

II. What is

of a man's understanding his Bible, and of understanding this passage in it?

I answer that the test of a man's understanding this important part of Scripture is that Jesus Christ is everything to him: for Philip, who did understand it, when he explained it, preached unto the eunuch Jesus and nothing else. I try with all my might to preach my Lord Jesus Christ, and I love to meet with people who delight in this theme. Certain critics call upon us to preach something fresh. This also will I do, for I will preach Jesus, and He is always fresh: there is nothing stale in Him, He has forever the dew of His youth.

It may be said, "But new doctrines are brought out continually." Yes, but they grow stale in a month; they are a poor kind of Covent-Garden stuff, and need to be carted away quickly, else they decay. I have lived to see a score or more sorts of modern theology; they all come and go, but Jesus Christ remains the same yesterday, to-day, and forever.

If you have Jesus Christ, you have everything—top, bottom, and middle as well. Have Christ, and nothing else but Christ. You will not be in safety if you rest without having a firm hold of Jesus, the divine Saviour. "Well," says one, "but what do you make of Socinians and Unitarians?" I come to the same conclusion about them as did who was greatly grieved to see a Socinian chapel erected opposite his own. One of his deacons said, "This is a dreadful thing—this opposition shop that has been opened on the other side of the road!" "I don't call it opposition at all," said the minister. The deacon exclaimed, "Why, they are Unitarians; they don't preach the Godhead of Christ!" The old man said, "If you kept a baker's shop, and another man were to open an ironmongery business opposite you, that would not be opposition, for he would be in quite another line. Those who do not preach the deity of Christ are in an altogether different business. If you want ironmongery you may go to them; but if you want the bread of heaven you must look to the Lord Jesus, the Son of the Highest." So if you want to understand the Scripture, test yourself by this: Is Jesus Christ everything to you?

I like this eunuch for proposing that he should be baptized. He was not advised to do so, but he proposed it himself, and gave himself up to his Lord and Master to do the Lord's bidding at once, the providence of God having provided water that he might there and then fulfil his Master's command. Young man, whichever way the Scripture bids you to God, set you to work about it, and let it be done at once. Find out what is the Scriptural way, and then follow it without delay, surrendering yourself wholly to the Lord; you have not read the Scriptures with understanding unless you do that.

The next thing is, if you have read the Scriptures with a clear understanding, they have made you glad, for this eunuch "went on his way rejoicing." The man who gets up from reading his Bible, and says, "I am a believer in Jesus; what a solemn thing it is!" and then goes forth with a pious resolution that he will make everybody as miserable as he can all the day long, wants converting again. The faith of the Scriptures leads joy by the hand, and chases away despair.

I think you have not understood the Bible unless it makes you care about the salvation of others; for this Ethiopian nobleman, when he got home, I have no doubt, spread the Gospel throughout his native land; he was, probably, the founder of the Abyssinian Church. If any young man reads this Book aright, he becomes large-hearted; he cannot hold his soul within the narrow bound of his ribs, but his great heart looks out to see where it can scatter benefits. If thou canst let another man be damned without an effort, I fear that such will be thine own end; if thou canst be quiet when thou believest thy brother is on the brink of eternal ruin, I fear thou art on the brink of ruin thyself. One of the holiest instincts born in a renewed man is that of longing to save others.

You have read this Book so as to understand it, if your message to others is what the message was to you—Christ, Christ, Christ, Christ. You have nothing else to employ as the means of good, except the salvation of Jesus, and there is nothing else worth telling. I heard of a congregation the other day that was so very small that hardly any one came to listen to the preacher. Instead of blaming himself, and preaching better, the minister said he thought he was not doing much good by sermons and prayer-meetings, and therefore he would found a club, and if the fellows came in, and played draughts, that might do them good. What a lot of that sort of thing is now being tried! We are going to convert souls on are we? Are we also to have a substitute for bread? and healthier drink than pure water? We cannot save men by faith in Jesus Christ, and so it seems we are going to try new dodges of our own. We shall reap small, scant sheaves from such wretched seed.

A young man said to another the other day, "I am going down to preach at So-and-so; what sort of people are they there? What kind of doctrine will suit them?" Having heard of the question, I gave this advice, "You preach Jesus Christ, and that will suit them, I am sure; if they are learned people it will suit them; if they are ignorant it will suit them—God blessing it." When the great Biblical critic, Bengel, was dying, he sent for a young theological student, to whom he said, "I am low in spirit; say something good to cheer me." "My dear sir," said the student, "I am so insignificant a person, what can I say to a great man like yourself?" "But if you are a student of theology," said Bengel, "you ought to have a good word to say to a dying man; pray say it without fear." "Well, sir," said he, "what can I say to you, but that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin?" Bengel said, "Give me your hand, young man; that is the very word I wanted." A simple Gospel text is the word which every man needs who is in fear of divine wrath, and he may be sitting next to you at this moment, or he is in the same house of business with you, and needs that you should tell him about Christ.

III. Now in a few words I want to answer the question,

WHAT CAN BE DONE

to obtain such a desirable understanding of the Scriptures? "I read the Bible," says one, "and get a great deal puzzled over it." Let me advise that when you read a passage in the Scriptures which you do not understand, you should read it until you do. "I should have to read often." Well, that would not hurt you. "But suppose I never understand it?" Keep on reading it all the same. "Can passages of Scripture which we do not understand do us any good when we read them?" Yes; they gradually filter into our souls; by long considering them out of them. Here is a little boy whose father is an artisan, and uses a great many technical terms when talking about his work. The boy is apprenticed to the trade, and wants to know all about it, and therefore he listens to his father, and when the day is over he says to himself, "I heard my father say a great deal, but I do not understand much of it." "But you did understand a little of it?" "Oh, yes." To that little he is faithful, and day by day he adds to his store of information, learning more by the help of that which he already knows. He hears his father talk again the next day, and still he does not understand much; but at last, by hearing the terms often, and by meditating upon them, light breaks in, and at length he can talk like his father, using the same words with understanding. So I have found it. When I do not comprehend a chapter, I say, This is probably comprehensible; I will therefore hear my great Father speak, even if I do not understand at first what He may say to me, and I will keep on hearing Him until at last I grasp His meaning.

Next, be sure to pray for the enlightenment of the Holy Spirit. If you want to understand a book, and you find difficulties in it, do as I have done on several occasions with my contemporaries—write and ask them what they mean by their language. I have in this way obtained much valuable information. Can we do that with the Bible? Assuredly we can if we know how to pray. Remember that you can also go to the Maker of your mind, and He can open it to receive the truth. The Holy Spirit has a wonderful power in clearing the intellect. You shall study for a month and make no headway; but you shall pray to God about a spiritual truth, and it shall be clear to you in a minute. There are multitudes of instances in which men have turned dark problems over and over again in their minds, and have never solved them by their own mental efforts; but one flash of divine light has made everything bright as noonday.

I would earnestly entreat every man who desires to understand the Bible to consider at this moment of his natural condition, and the way of salvation from it. You are lost, dear friend. If you are an unconverted man you are still lost, and you cannot save yourself; it is impossible that you should. You may have heard the story of that philosopher who was once on the roof of a house, when suddenly behind him came a strong man with a huge whip, and told him to jump down to the ground. Certain death would have been the result. The man was a lunatic. The philosopher perceived that terrible fact in a moment, and so he very wisely said, "Well, you see, any fool can jump down; the grand thing would be to jump up. Let us go down and jump up." They went down, but they never jumped up, for the gentleman thus escaped.

Are there not some here who are jumping down? some young men who are taking a desperate leap to one sin or another? Any fool can jump down; but if any of you are already down, I defy you to jump up again. No, you need a greater power than your own before you can ascend the heights of holiness. If you have tried to jump up, I know, young man, you have fallen back in despair. Easy is the descent to hell, the gravitation of our nature tends that way; but to retrace our steps, this is the word, this is the difficulty. Turn that over in your mind, and say, "If there be salvation to be had, since I cannot work out my own rescue without divine grace, I will trust in Jesus." Oh, that you would seek His grace at once!

When you are about it, dear young friend, I beseech you to trust Christ out and out. When I was a lad I heard a preacher say that Christ gave to His sheep eternal life, and that they should never perish; for He would keep them to the end. This charmed me. I longed to find this sure salvation. I thought within myself, "I know James So-and-so, and Tom So-and-so, who went up to London, and who were about a year older than I, and they, within half a dozen years, were as far gone in vice as well could be. They were better boys when they were at school than I was, and yet they went to the bad. I may go and do the same thing as they did unless I get this eternal salvation. I may lose my situation, or be found pilfering, or something of that sort, for I have as bad a heart as they have." I looked upon salvation as a which would guarantee my character. So I tried the promise, and now, at the age of fifty, I place myself under the care of the Lord Jesus as I did at the age of fifteen; He has kept me to this day, and I believe He will never let me go, however long I may live.

Oh, young man, give yourself up to that dear pierced hand wholly and heartily! Let your motto be, "Jesus only." Trust Christ a little, and yourself a little, and, like a man who plants one foot on the rock and the other on the quicksand, you will go down. Trust in Him alone, and He will hold you fast. If Jesus does not save me, I shall be lost, for I cannot save myself. It is His business to save me, for both by name and office He is Jesus, the Saviour; and I rest quite happily in Him.

When we meet in heaven we shall praise the Lord for making us understand what we read. God bless you all, for Christ's sake. Amen.

THE NEW PRESIDENT OF THE WESLEYAN CONFERENCE.

The Rev. Frederic Greeves, D.D., whose portrait appears on the next page, is the newly-appointed President of the Wesleyan Methodist Conference in Great Britain. He is the youngest son of the late Rev. John Greeves, who was also a Wesleyan minister, and was beloved and honored in his various spheres of labor during a course of thirty years. Frederick was born at Bedford, in the year 1833, and is now fifty-one years of age. He was sent at an early age to Kingswood School, the ancient seminary which John Wesley founded, and where successive generations of Wesleyan ministers' children have laid the foundation of a sound and useful education. The same institution, transferred to a more suitable building and to a beautiful situation in the neighborhood of Bath, is still maintained by the Wesleyans. Frederic Greeves spent a youth of earnest and happy toil, partly in learning and partly in teaching others. He was early converted through the instrumentality of his elder brother John, to whom, in his presidential speech on July 22d, he acknowledged his indebtedness for much of his success.

Almost from the commencement of his religious life he was drawn toward the work of the ministry. His youthful efforts in the Kentish villages were so acceptable and so successful, that few who were brought in contact with him could doubt that a career of eminent usefulness lay before him. The Wesleyan Conference in 1854 accepted him as a Probationer for the office and work of the ministry; and his first appointment, made in 1855, when he was in his twenty-second year, evidenced their confidence in the reports they had heard of his character and his capacity; he was stationed at Paris to minister to residents and visitors, both English and American. Subsequently his life has been that of a Wesleyan minister, in what may be technically called "the full work." He has spent eighteen years in six different London circuits, and he has labored with remarkable success in Bradford, in Oxford, and in Newcastle-upon-Tyne. Everywhere his public ministry has been highly valued by the people, and it has been eminently honored by the Head of the Church, both in the conversion of sinners and in the culture and the edification of the Church of God.

In pastoral work he has been peculiarly happy and successful, and the combination of distinguished pulpit ability, with personal attractiveness of character and of manners, gives him a powerful influence for good in his intercourse with the people. As a careful and diligent student, a ripe scholar, a sound theologian, a genial but firm disciplinarian, and an elegant and chaste speaker, he has adorned every position to which he has been appointed. It was, therefore, no surprise to his brethren in England when they learned, in the summer of 1883, that the Victoria University of Canada had conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Divinity. Shortly afterward, when Mr. Clarence Smith was elected one of the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, that gentleman appointed the Rev. Frederic Greeves, D.D., as his chaplain during his year of office. In that capacity he has often had to appear in public, and to address meetings, not only of Methodists, but citizens also, at the Mansion House and elsewhere, and in the efficient performance of that duty he has not been surpassed. Dr. Greeves is the youngest of four brothers, three of whom are Wesleyan ministers, while the fourth is a beneficed clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of York.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

The Receipt of Conscience Money is often acknowledged by advertisement of the Secretary of the Treasury. The fund had its origin in the war, when a quartermaster in the army sent $1500, of which he said he had defrauded the Government. During the twenty years that have elapsed since then $250,000 have been sent to the Secretary in the same way. Last year he received over $6000. The largest contribution ever made was $4000, forwarded by an ex-revenue gauger from Chicago, as the amount of a bribe received by him from distillers who desired to defraud the Government. The smallest was nine cents, forwarded by a Massachusetts man who remembered that he had at one time, years before, used a mashed three-cent stamp on a letter. In order to relieve his conscience he sent three times the original steal, which he thought was a fair compensation. Many of these contributions come from persons who have smuggled goods. The fund is a standing testimony to the power of conscience, as it may be supposed that in all cases there was no dread of detection. The same power is exercised when the Holy Spirit enlightens the conscience as to our relations toward God and the consciousness that restitution is impossible would often lead to despair did not the same Divine Person point to the sacrifice of Christ as an atonement already made (Rom. 3 : 25).

A Life was Sacrificed in a Vain Attempt to save that of a brother recently at Nescopeck, Penn. Three men, two of whom were brothers, were engaged on August 7th in digging a well. One of them, named Solomon Slosser, following his usual custom, seized the rope of the windlass, and was rapidly lowered into the well. Just as he reached the bottom, however, he fell from the rope, and lay motionless at the bottom. His brother Frank instantly started to his rescue, not fully comprehending the danger, and he, too, was overcome by the noxious gas, and fell to the bottom. David, the other man at work, then procured assistance, and taking the precaution to tie the rope round his body, started down ; but before he reached the bottom his hold was seen to relax, and he, too, fell off, but was drawn up to the surface again by those above. He was unconscious, and it was hours before he could speak. Grappling irons were procured, and the bodies of the two brothers raised to the surface. They were found clasped in each other's arms, and so firm was their grasp that great force was necessary to separate them. It is a pathetic picture of brotherly affection, but it was a useless sacrifice. It is a type of the condition of the human race when God sent His Son unto the world for its redemption. No man could, even at the sacrifice of himself, save even those whom he loved dearly enough to die for them. Only God Himself could deliver (Ps. 49 : 7).

The Penitent Proprietor of Armory Hall, New York, familiarly known as Billy McGlory, does not appear to have profited by his six months' seclusion on the island. He admits that he believes his half year's enforced abstention from liquor has added six years to his life, but he informed a reporter of the Times that he intends returning to his old pursuits and reopening his old resort with more than its former unsavory attractions. Evidently the penitence he professed to the temperance president who dealt with him was either short-lived or hypocritical from the outset. It may be hoped that the authorities will show their concern for the morals of the city by thwarting Mr. McGlory's designs (II Peter 2 : 22).

JOHN WESLEY AND THE HIGHWAYMAN.

(See Illustration on this page.)

John Wesley was once stopped by a highwayman, who demanded his money or his life. Mr. Wesley, after giving him the money, said, "Let me speak one word with you ; the time may come when you will regret the course of life in which you are now engaged. Remember this—'The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin.'" No more was said, and they parted.

Many years after, as Mr. Wesley was going out of a church, in which he had been preaching, a stranger introduced himself, and asked Wesley if he remembered being robbed at such a time. He said he recollected it. "I was that man," said the stranger ; "and that single verse you quoted on that occasion was the means of a total change in my life and practice. I have long since been in the habit of attending the house of God, and profiting by His Word, and trust that I am a Christian."

A WELSH IMMIGRANT'S MOTHER.

"May I speak to the boss?" said a quiet youth of about eighteen, as he presented himself at the door of the office in a large manufactory during the men's dinner hour.

"All right, you can go right in."

David Owen availed himself of the permission, and entered the private room of the head of the firm.

David was a good, steady workman, who had been about six months in his present employment, and was noted for his frugality and industry. He never drank beer, and his clothes, though always scrupulously clean, were of the cheapest material and well worn. He was an immigrant—English, some said, but never in David's presence without correction. "No, sir," he would say, with emphasis, "I am from Wales."

"Well, Owen, what is it?" asked Mr. Blank, the head of the firm, when David Owen presented himself.

"I am, as you know, sir, a stranger in America," said David. "I don't understand your banks and brokers, but I want to send some money to the old country, and you have been so kind to me that I thought perhaps you would show me how to send it so as it would surely reach my father and mother."

"Certainly, Owen, certainly," said Mr. Blank. "You had better buy a bank bill. You don't know what it is, I see. Well, we will do it for you. Write your father's name and address here, and leave your money, and Mr. Jewell will see to it for you. I'm glad to see you are a good son."

David placed a little pile of dollar bills on his employer's desk, wrote his father's name and address on the slip of paper handed to him, and, thanking Mr. Blank heartily, went his way. After that, regularly every month, David Owen took ten or twelve dollars into the office for Mr. Blank to send to the old folks. Mr. Blank was one of those kindly employers who do not regard their men simply as "hands," and know them only by their number. He became interested in this Welsh lad, and one day seeing him leaving his work in the evening, he spoke to him, and learned his history.

It appeared that David Owen's father was old and infirm, and his mother was blind. David had two sisters who were domestic servants, one of whom had been obliged, when her mother fell blind, to leave her situation and attend to the old couple. David was anxious to help them, and came to America to get better wages than he could get at home. He was eloquent as he talked to Mr. Blank about his good old mother, the blithest and happiest old woman in the country, in spite of her blindness, and such a pious woman. She had taught herself to read "the blind Bible" with raised letters. Mr. Blank was pleased with the lad's enthusiasm, and liked him all the better for it.

Some months after his conversation with his employer, David Owen was informed that he was wanted in the office. He went in, and found Mr. Blank talking to a young man, evidently, from the likeness between the two, his son.

"Owen," said Mr. Blank, "this is my son. He is going on a tour in Europe. You know something of Wales; is there anything there worth seeing?"

Mr. Blank had a humorous twinkle in his eye as he asked the question, for David's enthusiastic admiration and love for his own country were notorious in the works. He replied now with so much earnestness that young Mr. Blank was amused at his patriotic fervor; but all due allowance for partiality being made, was sufficiently impressed to decide on taking in the Welsh mountains as part of his tour.

Mr. Blank's Visit to the Blind Welsh Woman.

"I will give you the address of that young fellow's family," said Mr. Blank after David had gone out of the office. "I should like you to call. He is a good son; it would make him happy to speak to some one who had seen the old people lately."

Some months afterward young Mr. Blank found himself, one lovely summer day, in a mountainous district of North Wales. Remembering his father's injunction, he inquired for the Owen family, which the waiter of the hotel could not identify among the many families of that name until Mr. Blank, recollecting that David's mother was blind, mentioned the fact. He was then directed to a little stone cottage on the mountain-side. He made his way to it, and, entering the little enclosed garden, saw, sitting in the doorway, an old woman whom he had no difficulty in recognizing as David's mother. She was dressed in the quaint costume of the country, with the high hat and snowy muslin cap, kerchief, and apron affected by the peasantry. She loved to dress so, though Mary Owen was not an ordinary peasant, having lived in English families, and speaking English as fluently as her own language. Her blind Bible was on her lap, but she was not reading. Her hands were clasped on the page as if in prayer.

Mr. Blank seated himself on the settle by her side, and introducing himself as a stranger visiting the country, entered into conversation. He found her an intelligent woman, knowing the country well for miles around, and she talked easily of the places of interest. Leading the conversation to personal matters, Mr. Blank learned that her husband was dead. Had died three weeks before; but the old lady was not cast down. Her time would not be long, she said. It was in the Lord's hand. She would see her husband again soon. Mr. Blank was fresh from college, where he had dabbled a little in the speculations of the philosophers, and was disposed to look on the Bible his father loved as an antiquated book which had had its day. The old lady's calm assurance surprised him. He knew that if death were as near him as it was to this old woman he would not be so calm.

"You seem to feel quite sure of being able to see after you are dead," he said, "and that you will see your husband?"

"Of course I'm sure. Why, Jesus will be there, and do you think He'll let me be blind in Heaven? You know He can give me sight." And turning the leaves of her Bible and running her fingers quickly over the headings of the pages, she came to a much-used passage, and read how the blind beggar received his sight (John 9).

Mr. Blank did not like to speak of his own doubts, so he changed the subject by saying, "I am an American; you have a son over there, I think?"

"Ay, sir, the best of sons, my David. He is a good lad; he never forgets us."

"I know him; I saw him the day before I left America. He works in my father's factory."

The old lady stretched out both her hands in the direction of the young man, saying, eagerly, "Let me touch your hand, sir. Bless you for coming to see me! You have seen my David. Is he well? Is he grown? His father's last words were a blessing on him."

The old woman's agitation was so excessive that Mr. Blank thought it best to leave her, promising to come again the next day. He did call again and again many times. There was a strange fascination for him in this old woman, so quiet, so assured, so happy in her darkness, while he was so doubtful, so unsettled. It seemed to him, as he listened to her conversation, that the Saviour's prediction had been fulfilled in himself and this blind Welsh woman: "For judgment am I come into this world, that they which see not might see; and that they which see might be made blind" (John 9 : 39).

He prolonged his stay, visiting David's mother every day, until at last the light which illumined the soul of the blind woman broke upon his own spiritual eyes. When he returned to America he told his father his story, and Mr. Blank clasped him in his arms, and together they thanked God.

David was summoned to the office again the next day, and Mr. Blank, with tears in his eyes, told him how God had given him the desire of his heart in the conversion of his only son through the Spirit's application of Mrs. Owen's words. His gratitude was unbounded, and he could not be content unless David received some proof of it, which David certainly did in very substantial form by his changed position in the works and his employer's friendshp.

The young Christian knew that his companions would ridicule him, and was not surprised when they assailed him with the arguments he had himself often used. But their arguments fell as upon a rock. Young Blank had one decisive answer: "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see."

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Difficult Problem.

"WHAT am I to do with you?" Hester asked, speaking at last to Rose, who was silent and motionless at her side—standing there like a voiceless ghost from some other world, which could utter no word until a question was put to it.

"O Hester!" she cried, "I could live no longer without seeing you and my home. You cannot think what it is to be away ten years, and never hear a word, not a syllable, of those who belong to you. Would my husband forgive me, do you think? Only so far as to let me hear him say so before I die? I cannot live very long. Is he less angry with me? Does he ever speak of me?"

"No," said Hester, "he has not forgiven you. He never mentions your name."

"Oh, my God!" wailed the lost woman; "but I must get his forgiveness before I die. What is to become of me? I want to hide somewhere; anywhere out of Robert's reach. He is trying to find me; and I vowed to God when I left him that I would never, never look upon his face again. Do you know why? God keep you ever from a repentance like mine. Shelter me somewhere, little Hetty; hide me. You promised once that you would be always like my own daughter to me. Hester, you could not turn away from your mother, however sinful she had been."

The doleful words were wailed into Hester's ear, as she still gazed into the darkness. Rose had crept toward her, and stolen her arms round her waist. She did not push away the clinging arms, but she could not answer.

"I am very young still," murmured Rose; "no older than Miss Waldron, who was at chapel just now. I thought your father would be there, and I should see how changed he was. I am going to die, Hester. Yesterday the doctor in London said there was no hope for me; so I resolved to come back home, to you and my husband. He is a just man, and a merciful man. He cannot help but forgive me before I die. I believe that Jesus has pardoned all my sins."

In the voice of Rose, which was one to be remembered for a lifetime, there was a tone of hope as she spoke the last sentence, and she pressed her arms more closely about Hester.

"Yes," she said, "I was very wretched, and I thought, when I did not see your father tonight, had I not better go back to London, and end my life quickly as women like me do. But then the preacher spoke, and a strange, strange peace entered into me. He looked toward me, where I sat behind you, Hetty, and he said, 'Our souls have no sins which the charity of Christ cannot cover.' Then I resolved to trust myself to the charity of Christ, and to yours, little Hetty."

Her voice was lost in sobs, long-drawn and painful, and her head sank upon Hester's lap. Hester's hand fell softly, with its cold touch, upon the fevered forehead.

"If Christ will receive you," she said, with a thrill of awe as she looked up into the dark sky, as though she half expected to see a light from heaven breaking through the black clouds, "who am I that I should cast you off? I will give you shelter for this night at least."

Yet she did not move, nor help Rose to rise, but let her still lie there sobbing, with her face, which no eye could have seen, buried in her lap, as if she would fain hide it even from the night. Hester was thinking of Robert Waldron, in his luxurious home, repenting with a comfortable penitence, which left him free for many pleasures and which was scarcely more than a welcome gloom, where he could withdraw when the brightness of his life wearied him. But this misery, this poverty-stricken, ill-clad, friendless, dying misery, was the true result of the sin of which both had been alike guilty. She shuddered, and Rose felt it; for she loosed her clinging arms, and would have fallen lower at her feet, had not Hester's hand pressed her head down gently upon its resting-place, as a mother's hand caresses the bowed head of a sorrowful child. She had forgotten the cold and the rain, or felt them only as fitting better this dreary hour than light and cloudless skies would have done. But now her hand fell upon the wet clothes of the woman whom she had promised to shelter, a woman upon whom the doom of death had been passed. She lifted Rose up tenderly, and drew her trembling arm through her own. No eye saw them. Not one of their townspeople met them in the deserted street. In the darkness and dreariness of a winter's night, Rose Morley returned to her husband's house.

There was on the left hand of the house door an empty room which was rarely entered, and Hester left Rose there until her father and the young girl whom she kept as her only servant should be gone to bed. It was already near the hour when John Morley retired to his own chamber, where he sometimes read or wrote until later on in the night. Hester took off her wet cloak, and went into the room where he was sitting alone. There was a newly-quickened love mingled with a dread of him, stirring in her heart. The gray, despairing face, and the silvery hair of her father touched her to the quick this evening.

She stood behind him for a minute or two, and then laid her hand, which had so lately rested upon Rose's forehead, upon the snow-white head. It was the very attitude and caress of Rose herself on that day, now many years ago, which had never died out of John Morley's memory; and he laid his head down upon the desk before him with a sigh of profound regret and despair.

"Father," cried Hester, earnestly, and kneeling down beside him, "is there nothing that can make you happy? Is there nothing that could happen to bring you comfort?"

John Morley shook his head in silence.

"But this is horrible," she said. "Surely, surely God never meant you to pass your life in a grief like this. Surely He has kept some consolation in His hands for you."

"All things are possible with Him," he answered; "but yet holier men than I have passed through long lives under blacker clouds than mine. There was Cowper. God has not smitten me with an Egyptian gloom like his. For me there is a hope in the world to come, where the weary are at rest."

"But is there no hope for you sooner?" asked Hester. "Is there nothing which would make you glad?"

"Nothing!" he replied. "I have a habit of sorrow now, Hester, and I cannot shake it off. It is a poisoned garment, if you will, but to tear it off would tear my living flesh. No, no! There is no more gladness for me in life."

Could she tell to him her heavy secret? An unutterable terror seized upon her at the very thought. She remembered the moment when her father, with the glare of madness and suicide in his eyes, had awakened her from the profound sleep of childhood, telling her it was better to die than to live. She recollected the stealthy, murderous blow which had nearly killed Robert Waldron. Her heart failed her. Overhead was that closed room, which had been a constant testimony against Rose; and now Hester involuntarily held her breath and listened as if she heard some sound there. John Morley listened also; but there was nothing to be heard, as there never had been since Rose had fled. He sighed wearily, and turned over the leaves of the book without reading them. The striking of the house-clock seemed welcome to him; and he bade Hester good-night, and left her alone in the gloomy room.

Hester waited until she heard him lock his chamber door, and then she fetched Rose to the warmth of the fire still burning in the grate. In the dark room Rose had not realized that she was indeed once more in her husband's house. But this was his hearth. Here was his chair standing where it had been used to stand in her days of innocence, gone forever. There was his open book, with the leaves still fluttering as if they felt the movement of his fingers. This was the light he had been reading by, and the air he had breathed. It was her husband's hearth, and she had been a curse to it. She was come back to it in secret, and with trembling. She felt now how impossible it would be to face him, to look into his eyes, and to hear his voice. She glanced about her for some refuge to hide herself in—herself, a scared, abject, frightened wretch, who ought to steal away into some hole to die alone and unseen. Her wild, despairing gaze round her husband's room met the sweet, grave, compassionate eyes of Hester.

"Sit here, poor mother," she said, drawing nearer the fire her own mother's chair, which in the lost days Rose had always given up for her little step-daughter. She sank down upon it, her lips moving without a sound, and her white face turned toward Hester. Hester had not seen it before. It was the same face as that of the gay girl she had once been; but that face disfigured and marred and aged by shame. The soft lines were hardened, and the brightness had grown dim, and the freshness had become sullied and tarnished. Hester could not bear to look at it; and as she moved to and fro, ministering to her sore necessities, she did so with averted and downcast eyes.

The hours of the night wore away very slowly. Sometimes Rose fell into a feverish slumber, broken with sobs and starts. She would not go to bed, and Hester did not urge it. What she was to do with her Hester did not know; and while she watched her uneasy rest, she tried to shape out some plan for her future life. To seek any home for her in Little Aston would be madness, as every one would know her and the story of her shame. To send her away, whom she had so earnestly and so long sought to find, seemed impossible, ten times impossible, if, as she said, there was no hope of her life.

It would be practicable enough to keep her in her father's house, for John Morley's automatic habits could be counted upon to a moment. There were rooms in his house which he had never entered within her memory, and which he would never think of visiting. The cost of her maintenance there would be less than anywhere else, and money was very scarce with them. But she recoiled from the idea of suffering her to dwell by stealth and unforgiven in her husband's house, to sleep under the same roof. Hester recalled her father's melancholy cry, "She will never sleep under my roof again." Moreover, now she guessed somewhat more clearly the heinousness of Rose's guilt. She could not keep her unknown to her father, in the shelter of his dishonored home.

From time to time Rose woke up and murmured little scraps of her sad history. She had taken no special care to conceal the traces of her flight, yet it had happened so that she had left Falaise and wandered into a remote country district, where she had lived cheaply, as one can do in France, for some years upon the money which was in her possession. When it was gone she had entered into a situation as lady's maid, and so returned with the family to England, three years ago. She had always passed as a widow. Her last situation she had given up only two months before; and since then she had been living in poor and solitary lodgings in London, with no society but the memory of the past, which had grown day by day into stronger force, until it had driven her back to Little Aston in the forlorn hope of casting herself upon her husband's forgiveness. Hester shook her head sadly at these last words. There was no chance whatever that John Morley would forgive her.

"You do not yet know what you have done," she said, with unconscious severity. "If you could see him you would know better what he has to forgive. He may forgive you before you die. But I dare not tell him that you are here; I dare not mention your name to him."

"But it is so many years ago!" cried Rose, clasping her thin hands together.

"Many years ago!" echoed Hester; "no; it has been every day of those ten years. The grief has been new every morning. Ah! I understand it better now. Every day he has felt himself deserted and betrayed. Oh, my father! my poor father!"

She covered her face with her hands as if she could no longer endure the sight of her who had wrought her father's misery. But a slight sound caused her to look up. Rose was wrapping round her the shabby cloak, still damp and soiled from the rain of the evening. Her wan face was flushed, and her eyes, burning with inward fever, had lost their former distress.

"I am going away," she said, "and I will not come back till I crawl here dying. I must see him again, and hear him say he forgives me; and if he sees me dying at his feet he will say it. But I will go away for a little while, Hetty."

"But where will you go?" asked Hester.

"Oh, I don't know," she cried, wringing her hands; "why does God let women as wretched and lonely as me live? I could never put an end to myself, for I'm afraid to die. And now I shall go away, and it will come creeping on and on, and I shall know it is there, and there will not be a voice to speak gently to me. Oh! little Hetty, cannot you help me?"

"Yes," answered Hester, taking her bonnet and cloak from her feeble hands; "I will help you. If my father ever heard you had been ill in misery and solitude, it would only add to his pain. You must stay somewhere near to me, poor mother, so that I can nurse you and comfort you. Think of God rather than of my father. You have separated yourself from him, but you have not separated yourself forever from God. You belong to Him still."

In tones as soft and soothing as those a mother uses to a suffering child, Hester spoke these words to Rose. She placed the poor forlorn creature in her mother's chair again, and smoothed gently the locks of light hair, now thin and gray, which had fallen in disorder over her face. Rose slumbered again fitfully, crying out in her dreams for her husband's forgiveness. Once or twice Hester started with terror, thinking she heard his step upon the stairs; but the dreary night wore away without surprise. As soon as the late dawn began to glimmer upon the uncurtained window, she awoke Rose and took her up-stairs to her own room, where she would be safe from all eyes.

It was as Hester drew up the window-blind in her own room, and her eye fell upon the melancholy-looking outbuilding opposite it, that a practicable plan for the shelter of Rose presented itself to her. The old nursery, which at some remote date in the past had perhaps been the scene of childish sports and laughter, would be a refuge well fitted for her safety and concealment. Still she resolved within herself to ask her father's consent, though her habitual independence of action might very well have acquitted her conscience from the necessity of seeking it. She wished to feel that she had his sanction. She thought that at some future season it would prove a consolation to him to know that he had himself given a refuge and shelter to Rose.

GOD'S WORKS AND WORD.

S. S. Lesson for August 31, Ps. 19. Golden Text, Psalm 138 : 2. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Creation and Revelation an Expression of God—The One a Key to the Other—Creation Studied Alone Leading to Error—Wonders of Creation Surpassed in Redemption—The Sun a Type of Jesus—The Lawgiver Superior to Natural Law—David's Estimate of the Word—Perfect—A Defrauded Workwoman at Bethshan—Sure—Right—Pure—Wisdom for the Simple—The Blessedness of Certainty.

WITH our God to speak is to do; "He spake, and it was done; He commanded, and it stood fast" (Ps. 33 : 6). God is truth; His Word and His works are an expression of Himself, and we understand His works by His Word, and His Word by His works. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth His handiwork." Yet without the key of His Word to interpret, how many there are who have worshipped these works of God and deified them, instead of reading in them His love, His greatness, and His power! Men have calculated the of the universe, and measured the distance of the fixed stars from the earth by the time taken in the transmission of light, at twelve millions of miles a minute, and found that six thousand years must elapse before a ray of light from some of them, travelling even at such a pace, could reach our world. But the inference drawn by many an unspiritual man has been, that if there really is a God who created and who upholds such a universe, it is the veriest conceit for any individual man to imagine that One so inconceivably great can listen to his prayers. For he is only one out of hundreds of millions in one little planet, out of several revolving round one little sun, and that sun only one of a cloud of similar ones, forming the white nebula which we call the milky way. We need the Word of God to tell us that that God has chosen to become flesh and dwell among us; that that God has chosen to bear our sins and their consequences, and that above and beyond all the glory and the wonder of His works in creation stands the inconceivable vastness of love in His work of redemption. It is just His greatness which makes the love of God and His salvation so overpowering to all our thoughts and conceptions; had we not His Word for it, there would be not only insufferable conceit, but even blasphemy in the bare idea.

"Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge. There is no speech nor language where their voice is not heard." It is a glorious help to missionaries when they can point up to the starry heavens, or the sun rising or setting, and say, who created them." Paul, standing before the most learned and polished men of his time at Athens, could say of Him who to them was "the unknown God," "Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, Him declare I unto you. God that made the world and all things therein," etc. (Acts 17 : 23, 24). At Lystra in Asia he appealed to the people to turn from the vanities of their heathen worship to "the living God, which made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things that are therein" (Acts 14 : 15). When Jehoshaphat was assailed by his enemies, and gathered his people together to ask help of the Lord, he prayed thus: "O Lord God of our fathers, art thou not God in heaven" (1 Chron. 20 : 6)? and thus strengthened himself in faith, because such an One could do all things.

"I KNOW THE GOD

Of all the created works of God, the sun is the most striking to the generality of men. Day and night, heat and cold, are regulated by the sun; the seasons of the year, the weather, so very much which affects us every day and hour, is dependent on the light and heat of the sun. David calls the heavens the sun's tabernacle, as though they existed for the sun, and says, "There is nothing hid from the heat thereof." This is a glorious type of Jesus, the Sun of Righteousness (Mal. 4 : 2). The very heavens exist for Him. He is the Sun round which all revolves, the Centre of all things, and nothing is hid from the influence of Jesus. Men may profess infidelity, but they must hold some relation to Jesus; they must take some side, either for Him or against Him. The most indifferent can no more ignore the claim of Jesus as their Saviour than they can ignore the heat of the sun. They may shut out its influence by getting away into a dark room, but there is the sun shining all the same. And just so, either in this life or in the next, every man must face the fact that Jesus has died for him, whether he will or no. All men must some time bow at the name of Jesus (Phil. 2 : 10).

The very works of creation, and the natural laws by which they are governed, only exist by the Word of God.

MEN EXALT NATURAL LAW

as though it were greater than the Lawgiver, and as though God were governed by His works instead of being the Governor of them. By Christ, who is the living Word of God, "all things were made" (John 1 : 1–3); "all things were created by Him, and for Him; and He is before all things, and by Him [or in Him] all things consist" (Col. 1 : 16, 17). He is the Father's expression, the express image of His Person, God intelligible to us, God translated into human language. His written Word has all the power to such as receive it, which His spoken Word had upon the created, unformed matter which He brought into life and order in the days of the creation. David knew not all the depth of the truth which he uttered when he said, "Thou hast magnified thy Word above all thy name."

David's first testimony to the Word of God in our Psalm is

ITS PERFECTION.

"The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul, or restoring the life." Trace the conversion of a soul, or the healing of a body by faith in Christ, and almost always you will find some word of God's blessed Book has been applied by the Holy Ghost, and has breathed in its own life power.

A POOR WORKWOMAN

had counted on visiting her aged father at Whitsuntide. She had carefully saved up the money. An acquaintance came to her with a pitiful tale of poverty, and begged the loan of it for rent and food, and the same day he spent her hard-earned money in drinking and driving about in a hack. Her heart was filled with bitterness. At the same time she fell ill and had to leave her business; the visit to her father was more remote than ever, and how to maintain herself became the question. A friend sent her to Bethshan. There she saw on the wall this text, "Be careful for nothing." "Is that in the Bible?" she asked. It was shown her. It went home with power. Her health was restored, and in two or three days she went to her business filled with joy and peace and health. Why? The Word of the Lord had restored her health—ay, and converted her from bearing her own cares to casting them on Him.

"The testimony of the Lord is

making wise the simple." We waste time immensely when we argue. In order to convince one who really desires instruction, we need to get a message from God. A few moments spent in putting the matter into His hands makes us quiet enough to hear His voice, and whatever He brings to the mind in answer makes wise the simple. "The statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart." How many anxious faces one sees among Christians—perplexed, worried, weary—so really wanting to be rightly guided, and yet conscious of again and again missing the right thing. Out of patience with themselves, with the advice of others, almost out of patience with God, they want something sure, right, pure—something which can rejoice the heart, because it leaves no uncertainty behind, and enlightens the eyes. Such direction comes in no other way than from the Word of God. "But," you say, "I have searched the Word of God through and through, and I find nothing which [illegible] present difficulty." Perhaps all that searching stood in your way, because you have asked God for guidance, and then attempted to discover it by your searching, as though God had not undertaken to guide you. In order to be made wise we must become simple. The simple have no confidence in themselves; if they put a thing into the hands of God, they give Him credit for undertaking it. If they ask to be guided, they believe God wants to guide them more than they want to be guided, and they act accordingly. Where it is a question of special direction, instead of coming to the Bible as they would come to Bradshaw* or the Encyclopædia Britannica, with a sense of being able to master it, they expect God to tell them where to look, and then there is no harass, no saying, "I wonder whether this is it, or that." Light dawns, so that you can say, "I'm sure this is it;" the heart rejoices that God has answered prayer, and the eyes are enlightened to understand His love better than ever. "The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring forever;" no mixed motives in it; "the judgments of the Lord are truth (margin) and righteous altogether." David had the highest opinion of them, esteeming them as richer than gold.

In his practical application the Psalmist says, "Moreover by them is thy servant warned" . . . "who can understand his errors?" Many try to instead of letting the Word of God warn them.

VIVISECTION OF SIN

causes instant contagion; the object of it is always self-justification. Why examine the motives of a sin, if you don't want to excuse yourself? If the thing is hateful, turn away from it entirely. "But if I am blamed more than I deserve?" You can't be, for sin took the death of Jesus to purge it. Flee to the wounds and to the Word of Jesus. Let Him be your Keeper, and pray in faith with David; "Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my Strength, and my Redeemer."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

English Influence is Being Employed with China to induce her to submit to the French terms, and avert war. England's motive is not altogether disinterested, as a war between France and China would interfere with trade, and in the present temper prevailing in the two countries might lead to awkward complications between the English and French governments. The French have strengthened their position by the capture of Kelung. All her naval operations in Chinese waters have hitherto been hampered by her being compelled to resort to the English or the Chinese for coal, as they had all the mines in their hands; but Kelung has the finest coal mines in Asia. They can easily be protected, and thus France has, according to the confession of even the English papers, doubled her naval capabilities in the whole region east of Suez, even as far south as Australia. The London Times publishes a despatch from Hong Kong, dated August 15th, which states that China has declared war. The news has not been confirmed, and the French Government professes to discredit it.

Casey, an Irish Informer whose Evidence resulted in the conviction of five men who were tried for a murder, has now declared that he perjured himself at the trial. He declares that so far as he knew not one of the five men was present at the murder. He excuses himself for the commission of the crime of swearing away the lives of his fellow countrymen by saying that he was himself in danger of being hung. It is difficult to decide which of his statements is true, but the authorities believe that his recantation is false, and is made because he fears the vengeance of the Irish societies, who have threatened him with the fate of Carey.

The French Expedition to the Sahara Desert, the massacre of which was announced three years ago, was, it is now stated, not so utterly destroyed as was reported. Colonel Slatters and Captain Massons, the leaders of the expedition, survived, and are now held as prisoners by the natives. The expedition was sent to survey the route of a railway which it was proposed to construct across the great desert.

THE CONFERENCE ON EGYPT: Its Origin, Proceedings, and Failure.

The International Conference, a picture of which appears on the first page of The Christian Herald, assembled in the Foreign Office, London, on June 28th, and finally adjourned on August 2d, having accomplished none of the objects for which it was convened. Those objects related chiefly to the Egyptian finances. The subject of money has been, throughout, the main point in what is known as the Egyptian question. The pretext on which European nations first interfered in Egyptian affairs was the financial embarrassments of the country. The ex-Khédive during his reign spent enormous sums of money on public works. Many of those works were productive, but the majority were improvements which were needed, but which brought no return for the outlay. The money was borrowed in Europe, and it is to be observed that whenever a new loan was negotiated for some specific object, a large portion of the loan was not applied to the purpose for which it had been raised, but was spent in building new palaces for the Khédive and in the purchase of jewels and dresses for the ladies of his harem. So the load of debt rolled up, and Egypt, being unable to pay the interest, borrowed more money to pay it. The end of such financial arrangements, whether in the case of an individual or a nation, is the same. They lead inevitably to bankruptcy.

The Khédive then applied to England and France, his chief creditors, to put his affairs in order. The only way to do that was to wring more money from the impoverished people, and the representatives of the two nations made matters worse by making heavy charges for their services. They brought hosts of their connections to fill clerkships and collectorships, and so, though the revenue was more honestly collected and applied, the burdens on the people were increased.

At length the burden became intolerable, and the upper classes, and especially the army, became discontented for the additional reason that the offices of the State were given to Europeans, and the entire administration was practically in the hands of the English and French commissioners, who had charge of the funds. The rising under Arabi was an attempt to rid the country of the foreigners and have its affairs administered by Egyptians. His success would probably have led to repudiation of the debt. In Egyptian hands the revenue, from which the interest on the debt was paid, must have decreased. But Arabi failed. The cost of suppressing his rising, the indemnities, amounting to twenty-one million dollars, which had to be paid to the sufferers in the pillage and burning of Alexandria on May 9th, 1882, and the cost of the attempt to hold the Soudan, amounting to nearly eight millions more, were added to the already stupendous debt of $290,000,000. Beside this there were works of irrigation, which were indispensably needed, which would cost five millions.

Under those circumstances the English Government called the Conference to take into consideration the best means of solving the almost hopeless problem. The English Government offered to assist Egypt to borrow forty million dollars by becoming security for its repayment, if the other governments would sanction a reduction being made in the rate of interest Egypt had agreed to pay, and consent to give the interest on the new loan precedence over all other Egyptian liabilities. That proposition was contemptuously rejected by the representative of France.

The essential difference between the English and the French plenipotentiaries lay in their conflicting estimates of the revenues obtainable in Egypt. And the source of revenue which the difference chiefly concerned was the land-tax. The French insisted that sufficient pressure had not recently been brought to bear upon the miserable peasants. With that cold, mercenary spirit, which almost always underlies the verbal heroics of the French, they held fast to the interests of the bondholders, and would listen to no plea for mercy. The difference between the two calculations amounted to little more than two and a half million dollars. But it was irreduceable, and it made all the difference between oppressive extortion and reasonable justice. The utmost sacrifice demanded from the bondholders by the British proposal was a half per cent, and even this was not to be asked, unless it proved to be absolutely inevitable. The French proposals ignored altogether the interests of the Fellaheen, and magnified the claims of what they call the "privileged debt." They demanded payment in full of the claims of all bondholders. To such proposal the English administration felt this insuperable objection, that they could not be carried out except by a continuance of the old system of extortion and oppression. The required taxes would keep the vast majority of the people at starvation point.

The plenipotentiaries spent several weeks in endeavoring to bring about a compromise in which England and France could agree, but without success. France was encouraged to maintain her attitude by Germany, which unexpectedly came to her aid in the Conference. Various reasons are assigned for this unusual spectacle of France and Germany in union against England. The most probable is that Bismarck was endeavoring to arouse antagonism between the two countries, with the object of separating France from the last friend she has in Europe. However that may be, the German Government supported the French demands, and as England would not recede, the Conference broke up in despair.

England is now sending to Egypt Lord Northbrook, who is a member of the Baring family—a family eminent among the financiers of Europe, to study the question on the spot, and to propound some plan for the relief of the country. The selection is a wise one, for Lord Northbrook is not only a skilful financier, but his experience as Viceroy of India has fitted him to deal intelligently with the character of the Mohammedan population of Egypt.

The illustration on the first page is a picture of the Conference as the plenipotentiaries were grouped at the first session. They were: For Great Britain, Earl Granville and the Right Hon H. C. E. Childers, M.P.; Count Karolyi, of Austria; M. de Staal, of Russia; M. Waddington, representing France; Count Nigra, Italy; Musurus Pacha, the delegate for Turkey; and Count Munster, of Germany. From the English journals we extract sketches of the lives of the more prominent of these personages.

EARL GRANVILLE, K.G.

The Right Hon. Granville George Leveson-Gower, Earl Granville, K.G., is the eldest son of the first earl. He was born May 11th, 1815, and was educated at Eton and Oxford. His first political experience was gained as attaché to the embassy in Paris in 1836; but he only remained abroad a year when he was elected to the House of Commons as member for Morpeth. Early in 1840 he accepted the appointment of Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, while sitting as a member for Lichfield. In 1846 he succeeded to the peerage on the death of his father, and in the House of Lords he has achieved his fame.

He holds the ancient office of Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, having been appointed to that office in 1865, and in that capacity has for his official residence Walmer Castle, one of three built by Henry III. He acted as Vice-President of the Royal Commission for the Great Exhibition of 1851, of which the Prince Consort was President. His power of organization, which is his special gift, was of great value, and the diligence with which he labored contributed to the success of the enterprise. In 1856 he represented the English nation at the coronation of the late Emperor of Russia. Two years later he failed to form a Ministry upon the retirement of Lord Palmerston, and in that statesman's second administration Earl Granville filled the post of President of the Council. In 1868 he became Minister of Foreign Affairs under Mr. Gladstone's government, which post he held until the retirement of the Liberal Cabinet in 1874, after which time he was the acknowledged leader of the Opposition in the House of Lords until the return of the present Ministry to power, in April, 1880, when he again accepted the important post of Minister of Foreign Affairs, which he still retains.

RIGHT HON. H. C. E. CHILDERS, M.P.

The Right Hon. Hugh Culling Eardley Childers, who assisted Lord Granville at the Conference, is the son of a clergyman. His father, the Rev. Eardley Childers, was vicar of Cantley, Yorkshire. Sir Hugh, who is the only son, was born in Brook Street, Piccadilly, London, on June 25th, 1827. His early education was received at the then popular Surrey seminary at Cheam. Thence he proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he graduated fourteenth Senior Optime in 1850. He purposed to enter for the study of the law, but this he deferred for a time. At the date of his leaving the university the Government of Victoria, Australia, was established by charter. To this colony Mr. Childers set sail, with his newly-married wife, in 1850. There his first political experience was gained, for immediately after his landing he was elected to represent an important township in the first Parliament of that colony. He received an appointment to a seat in the Australian Cabinet as Commissioner of Trade and Customs.

At the close of his political apprenticeship in the colonies in 1857, Mr. Childers returned to England in the capacity of Agent-General for Victoria. Upon his return he proceeded to take his M.A. degree at Cambridge, and entered upon the study of law, without being ever called to the bar. In 1860 he was elected as M.P. for Pontefract, and he has represented that borough ever since. Very early in his parliamentary career his experience in the southern hemisphere gained for him great confidence as a practical statesman. He sat upon the commission to inquire into the working of the plan of dealing with persons convicted of crime and sentenced to long periods of incarceration. It had up to that date been the practice to transport such persons out of their country, "for their country's good," and convey them to settlements at Botany Bay, in Australia. The colonists, after a while, protested against such "rubbish" being "shot" into their fine free country, and Mr. Childers, as Agent-General, had lifted up his voice against the practice in vain; but before he had been a year in the House of Commons his advice was listened to by the members of the commission, and the practice was eventually stopped.

He enjoyed two years of office, in 1864–66, under Earl Russell, first as a Junior Lord of the Admiralty, and then as Financial Secretary to the Treasury. Upon the accession of Mr. Gladstone to power in 1868 Mr. Childers became First Lord of the Admiralty, which office he continued to hold until March, 1871.

The great cause of the illness, which led to his retirement from office, was grief at the loss of his eldest son, who was a midshipman on board the ill-fated ship Captain, which foundered, with all hands save one boat's crew, in the Bay of Biscay, on September 7th, 1870. In the midshipmen's berth with young Mr. Childers and his companions in death were the Hon. W. R. Herbert, son of the Earl of Pembroke, and the Hon. A. T. N. Baring, son of the Earl of Northbrook. Upon relinquishing his post in the Government, Mr. Childers again resumed his office as Agent-General for the Colony of Victoria. Upon his appointment to the post of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, in 1873, his re-election for Pontefract was remarkable as being the first which took place in England under the ballot.

He lost his first wife in 1875, and was married again in 1879. He is a Fellow of the Royal Society; his published works have been nothing more bulky than pamphlets, but they indicate that he has considerable administrative power.

This ability he has used in vast commercial enterprises with which he is connected as director or otherwise. He is also a member of the Privy Council and Secretary of State for War.

M. WADDINGTON,
The Plenipotentiary of France.

WILLIAM HENRY WADDINGTON was born in 1826, his father being a rich Englishman, who had established some cotton works in France, and had become naturalized. The son was educated at Rugby, and afterward took his degree at Cambridge. At an early age he gained some distinction by valuable contributions toward the history and archæology of France, and in 1865 was elected member of the Académie des Belles Lettres et Inscriptions.

He is described as being distinguished among the assembled representatives of the various States by his simplicity, plainness, and ordinary civilian appearance. He has ties of kindred and sympathy with three of the great nations represented at the Congress—France, England, and Germany; and this fact, quite apart from his remarkable personal claims, procured him almost an exceptional respect. In opposition to what is stated concerning him in Vapereau's "Dictionnaire," an English journal has stated that it is not true that M. Waddington was called upon at any period of his life to make choice, like the people of Alsace and Lorraine, whether or not he would be a Frenchman. He is French in heart and French by law, although the English element in his composition is conspicuous in his person and his tastes.

The option was early placed before young Waddington to choose whether he would be a cotton manufacturer or devote his life to literature or politics. He chose both literature and politics, and to this and to his relationship by marriage with the family of the Bunsens may doubtless be attributed the respect which he commands in Germany. Some of the most distinguished of German scholars have been among his best friends. Even after the events of 1870, M. Waddington is said, to the horror of some of his Parisian colleagues, boldly to have stated that his true patriotism as a Frenchman did not call upon him to break the ties which bound him to German scholars.

He entered the National Assembly of France February 8th, 1871. From the very first he took a prominent part in the debates, and was appointed Minister of Education in the short-lived Cabinet born and buried in May, 1873. The late M. Thiers is said to have formed a high opinion of his talents, and it was on this account, perhaps, that he became the successful candidate for the Ministry of Foreign Affairs after the fall of the Duc Decazes. M. Thiers was courageous enough to bestow upon M. Waddington, in spite of his well-known Protestantism, the important portfolio of Public Instruction. He has never been popular as an orator, but for straightforwardness, for unselfishness of character, there are, perhaps, few French statesmen that can compare with him.

MUSURUS PACHA,
The Representative of Turkey.

CONSTANTINE MUSURUS PACHA, the distinguished Turkish diplomatist, was born at Constantinople on February 18th, 1807, so that he is now seventy-seven years of age. His father was Paul Musurus, a native of Retimo, in Crete, and a descendant of an ancient patrician family. Constantine received in the city of his birth a very careful education, comprising the classical literature of Greece and Rome, the sciences, and several European languages, in all of which he evidenced much application, and attained an almost unrivalled proficiency.

In 1832, when he was only twenty-five years old, he was appointed Secretary to Stephen Vogorides, Prince of Samos. A year later he accompanied the Commissioners of France, England, and Russia, sent to exhort the Samians, who were then in armed rebellion, to make their submission to the Turkish Government. The Commissioners having failed, Musurus, in 1834, himself undertook the pacification of Samos, which he actually accomplished, without employing coercion of any kind; and having organized the internal administration upon a liberal constitutional basis, he governed the island for four years, to the unqualified and enthusiastic satisfaction of the people.

On his return to Constantinople, in 1839, he married the Princess Anne, the second daughter of Prince Vogorides, who was born in 1819, and whose personal beauty and intelligence were proverbial. She was seized with an attack of disease of the heart, at a ball given to the Sultan of Turkey, at the Foreign Office, London, on June 19th, 1867, and died the same night. In 1840, Musurus was sent to Athens as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, a most difficult mission for an Ottoman diplomatist, on account of race and religious antagonism of the most determined character on the part of the Greeks. No wonder, therefore, that his undertaking was signalized by a rupture of diplomatic relations between the courts of Athens and Turkey, by the triumph of Turkish policy, and an attempted assassination of Musurus. At the end of 1848—a singularly revolutionary period on the Continent of Europe—Musurus was recalled from Athens to represent Turkey at the Austrian Court, where his able management of the delicate matters connected with the demand for the surrender of the Hungarian refugees, increased his well-earned reputation. He was rewarded for the ability displayed by him in these important negotiations by being appointed, in April, 1851, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary at London, received the high rank of Ambassador in January, 1856, and the rank of Muchir, with the title of Pacha, on the Sultan's visit to London, in July, 1867. He has since labored with untiring zeal in his country's service.

ANECDOTES BY THE REV. W. HASLAM.

AT one of the meetings of the recent Conference, at Keswick, Mr. Haslam took for his topic, Christ casting out the dumb devil, and gave utterance to much quaint and practical truth. He said:

"Christ is working even greater miracles now than He did in the days of His flesh. In Luke 11 we read that He cast out a dumb spirit. When the devil went out the dumb spake, and the people wondered. How many of God's children are still possessed of a dumb devil! They cannot pray in public, and if they are asked to bear testimony for Jesus, something holds them back. Yet we were made for the Lord. Our tongues were given to us to speak with, not only to speak to one another, but to speak to God; not only to speak about all other subjects, but about the Lord Himself. How is it that we can speak about most things and most persons, but we cannot speak about God?

"Some years ago I was walking in London. A clergyman passed me. He looked at me, and presently he came and asked if my name was Haslam. 'Yes.' 'God bless you,' he said. 'Thank you,' I said, 'as much of that as you like. What is it about?' 'I heard you preach in Paris once.' 'Yes, I was there.' 'Do you remember saying that of the door?' 'I dare say I did.' 'I had been waiting, but I did not know what I was waiting for. When I heard you say the latch was on my side of the door, I fell on my knees and said, "Oh, Lord, if that is so, come in and take full possession of my heart." Glory be to God. He came in.' 'It looks like it,' I said; and most certainly He did. The clergyman's soul was set free. And how near some of you are to liberty! Your hearts are full, if you only had the courage to open your mouths and speak for the Lord. Confession is made with the mouth. How often we are exhorted in the Psalms to praise the Lord with a loud voice. Surely, that means something; you need not spiritualize that. People very frequently keep themselves in bondage because they allow the dumb devil to keep their tongues silent.

"A friend of mine in London, who speaks now with a voice as clear as a bell, and preaches a full salvation, spoke to me in great trouble some years after his conversion. 'You know I am such a fool; I am afraid to speak. The other day you called on some one to pray, and I shivered down to my shoes, I was so afraid you would ask me. I could not have prayed if you had paid me for it.'

THIS DUMB DEVIL

was in full possession of him. He understood everything; you could not teach him much. I said, 'You have a dumb devil. Do you believe the Lord Jesus can cast him out?' 'Yes, I believe He can.' 'Yes, the devil himself believes that, but do you believe He will?' 'I am afraid.' 'I am very glad of it; now let us kneel down and see whether the Lord will cast out the dumb devil.' We were in a railway carriage together alone. We knelt down in the carriage and prayed. He could scarcely hear my voice for the noise; I think that was an encouragement to him. I went on praying to the Lord to loose the string of his tongue that he might speak plainly for the glory of God. He said, 'Amen.' 'Thank God,' I said, 'the dumb devil is going.' I began to pray again. He said, 'Lord, answer prayer.' 'Amen,' I said. 'Hallelujah! the devil is going,' and sure enough he began to pray for himself. I began to praise, and he was praising too. The train stopped, but we did not know anything about it; we went on praying and praising. The collector came to the door and said 'Tickets,' but we never stopped; we continued to praise God. Oh, we were happy! The guard shut the door and went away; he thought we were two madmen, I suppose. Oh, I wish there were more of such mad people. This man had got his liberty, and, glory be to God, he has used it since then.

"The Lord Jesus is here to do the same thing for every one who fully trusts Him. If you have been set at liberty from the bondage of sin, thank God for it; testify to God's praise. It will help you more than you think. You may understand all about the higher life, and full salvation, but if you do not tell about it, it will all be shut up in yourself. We want to SEE YOUR TONGUES SET FREE."

From the parable of the strong man armed, who kept his palace in peace, till he was dispossessed of the stronger, Mr. Haslam proceeded to show that though Satan is strong to keep the souls of men in bondage the Lord Jesus Christ can cast him out and take full possession Himself. He besought his hearers to open the latch and let into their trembling, fearful hearts the Lord of glory and of power. The fruit of his earnest, telling words was seen in the after days of the Convention, when some gave practical testimony that the dumb devil had been driven out and their tongues had been loosened to tell forth to others the great things the Lord had done for them.

The Evangelical Alliance, whose Conference is to be held at Copenhagen in September next, is to be congratulated upon the completeness of the programme of meetings they are able to announce. The Conference promises to be one of the most practical and effective that has yet been convened. Among the most prominent speakers will be the venerable Dr. Kalkar, of Copenhagen; Professor Godet, of Neuchatel; Pasteur Theo. Monod, of Paris; Philip Schaff, of New York, with Drs. Angus, Sinclair Paterson, Eustace Conder, and others from England. The Lord Mayor of London is also upon the list.

THE MIDNIGHT HORSEMAN.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

A DEAD city is always more suggestive than a living city—past Rome than present Rome—ruins rather than newly frescoed building. But the best time to visit a ruin is by moonlight. The Colosseum is far more fascinating to the traveller after sundown than before. You may stand by daylight amid the monastic ruins of Melrose Abbey, and study shaft and oriel, rosetted stone and mullion; but they throw their strongest witchery by moonlight. Some of you remember what the great poet of Scotland said in the "Lay of the Last Minstrel:"

> "If thou wouldst view fair Melrose aright, > Go visit it by the pale moonlight."

Washington Irving describes the Andalusian moonlight upon the Alhambra ruins as amounting to an enchantment. My text presents you the tower down, the gates down, the walls down—everything down: Nehemiah, on horseback, by moonlight looking upon the ruins. While he rides, there are some friends on foot going with him, for they do not want the many horses to disturb the suspicions of the people. These people do not know the secret of Nehemiah's heart, but they are going as a sort of body-guard. I hear the clicking hoofs of the horse on which Nehemiah rides, as he guides it this way and that, into this gate and out of that gate, winding through amid the débris of once great Jerusalem.

JERUSALEM IN RUINS—

Now the horse comes to a dead halt at the tumbled masonry, where he cannot pass. Now he shies off at the charred timbers. Now he comes along where the water under the moonlight flashes from the mouth of the brazen dragon after which the gate was named. Heavy-hearted Nehemiah! Riding in and out, now by his old home desolated, now by the defaced temple, now amid the scars of the city that had gone down under battering-ram and conflagration. The escorting party know not what Nehemiah means. Is he getting crazy? Have his own personal sorrows, added to the sorrows of the nation, unbalanced his intellect? Still goes on. Nehemiah, on horseback, rides through the fish gate, by the tower of the furnaces, by the king's pool, by the dragon well, in and out, in and out until the midnight ride is completed, and Nehemiah dismounts from his horse, and to the amazed and confounded and incredulous body-guard declares the deep secret of his heart when he says, "Come, now, let us build Jerusalem." "What, Nehemiah, have you any money?" "No." "Have you any kingly authority?" 'No." Have you any eloquence?" 'No." Yet that midnight moonlight ride of Nehemiah resulted in the glorious rebuilding of the city of Jerusalem.

The people knew not how the thing was to be done, but with great enthusiasm they cried out, "Let us rise up now and build the city." Some people laughed and said it could not be done. Some people were infuriated, and offered physical violence, and said the thing should not be done. But the workmen went right on, standing on the wall, trowel in one hand, sword in the other, until the work was gloriously completed. At that very time, in Greece, Xenophon was writing a history, and Plato was making philosophy, and Demosthenes was uttering his rhetorical thunder; but all of them together did not do as much for the world as this midnight moonlight ride of praying, courageous, home-sick, close-mouthed Nehemiah.

I. My subject first impresses me with the idea what is attachment to the house of God. Seize the bridle of that horse and stop Nehemiah. Why are you risking your life here in the night? Your horse will stumble over these ruins and fall on you. Stop this useless exposure of your life. No! Nehemiah will not stop. He at last tells us the whole story. He lets us know he was an exile in a far-distant land, and he was a servant, a cupbearer in the palace of Artaxerxes Longimanus, and one day, while he was handing the cup of wine to the king, the king said to him, "What is the matter with you, Nehemiah? You are not sick. I know you must have some great trouble. What is the matter with you?"

Then he told the king how that beloved Jerusalem was broken down; how that his father's tomb had been desecrated; how that the temple had been dishonored and defaced; how that the walls were all scattered and broken. "Well," says King Artaxerxes, "what do you want?" "O king," said the cupbearer Nehemiah, "I want to go home. I want to repair the grave of my father. I want to restore the beauty of the temple. I want to rebuild the masonry of the city wall. Beside, I want passports so that I shall not be hindered in my journey. And beside that" (as you will find in the context), "I want an order on the man who keeps your forest for just so much lumber as I may need for the rebuilding of the city."

"How long are you going to be gone?" said the king. The time for absence is arranged. "Good-by," said the king and his wife, who that day was sitting beside him in the palace. "Good-by," said Nehemiah. In hot haste this seeming adventurer comes to Jerusalem, and in my text we find him on horseback, in the midnight, riding around the ruins. It is through the spectacles of this scene that we discover the of Nehemiah for that sacred Jerusalem, which in all ages has been the type of the Church of God, our Jerusalem, which we love just as much as Nehemiah loved his Jerusalem.

The fact is that you love the house of God so much that there is no spot on earth so sacred unless it be your own fireside. The Church has been to you so much comfort and illumination that there is nothing that makes you so irate as to have it talked against. If there have been times when you have been carried into captivity by sickness, you longed for the Church, the holy Jerusalem, just as much as Nehemiah longed for his Jerusalem, and the first day you came out you came to the house of the Lord. When the temple was in ruins, as ours was ten years ago, like Nehemiah, you walked around and looked at it, and in the moonlight you stood listening if you could not hear the voice of the dead organ, the psalm of expired Sabbaths, and the clang of the communion tankards.

What Jerusalem was to Nehemiah, the house of God is to you. Sceptics and infidels may scoff at the Church as an obsolete affair, as a relic of the dark ages, as a convention of goody-goody people, but all the impression they have ever made on your mind against the Church of God is absolutely nothing. You would make more sacrifices for it to-day than for any other institution, and if it were needful you would die in its defence. There are thousands of people in this house to-day who would, with Isaac Watts, say in regard to it:

> "Zion's a garden walled around,
> Chosen and made peculiar ground;
> A little spot inclosed by grace
> Out of the world's wild wilderness."

Or you can take the better words of the kingly poet as he said, "If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning." You understand in your own experience the pathos, the homesickness, the courage, the holy enthusiasm of Nehemiah in his midnight moonlight ride around the ruins of his beloved Jerusalem.

EXPLORATION BEFORE RECONSTRUCTION.

II. Again, my text impresses me with the fact that before reconstruction there must be an exploration of ruins. Why was not Nehemiah asleep in bed? Why was not his horse stabled in the midnight? Let the police of the city arrest this midnight rider, out on some mischief, No. Nehemiah is going to rebuild the city, and he is making the preliminary exploration. In at this gate, out at that gate, east, west, north, south. By the fish gate. By the dragon well. By the tower of the furnaces. All through the ruins, The ruins must be explored before the work of reconstruction can begin.

The reason that so many people in this day, apparently converted, do not remain converted is because they did not first explore the ruin of their own heart. The reason that there are so many professed Christians who in this day lie and forge, and steal and commit adultery, and go to the penitentiary, is because they do not first learn the ruin of their own heart. They have not found out that "the heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." They had an idea that they were almost right, and they built religion as a sort of extension, as an ornamental cupola. There was a superstructure of religion built on a substratum of unrepented sins. The trouble with a good deal of modern theology is that, instead of building on the right foundation, it of an unregenerated nature. They attempt to rebuild Jerusalem before, in the midnight of conviction, they have seen the ghastliness of the ruin. They have such a poor foundation for their religion that the first north-east storm of temptation blows them down.

I have no faith in a man's conversion if he is not converted in the old-fashioned way—John Bunyan's way, John Wesley's way, John Calvin's way, Paul's way, Christ's way, God's way. A dentist said to me a few days ago, "Does that hurt?" I replied, "Of course it hurts. It is in your business as in my profession—we have to hurt before we can help; we have to explore and dig away before we can put in the gold." You will never understand redemption until you understand ruin. A man tells me that some one is a member of the Church. It makes no impression on my mind at all. I simply want to know whether he was converted in the old-fashioned way, or whether he was converted in the new-fashioned way. If he was converted in the old-fashioned way he will stand. If he was converted in the new-fashioned way he will not stand. That is all there is about it.

A man comes to me to talk about religion. The first question I ask him is, "Do you feel yourself to be a sinner?" If he say, "Well, I—yes," the hesitancy makes me feel that on Nehemiah's horse by midnight through the ruins—in at the gate of his affections, out at the gate of his will, by the dragon well; and before he has got through with that midnight ride he will drop the reins on the horse's neck, and he will take his right hand and smite on his heart, and say, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" and before he has stabled his horse he will take his feet out of the stirrups, and he will slide down on the ground, and he will kneel, crying, "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to Thy lovingkindness: according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions. For I acknowledge my transgressions; and my sin is ever before me."

Ah, my friends, you see this is

NOT A COMPLIMENTARY GOSPEL.

That is what makes some people so mad. It comes to a man of a million dollars, and impenitent in his sins, and says, "You're a pauper." It comes to a woman of fairest cheek, who has never repented, and says, "You're a leper." It comes to a man priding himself on his independence, and says, "You're bound hand and foot of the devil." It comes to our entire race and says, "You're a ruin—a ghastly ruin, an illimitable ruin, and, unless the grace of God rebuild you, an everlasting ruin." Satan sometimes says to me, "Why do you preach that truth? Why don't you preach a gospel with no repentance in it? Why don't you flatter men's hearts so that you make them feel all right? Why don't you preach a humanitarian Gospel, with no repentance in it, saying nothing about the ruin, talking all the time about the redemption? Instead of preaching to five thousand, you might preach to twenty thousand; for there would be four times as many who would come to hear a popular truth as to hear an unpopular truth, and you have voice enough to make them hear." I say, "Get thee behind me, Satan." I would rather lead five thousand souls into heaven than twenty thousand into hell. The redemption of the Gospel is a perfect farce if there is no ruin. "The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick." "If any one, though he be an angel from heaven, preach any other Gospel than this," says the apostle, "let him be accursed."

III. Again, my subject gives me a specimen of busy and

TRIUMPHANT SADNESS.

If there was any man in the world who had a right to hope and give up everything as lost, it was Nehemiah. You say, "He was cupbearer in the palace of Shushan, and it was a grand place." So it was. The hall of that palace was two hundred feet square, and the roof hovered over thirty-six marble pillars, each pillar sixty feet high; and the intense blue of the sky, and the deep green of the forest foliage, and the white of the driven snow, all hung trembling in the upholstery. But, my friends, you know very well that fine architecture will not put down home-sickness.

Yet Nehemiah did not give up. Then when you see him going among these desolated streets, and by these dismantled towers, and by the torn-up grave of his father, you would suppose that he would have been disheartened, and that he would have dismounted from his horse and gone to his room and said, "Woe is me! My father's grave is torn up. The temple is dishonored. The walls are broken down. I have no money with which to rebuild. I wish I had never been born. I wish I were dead."

Not so said Nehemiah. Although he had a grief so intense that it excited the commentary of his king, yet that penniless, expatriated up to rebuild the city. He gets his permission of absence; he gets his passports; he hastens away to Jerusalem. By night, on horseback, he rides through the ruins; he overcomes the most ferocious opposition; he arouses the piety and patriotism of the people, and in less than two months—namely, in fifty-two days, Jerusalem was rebuilt. That's what I call busy and triumphant sadness.

My friends, the whole temptation is with you, to do just the opposite to the behavior of Nehemiah, and that is to give up. You say, "I have lost my child, and can never smile again." You say, "I have lost my property, and I never can repair my fortunes." You say, "I have fallen into sin, and I never can start again for a new life." If Satan can make you form that resolution, and make you keep it, he has ruined you. Trouble is not sent to crush you, but to arouse you, to animate you, to propel you. The blacksmith does not thrust the iron into the forge, and then blow away with the bellows, and then bring the hot iron out on the anvil and beat with stroke after stroke to ruin the iron, but to prepare it for a better use. Oh, that the Lord God of Nehemiah would rouse up all broken-hearted people to rebuild!

WHEN YOU HAVE TROUBLE,

Whipped, betrayed, shipwrecked, imprisoned, Paul went right on. The Italian martyr, Algerious, sits in his dungeon writing a letter, and he dates it "From the delectable orchard of the Leonine Prison." That is what I call triumphant sadness. I knew a mother who buried her babe on Friday, and on the Sabbath appeared in the house of God and said, "Give me a class; give me a Sabbath-school class. I have no child now left me, and I would like to have a class of little children. Give me real poor children. Give me a class off the back street." That, I say, is beautiful. That is triumphant sadness.

At three o'clock this afternoon, in —a parlor pictured and statuetted—there will be from ten to twenty destitute children of the street. It has been so every Sabbath afternoon at three o'clock for sixteen years. These destitute children receive religious instruction, concluding with cakes and sandwiches. How do I know that that has been going on for sixteen years? I know it in this way. That was the first home in Philadelphia where I was called to comfort a great sorrow. They had a splendid boy, and he had been drowned at Long Branch. The father and mother almost idolized the boy, and the sob and shriek of that father and mother as they hung over the coffin resound in my ears to-day.

A BEAUTIFUL PARLOR IN PHILADELPHIA

There seemed to be no use of praying, for when I knelt down to pray, the outcry in the room drowned out all the prayer. But the Lord comforted that sorrow. They did not forget their trouble. If you should go this snowy afternoon into Laurel Hill, you would find a monument with the word "Walter" inscribed upon it, and a wreath of fresh flowers around the name. I think there has not been an hour in sixteen years, winter or summer, when there was not a wreath of fresh flowers around Walter's name. But the Christian mother who sends those flowers there, having no child left, Sabbath afternoons mothers ten or twenty of the lost ones of the street. That is beautiful. That is what I call busy and triumphant sadness.

Here is a man who has lost his property. He does not go to hard drinking. He does not destroy his own life. He comes and says, "Harness me for Christian work. My money's gone. I have no treasures on earth: I want treasures in heaven. I have a voice and a heart to serve God." You say that that man has failed. He has not failed, he has triumphed. Oh, I wish I could persuade all the people who have any kind of trouble

TO NEVER GIVE UP!

I wish they would look at the midnight rider of the text, and that the four hoofs of that beast on which Nehemiah rode might cut to pieces all your discouragements and hardships and trials. Don't give up! Who is going to give up, when on the bosom of God he can have all his troubles hushed? Give up! Never think of giving up.

Are you borne down with poverty? A little child was found holding her dead mother's hand in the darkness of a tenement-house, and some one coming in, the little girl looked up, while holding her dead mother's hand, and said, "Oh, I do wish that God had made more light for poor folks!" "My dear, God will be your light; God will be your shelter; God will be your home." Are you borne down with the bereavements of life? Is the house lonely now that the child is gone? Do not give up. Think of what said when the minister asked him why he put so much care on the little graves in the cemetery—so much more care than on the larger graves—and the old sexton said, "Sir, you know that 'of such is the kingdom of heaven,' and I think the Saviour is pleased when He sees so much white clover growing around these little graves." But when the minister pressed the old sexton for a more satisfactory answer, the old sexton said, "Sir, about these larger graves, I don't know who are the Lord's saints and who are not; but you know, sir, it is clean different with the bairns."

Oh, if you have had that keen, tender, indescribable sorrow that comes from the loss of a child, do not give up! The old sexton was right. It is

ALL WELL WITH THE BAIRNS.

Or, if you have sinned, if you have sinned grievously—sinned until you have been cast out by the church, sinned until you have been cast out by society, do not give up. Perhaps there may be in this house one that could truthully utter the lamentation of another:

"Once I was pure as the snow, but I fell—
Fell, like a snowflake, from heaven to hell—
Fell, to be trampled as filth in the street—
Fell to be scoffed at, spit on, and beat;
Praying, cursing, wishing to die,
Selling my soul to whoever would buy,
Dealing in shame for a morsel of bread,
Hating the living, and fearing the dead."

Do not give up. One like unto the Son of God comes to you to-day, saying, "Go and sin no more," while He cries out to your assailants, "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone at her." Oh, there is no reason why any one in this house, by reason of should give up! Are you a foreigner, and in a strange land? Nehemiah was in exile. Are you penniless? Nehemiah was poor. Are you home-sick? Nehemiah was home-sick. Are you broken-hearted? Nehemiah was broken-hearted.

But just see him in the text, riding along the sacrileged grave of his father, and by the dragon well, and through the fish gate, and by the king's pool, in and out, in and out, the moonlight falling on the broken masonry, which throws a long shadow at which the horse shies, and at the same time that moonlight kindling up the features of this man till you see not only the mark of sad reminiscence, but the courage, the hope, the enthusiasm of a man who knows that Jerusalem will be rebuilt. I pick you up to-day, out of your sin and out of your sorrow, and I put you against the warm heart of Christ. "The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms."

An Atheist's Refusal.—At the West Ham Hall, while Mr. Moody was preaching, he asked, "Who will take salvation to-night?" Amid a chorus of "I will's," an atheist cried out, "I won't." A man who was steeped in sin, and who was sitting by his side, cried out, "I will," and there and then accepted Christ. He attended a meeting afterward at the Tonbridge Chapel, Euston Road, and testified how the Lord had rescued him. He said, "If that man had not cried out 'I won't,' I never should have said 'I will.'"

Christianity is Making Progress in Japan. and has received an impetus from the journey to Europe by a native noble. The Rev. H. Loomin, writing home from Japan, says: "One of the ablest and most prominent men in Japan, Ito Hirobumi, has just returned from a visit to Germany, and it is reported that he has addressed the Mikado, urging the truth and importance of Christianity. He states that he formerly supposed that the Emperor William and Bismarck professed to be Christians as a matter of policy, while they had no regard for it at all in their hearts. But now he says that this was a mistaken idea. He found that both men were sincere Christians, and both urged him to seek this religion for his own welfare and happiness as well as that of his country. Such has been the influence of Ito's report that the chief officers in the Cabinet are becoming interested in the study of Christianity, and the former Court teacher of Confucianism is no longer opposing the Gospel, but also carefully reading the Scriptures. In a course of study recently prescribed for all the Shinto priests, the Bible and 'Martin's Evidences of Christianity' are included."

SOME OF THE SIGNS OF THE END.

By Rev. W. J. Christie.

I.—Increased Ungodliness, to which all the New Testament prophecies point, is the forerunner and main cause of the great coming Antichristian tribulation. Consequently, the apostles speak of "perilous times," when the mocking inhabitants of the world shall run riot in sin. Some may point to the activity of certain sections of the Church, to increased evangelistic work, and the earnest efforts made to reach the masses. This not only does not refute our statement, but it proves it. As the world darkens toward its midnight the church catches the midnight cry, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh," and is stirred up thereby to increased activity. Infidelity, Communism, Nihilism, and Revolution now go hand in hand, and he need not necessarily be a misanthrope who looks with foreboding into the deepening gloom of the near future.

II.—Wars and Rumors of Wars is a sign given by the Redeemer in His prophetic discourse in Matthew. It may also be found in the writings of the prophets. Many persons have supposed, and probably may still suppose, that civilization will do away with war. It never will. Nothing will stay the progress of war but the advent of the Prince of Peace. Many thought that permanent peace was going to follow

THE GREAT WARS OF NAPOLEON.

But it was not so. During the last thirty years the struggle of nation against nation has deluged the world with blood. Scarcely any people upon earth have been free from bloodshed. Though there is now comparative peace, does not everything point to awful and deadly conflict in the near future? May we not now be in the midst of that deceptive lull, that time when men shall say, "Peace and safety," just as sudden destruction cometh upon them? We believe that the awful final struggle is coming, and that vast preparations are made for it. France, with pent-up wrath, waits to hurl her armies against Germany; Russia, with her overweening ambition, and her domestic troubles, is longing to seize upon the decaying Ottoman Empire, and is casting a longing eye upon the British Indian Empire. In every land seeds of bitter strife are sown, and our eyes must be indeed closed to the momentous events happening around us if we do not clearly perceive the culminating fulfilment of this sign in the wars and rumors of wars among which it is our lot to live.

III.—Physical Signs. Of these we may make four divisions: (1) Earthquakes. (2) Famines. (3) Pestilences. (4) Celestial Signs. Our reference to each of them must be very brief.

(1)—EARTHQUAKES.

Making all allowance for deficiency of record, it seems hard to believe that there could have been many great earthquakes before the Christian era. The like cannot be said of the century in which we live. Within it there have been over 5000 earthquakes, some two hundred of them "terrible, exceedingly." The largest number, this, recorded as occurring in the same space and time.

A scientific serial states, "That the closing years of the last decade was a period of the greatest and most universal terrestrial convulsions which history has on its records." "No less grand and impressive," it writes, "have been the celestial phenomena; the earth beneath and the heavens above have been prolific of wonders."

(2)—FAMINES.

No thoughtful observer of events can have failed to see that the epoch included in the last fifteen or twenty years may be justly termed an epoch of famine. Multitudes of the earth's inhabitants have perished from starvation, and others have suffered to an awful extent. But much of the fulfilment of this sign, we believe, lies in the near future.

(3)—PESTILENCES.

There have been pestilences in the past, but these will be dwarfed into insignificance by the pestilence of the future. Whether the pending perihelia of planets will produce the effects, as some astronomers declare it will, we know not. It, however, seems striking that such should be announced at a time when expounders of prophecy are looking for the times of unprecedented tribulation.

(4)—CELESTIAL SIGNS.

Men of science speak of wondrous conformations in the planetary system that have not existed before for ages—of strange appearances in the sun and other heavenly bodies, the result of which can scarcely be guessed at. It seems to be a very general opinion among astronomers that the condition of the sun and other heavenly bodies is abnormal.

IV.—The Mystic Euphrates. In the drying up or decay of the Turkish Empire, the mystic Euphrates, we have another marked sign of the fast approaching end. This takes place under the sixth vial, as recorded in Revelation 16 : 12. This disruption has been going on for a series of years. One slice after another has been cut off the once mighty empire, till now it is scarcely counted among the powers of Europe—except as a prey to be quickly dismembered and quarrelled over—the carcass upon which the eagles of Europe will gather. A very brief period will bring about the total overthrow and demolition of the once mighty power, after which it may be confidently expected that events will move forward with greatly-increased celerity till the end come.

V.—Return of the Jews. Close upon the destruction of the power of Turkey may be expected to their own land. For Scriptural proof that they must return, see Isa. 11 : 10–16; Ezek. 39 : 28; Ezek. 37 : 21–26; Jer. 30 : 3; Amos 9 : 15; Zech. 8 : 8; Zech. 10 : 6–10. Already a considerable exodus has begun. God is in many places driving them out by persecution, and preparing them for a return to their own land. This is especially the case in Russia and Germany, where Jews greatly abound. With the return of the Jews will end the times of the Gentiles, and that return will speedily be followed by the Advent of the Prince of Peace.

THE RETURN OF THE JEWS

VI.—The Three Frogs. In Rev. 14 : 13, 14, there unclean spirits like frogs are said to come out of the mouth of the dragon (Satan), the beast (Antichrist), and the false prophet (Popery and Mohammedanism), and to go out to gather the nations to war. There can be little doubt but that these like frogs, represent certain evil principles. That from the dragon is notably Infidelity; that from the beast is Revolutionary Socialistic opinion; and that from the false prophet, violent propagandism of corrupt Christianity and Mohammedan error. The first spirit from Satan is developing itself in open denial of the existence of God, and in the errors of spiritualism. Is it not an awful sign of the times, and one that must hurry on the vengeance of a justly incensed Jehovah, to find an English constituency returning to Parliament as their representative an avowed infidel? And is it not yet a more awful sign to find the responsible members of an English Government declare it to be their intention to seek to alter the law for the purpose of admitting that infidel? Surely, as in Pharaoh's day, the frogs have gone up, even into the king's palace.

The second spirit, that of Revolutionary Democracy, may be seen in the Nihilism, Communism, Fenianism, and intense Radicalism of the age. It seeks the subversion of all constituted authorities, and may be expressed by the one word lawlessness. It has leavened many classes of society, and will increase in power till the development of the lawless one.

The object of the going forth of these three frogs is, we are told, to gather the kings of the earth to battle to that great day of God Almighty. The activity of their movement, and the loudness of their croaking at the present time, is a clear indication of the predicted approach of that great event.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Trying to be an Infidel.—At a Recent meeting Mr. Oatts, a successful home missionary, said: "A young man came into our institute to me one night, and said, 'Look here, Mr. Oatts; I have been trying to be an infidel for three years, and I cannot be one. What am I to do?' I pointed him to 'the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world,' and oh, you should have heard the prayer that young man offered up to God. I shall never forget it; he gave himself to Christ there and then, and that would-be infidel is now receiving an education to qualify him to be a medical missionary of the cross of the Saviour."

An Awakened Curiosity.—At a Gospel Temperance meeting, Mr. R. Simpson said: "A friend I know was going home after a Saturday night's debauch, and as he was passing along the street he saw some friends going in at an open door. In his half-drunken state he said, 'What's that?' and he passed on. But God awakened his curiosity, and he turned again. Seeing the people still crowding in, he determined to see what was going on, so he entered the doorway. It was an evangelistic meeting. The Lord met him there, and he was led by the Holy Spirit to look to Jesus as his present and Almighty Saviour, and up to now that man has been used in God's hands to save more than fifty of his perishing fellow-men."

A Rich Boon Quickly Taken.—At a Testimony meeting a young man said: "About a fortnight ago I was in a church where I heard a minister say he was in favor of a steady-going process of conversion—one that would take perhaps two years of hard struggle. I went to a meeting that evening and heard Mr. Scroggie, and staying to the after meeting, a friend said, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved.' I went away that night undecided, but returned the following evening, when another person spoke to me in the after-meeting, saying, 'Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved.' I was led to trust in Christ that night, and I was saved, though when I went to the meeting I expected I should have to undergo the two years' process."

The Doctor and the Puddler.—Mr. Reid related: "About thirty years ago I was living in Yorkshire, where I knew a doctor and a man who worked in Kirkstall Forge, as a puddler. There is often work produced by puddlers, through carelessness, or from some fault in the material, which makes what is called 'wasters,' for which the men get no payment. Well, this puddler's wife fell ill, and was attended by the doctor, who gave her medicine and paid her every attention, but, notwithstanding this, she died. In due course the doctor sent in an account, and then called for payment; but the puddler said, 'No, no; your job was a "waster," and I never pay for wasters, because I never get paid for them myself.' Now, friends, if you are suffering from that deadly disease, sin, Jesus is ready to cure you, and He never makes a 'waster.' However bad the disease may be in you, it only requires faith on your part to be made perfectly whole."

A Saved Woman's Gratitude.—"I Bless the Lord," said a genial Christian lady, "that three years ago He saved me, and made me a better mother and wife than ever I was before. A short time ago I took part in the Midnight Rescue Meetings which we thought so fruitless. Well, to-night, on my way down to the meeting I met a young woman, who stopped me, saying, 'You don't seem to know me?' 'I can't say I have the pleasure of doing so,' I said. 'Don't you remember me? You took me from two drunken sailors. I was saved that night in the meeting to which you took me. I am in a good situation. To-day I said to my mistress, 'Oh, that I could get back to the city to see the good woman who rescued me,' and she kindly said,

'Go then, by all means, but remember!' So I came, and I thank God I have met you. I pray for you every night and morning.' For the many months of hard, disagreeable work we saw little fruit of our labors, but I think that if only this one soul was saved it is sufficient recompense for all our toil."

"Hard up" and "Low down."—A Man recently gave the following testimony: "About nine months ago I was what some people call very low down; some folks speak about being hard up, but I was hard down, through vice and misery such as only a few who have given way to their passions, without stint, can realize. When in this abject condition I tried to burst the bonds of sin with which I was tied, and to stand upright by the effort of my own will, but it is almost needless to say that it was an utter failure, and the attempt only served the purpose of the devil to bind me closer to him. I was in great agony of soul, and yearned for relief, but it was long before I knew where to go for it; but when I did really believe in the power of God to save and keep me, I flung myself upon Him, and He for Christ's sake saved me from the terrible enthralment of the devil, and gave a precious freedom, which I enjoy to this hour."

A Cripple's Work for Christ.—Mr. Galloway said that "An elderly woman in London gave up all her time to the service of the Lord. One day in carrying out her errands of mercy she fell and broke her leg. The doctor told her that she would never rise again from her bed. Sadly she thought that her days of usefulness were at an end. Only those who know the joy of the work can fully sympathize with her. Not only was the confinement to the house irksome, but the thought of the poor ones among whom she labored lay very heavily upon her heart. By and by she devised a plan for continuing her work for the Saviour. She could not go to the people, therefore the people must come to her. She got a lady to give her a quantity of books, which she lent to her neighbors, and when they called to renew them, she spoke about Christ to each one personally, and thus continued her labors for the Master, though in a different way, and many found salvation through her instrumentality."

The Best Night's Work of His Life.—The Rev. William Ross said: "One night, in the open air, I happened to say, 'It may be a matter of life or death to some one here to-night that they come into or stay out of the meeting we are going to hold in-doors.' A man was passing at that moment to begin work on the night shift; hearing my words he came in for a few minutes, and then rose and went out. A worker went after him, but was assured that he would return in a few minutes. I found the man in the after-meeting, and asked him, 'What kind of life have you led?' 'Practically I am an abstainer, but I now feel that I want the "one thing needful," which the speaker told us about.' 'What made you go out?' 'It is my turn on the night shift; I went out to get my mate to take it for me to-night, and I take his to-morrow and Wednesday night in exchange.' This man decided for Christ that Monday night. I have seen him thrice since, and he seems to be rejoicing in the Lord and in His salvation."

A Magdalene's Last Hours.—"I was Holding a cottage-meeting in Chatham, when word was brought to me that Mary Ann, a young woman who was one of the most notorious prostitutes of that town, wanted to see me, as she was ill. I went to the house where she lived. She was leader of about eight hundred bad women, the decoy of the house, lying in a hovel surrounded by dirt-heaps, and every imaginable filth. With a strong effort of will, I crushed down the feelings of disgust which threatened to overcome me, and spoke to her of the love of Jesus, but she was in a state of great despondency and got no relief. Her sister Maggie came in, and I said to her, 'Now, Maggie! will you of your own free will promise me on God's Word never to return to your evil life, if with the help of God I take care of Mary Ann?' Bursting into tears, Maggie replied, 'If any one had spoken so to us before, we would have given up this life long ago, but we were treated by men and lived as though we were lost sheep.' I soon had them both in better quarters, and then learned that their dead mother had been a Christian, and her last two hours had been spent in praying for her sinful girls. The change did Mary Ann good, for she recovered the tone of her mind, though her lungs would never be better. She was able to understand the way of salvation, and after a fearful struggle to enter upon it. One day she said to me, 'Mr. Lee! don't you see the fiends of hell sitting round the bed, and the devil at the foot?' As death was drawing near, I asked her to give testimony of Christ's closeness to her in the dread hour. She promised to do so if her strength was equal to the occasion. As her spirit was passing away, I was sent for to see her die. On reaching her bedside, I saw that she was almost insensible, and that if I wanted her testimony, I must have it now. So I cried into her ear, 'Mary Ann, is Christ precious to your soul still?' Her whole frame quivered, her eyes opened, and she said with a strong voice, 'Yes! yes!' In a short time she fell asleep in Jesus."

AMONG JEWS IN FRANCE.

Pastor Maurice Hirsch, who is laboring in France, thus writes of his work, under date of Paris, July 5th, 1884: "I have just returned from Nancy, full of joy and thankfulness to the Lord. Neither of the young Jews was able to accompany me, they having been detained by illness. My heart beat very quickly when I found myself on the very spot where I had been brought up, and where I was about to meet so many acquaintances of my youthful days, and among whom I was determined to bear witness to the truth of the Gospel. So I found myself at first a little perplexed. Nancy is no longer what it was when I lived there. I looked out, but in vain, for my old acquaintances, and afterward set to work to call upon those people who had written to me, after having received the Bible from me. My first visit was to her letters gave me to understand that she had received a brilliant education. She wished to become a believer, but had not the power. My first interview with her was of the most interesting description, but she was afraid of her husband, so she begged me not to return until she wrote to me. Three days after I received a letter from her asking me to go and see her. I went. She said, 'Let us not speak, but may God alone speak to us.' We knelt down and prayed in silence, and after three quarters of an hour she broke the silence by saying, 'I thank Thee, O Lord, that now I know Thee, and Jesus Christ whom Thou hast sent.'

"At the house of another lady I was not so well received—that is, not by herself, but by her husband, who, on knowing who I was, opened the door, and said to me, 'Fly quickly, or I will throw you out of the window.' I saw that there was no use in discussing with this madman; but two days after I met his wife in the street, when I had an opportunity of speaking with her, and learning from her also that she was not far from the kingdom of God. She asked me to write to her, and pray for her and her husband.

"On the Friday evening and Saturday morning I went to the Synagogue with a small packet of Bibles, and when the service was over I waited outside in the court belonging to the Synagogue, and began to give them; but, as it happened to me in Paris, the concierge came to interfere and to order me out. In a short time the crowd began to disperse, and he then let me go on with my work. Three accepted the Bible, but the fourth threw it in my face, crying out, but on looking at me a second time, he retraced his steps and cried out, 'Is that you, Maurice?' He had once been one of my best friends when I was a young man. He shook hands with me, regretted insulting me, afterward embraced me. I saw that the poor fellow was suffering intensely. 'You have done badly,' he said, 'and ought not to have left us.' He took me with him to dinner, where I met several of my old college comrades. There were about ten of them, who did nothing first but abuse me, and insisted on not remaining to dine while I was present. I said nothing, but prayed in silence. The silence calmed them. I used this opportunity for speaking to them and for explaining to them how the Lord had drawn me to Himself, and begged of them not to resist the influence of His grace. They listened to me, and I saw tears flowing from many eyes. They then asked my pardon for their rudeness. I offered them a Bible each, and they all accepted one.

'BEGONE, YOU PROTESTANT MISSIONARY!'

"I returned again to the Synagogue, and this time the Jews there were about to ill-treat me, but these friends hindered them. In this scuffle but 499 were distributed, and will be read, and by our prayer the reading will bear fruit. Let us pray principally for these ten young men, whom I often saw during my visit, there, and who themselves helped me to carry the Bibles. There is in all this the beginning of a great work."

A BIBLE WAS TORN IN SHREDS,

DISEASE AND DEATH—A CLOSET MEDITATION.

By the Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D.

What various sources of danger there are! How rapidly the panorama of peril passes its varied scenes before us in the living pages of this Gospel! Storms, demons, diseases, death! Yet how completely does my Lord overmaster them all! There are troubles which make us ashamed, and these are the very hardest to bear. Such was the demoniacal possession in the case of the man, and the issue of blood in the case of the woman. Oh, that I might have the woman's faith! Oh, that I might have the perseverance to pass through the throng, so that I might but touch the hem of His garment, even if I may not have the courage to throw myself at His feet and clasp His knees!

A stream of healing virtue is always proceeding from my Lord. And yet I carry my spiritual ailments so long, when I might be relieved by a touch! I fear I lack the woman's faith and humility. She did not think it necessary that the Lord should exert Himself for her, or perform any conspicuous act. If she but touched Him—it was not indispensable that He should touch her. It was not important that the work should be seen and known by the multitude. It was enough if she were healed and if He healed her.

And yet, although she seemed to have so much of the Lord, how much there was that she did not have. He was her Saviour and she was saved, but when He called she threw herself at His feet with fear and trembling. She did not know the infinite tenderness and compassionateness of Jesus. Her faith, under the cover of humility, had, as it were, stolen a great blessing, and He might be offended at what she had done or the manner of doing it. Instead of that, He calls her "Daughter," as if He would teach her, and teach me, that the very fact that I have received a great blessing from Him makes Him feel that He is my kinsman! O wondrous love!

And this love will triumph over death. This Physician gives healing before death and resurrection after. He is not only the resurrection and the life, but He is the life and the resurrection. He speaks, and it is done. He commands, and power goes with the command to secure its fulfilment. Oh, that I may be most anxious to be raised from a death of sin to a life of righteousness! Speak, Lord, to every dead faculty in me and call it to life. In newness of life may I may serve Thee, and, serving Thee, may I fear no storm, nor Satan, nor sickness, nor death.

NOTICE.

AT the commencement of the new volume on January 1st, 1885,

The Christian Herald

WILL BE

ENLARGED.

The size of the pages will be increased in length and width, so that fifteen pages will contain as much reading matter as is contained in sixteen pages of the present size. The price of the paper will not be increased.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Gov. Cleveland's Letter Accepting the Democratic nomination for the Presidency was published on August 20th. It is a much shorter document than that issued by Mr. Blaine. He heartily approves of the platform adopted at Chicago, but does not discuss it, nor the tariff question, considering that the Presidency being an executive office, it is the duty of the holder to faithfully execute whatever laws may be passed by the legislative branch of the Government. He remarks that "we proudly call ours a government by the people," and points out the various ways in which that government may be wrested from the hands of a people and be held by a class or party. He advocates an amendment to the Constitution disqualifying the President from re-election, in order to prevent him using the patronage at his disposal to gain another term rather than in the public interest. He thinks that the interest of workingmen should receive more attention from the Government than they have done hitherto, and recommends that discrimination should be exercised in receiving immigrants, only those being welcomed who will naturalize themselves. Civil servants, the candidate believes, should be selected for "their ascertained fitness and the value of their work, and they should neither be expected nor allowed to do questionable party service." Governor Cleveland concludes with an expression of his idea of the kind of government the people want—an idea which Republicans as well as Democrats will indorse. He says: "The statesmanship they require consists in honesty and frugality, a prompt response to the needs of the people as they arise, and the vigilant protection of all their varied interests."

Gen. B. F. Butler's Manifesto is a Lengthy arraignment of both the great political parties. As Butler has at various times worked in both of them he is able to point out their faults, and he has a happy faculty of placing them in their strongest light. His four cardinal doctrines are: "1. Hostility to all monopolies in commerce, industries, and lands. 2. The preservation of the national legal-tender currency of the people, constitutionally issued by Congress. 3. The needs of all men and women who labor in the production of wealth, to be protected against the encroachments of those who absorb and consume without producing. 4. The necessity for reform and correction of abuses in government, so that its pressure on the people would be made as light as possible; its administration effective, to guard the rights of American citizens at home and abroad; to make public servants, individual or incorporate, subservient to the use and will of the people only, so as to restore the prosperity of the country, with equal rights, equal burdens, equal powers, and equal privileges of all people." He recommends his friends to ally themselves with the minority in every State, so that there shall be a mixed electoral ticket and a distribution of votes between Butler and his allied candidate pro rata in the electoral college, should the fusion ticket prove successful. There is nothing unconstitutional in the scheme, but its adoption may lead to results more interesting than satisfactory, as it will lead to the possibility of a trade of votes in the electoral college between the day of election and that of the sending in of the result to Congress.

The Sinking of the Tallapoosa on the Night of August 21st is an event which reflects little credit on the naval officers in charge. The United States ship, whose name was made familiar to the public three years ago by reason of her being fitted up during President Garfield's illness to take him for a sea trip, acquired the soubriquet of "Old Calamity" from the numerous disasters with which she was associated. She was on a voyage from Boston, Mass., to Newport, R. I., on Thursday last, when a schooner was observed approaching. It was a clear night, and the schooner's lights were seen fifteen minutes before the disaster. The Tallapoosa, as a steamer, was bound to give the schooner the right of way, but she ran right across her bows, and the schooner knocked a hole in her which sent her to the bottom. Some of the officers and crew jumped overboard, others climbed into the rigging as the steamer sank, and all but four were rescued. The Tallapoosa was one of Robeson's favorite boats, and he had gorgeous staterooms placed on deck and fitted up for the occupation of himself and his gang of admirers. This and other disasters which have occurred lately indicate that the seamanship of the navy is about on a par with the ships.

Prohibition Prospects in New York State have been investigated by a representative of the Times, a Republican journal which this year is supporting the Democratic candidate for the Presidency. The growth of Prohibition feeling surprised this journalist, who thus writes of the party in Niagara County: "The population of this county is, in round numbers, sixty thousand, and its full vote is twelve thousand. Although mainly a Republican county, its vote for the past ten years has been more and more uncertain. There has been for years past a nucleus of hard-headed Prohibitionists in every part of Niagara, who have, year after year, kept up the show of holding all party conventions, and always putting a ticket in the field, even in years when the Prohibition vote in the county was less than one hundred. They have attached to them a large and influential body of the Republican party, including many of the ministers. There are some figures from the results of past years that are deeply significant of the fact that the Prohibition sentiment, in spite of the ridicule of both the great parties, and the flattery and cajolery of the Republican party, has become rooted in the affections of a large number of the voters of this vicinity. One of the prominent members of the party said: 'We have started to make a campaign in earnest. I cannot tell you particularly what is being done; in fact, I think that, so far, our party sadly lacks organization; but there is time enough to make that all up. With a vigorous organization in Niagara County, and such funds as we can raise, I think that the vote for St. John can easily be made one thousand in the county; and if there were a committee to provide speakers and meetings all over the county that figure might be doubled.'" There are indications in other States, especially in the rural districts, of a marked increase of Prohibition sentiment, which is of the practical kind that can be counted on at the polls.

Lieut. Greely's Opinion of the Prospects of success in Arctic exploration were given to the press last week. He said: "I do not think the north pole can be reached unless every circumstance hitherto found to be unfavorable should prove favorable to the party attempting to reach the pole. If it is to be done at all, it will be done by way of Franz Josef Land. It could never have been reached by the Jeannette's route. That there is an open polar sea I am well-nigh certain. This is proved by the ice drifting out of Mussel Bay and the Spitzbergen in midwinter, and the northern drift of the polar pack experienced by Pavy and Lockwood. Men can stand two winters very well at Franklin Bay, but physical strength rapidly deteriorates. If we had had every supply and necessary of food, we could have lived perhaps eight or ten years at Lady Franklin Bay." It will be remembered that all the party were in excellent health when they arrived at Cape Sabine, and if the Government had kept faith with them all might have returned safely. But the promised food was not left at the appointed place, and the brave men were left to starve. Several of the bodies of the dead heroes have been exhumed, and it was found that portions of flesh had been cut away, which were, it is presumed, eaten by the starving men while demented with the agonies of starvation.

The Remains of Mr. J. A. MacGahan, the famous war correspondent, were received in New York on August 25th by the Press Club, with appropriate honors. They have been brought from Constantinople, where Mr. MacGahan died, to his own country in a United States man-of-war. After lying in state in the New York City Hall the care of the body was transferred to a deputation from Ohio, who removed it to that State for burial. Mr. George F. Williams, of the Herald, delivered an address on the occasion, in the course of which he gave an interesting sketch of the career of Mr. MacGahan, describing his services during several European wars, his ride to Khiva, his journey in the Arctic regions, and finally his letters from Bulgaria, which led to the liberation of that country. He alluded to the high honors paid by the governments of Russia, Turkey, and the United States to the remains of the deceased and through him to the profession of journalism.

A Bad Eminence is Occupied by two American cities in the opinion of the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Scudder, of Chicago, who was for many years a missionary in India. He expresses the opinion that "for unmixed wickedness and utter moral depravity no city of Asia could equal Chicago or New York," and that this continent has a class of villains "lower and meaner than the lowest and meanest in India or China."

About Forty Colored Ministers in the South will receive THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for another year through the kindness of friends who have sent money for the purpose. They are grateful, and write in strong terms of the assistance in their work they derive from its pages. They are striving, amid many difficulties, not the least of which is that of their own defective knowledge, to lead their brethren to Christ and help them to live godly lives. The hints and helps contained in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are of great service to them, and their congregations share in the benefit. Thus every dollar becomes a means of blessing to many families. Last year more than two hundred ministers were thus gratuitously supplied, through the liberality of our friends. Every name we have to drop from our list means a disappointment to some. We trust those names will be few. Among the subscriptions to the fund received last week were five dollars from W. S. M., of Philadelphia. Other subscriptions were acknowledged by mail.

The Cure of Two Ladies at Norwalk, Conn., by faith and prayer, has been effected through the agency of Miss M. M. Hutchins, of Brooklyn, who was herself cured of spinal disease by faith, as narrated in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 19th. Miss Hutchins went to Norwalk two weeks ago to visit friends, and among others was a Miss Mattie Moore. This young lady has been confined to her room more than four years, the result of a fall on the ice. Her mother was also an invalid, and for five years has been in bed, and not able even to turn herself over. Miss Hutchins visited the mother and daughter on Sunday, August 17th, at their residence on Plymouth Avenue, and prayed with them that they might be healed. Mrs. Moore began at once to feel returning strength, and the same afternoon sat up for a few moments. On Monday she walked about the room, and on Thursday went out for a walk, which she has continued to do since. Miss Moore has also received healing, and was so far recovered before Miss Hutchins left that she accompanied her friend to the garden gate as she departed. Both ladies are confident of complete recovery.

Seventeen Missionaries for China Expect to sail from San Francisco early in October. They are being sent by the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Among them are Miss Laura Haygood, sister of Dr. Atticus G. Haygood, Dr. Young J. Allen, and Rev. W. A. Bonnell, President of Covington College. Miss Haygood will act as superintendent of all the women's work of the Southern Methodist missions in China, which comprises seven day schools for elementary pupils, boys and girls, taught by the missionaries, and a number of Bible women, who read Scriptures to those who will hear them. Miss Haygood also hopes to organize a girls' high school, of which she will have oversight. This is to be a boarding-school for native girls. Mr. Bonnell will organize and teach a boys' high school. Dr. Young J. Allen, of Georgia, is head of the Chinese mission of the Southern Methodist Church, and is a mandarin in Shanghai.

The Dedication of a Reform Club Building at Plainfield, N. J., on August 19th, was made the occasion of a Temperance demonstration, which for enthusiasm and extent was unprecedented in New Jersey. The city was resplendent with decorations, and the insignia of forty reform clubs, which had gathered to celebrate the dedication of the new Reform Club building. About two thousand delegates were present from all parts of the State. Ever since Messrs. Mabee and English concluded their work in Plainfield, last February, the Temperance cause has progressed, until now the Plainfield Reform Club numbers eight hundred and fifty members, and about five thousand signatures to the pledge have been obtained. Besides this, the women of all the churches, except the Catholic, have a strong organization in the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, in active sympathy with the Reform Club. The necessity for a large meeting-room has been apparent for some time, and finally efforts to secure one culminated in the purchase of the Second Baptist Church building, at the corner of Second Street and Central Avenue, which was specially fitted up at a cost of about $8000, all paid. This is an illustration of the permanent character of the work of Messrs. Mabee and English.

A Bird's Curious Mistake has Caused Some amusement at Leominster, Mass. A child in that city placed in the garden a small piece of looking-glass in an upright position, and for a week a sparrow has spent three hours each day capering in front of it. It will stand and peck away at its reflected self until it gets thoroughly excited, then run back and forth along the fence, then return to its attack, and continue it until it falls exhausted and apparently dead. On recovering it flies away, only to return at the same hour the next day and renew the contest. The sparrow evidently supposes that in fighting its own reflection it is doing battle with some deadly foe. Human beings never make such mistakes, though we often hear of men being their own worst enemy. Such men, looking back on a misspent life, will wish that at the commencement of their evil courses they had seen themselves in a true light, and had entered on a struggle with themselves, ending in the annihilation of self and the exaltation of Jesus as Ruler of their lives (Rom. 7 : 18, 25).

A Peculiar Lawsuit has been Commenced in New York against the West Shore Railroad Company. It appears that for some time past passengers have been allowed to board express trains on that line which go past the stations they wish to stop at. In all cases the passenger suffers double loss; he has to pay for every mile traversed beyond his station, and when he alights he has to pay his fare back. One of these sufferers is suing the company to recover the extra fare. The company insist that he ought to have inquired before the train started how far it would go before stopping. It would be well in other matters if that practice were adopted. It often happens that people who "want to see life" mean to go only a little way on the dangerous road, but not to go so far as to contract injury, and they find they are unable to stop. The fascination, the strength of temptation, and, after a time, the force of habit carry them far beyond the point where they meant to stop, and they never do stop until they lie in the grave of the drunkard, or the gambler, or the victim of the passions. The only safe course with regard to sinful indulgence is that prescribed by the wise king (Prov. 4 : 14, 15).

"Morphine Laura" is the Sobriquet Acquired by a girl whom Jere McAuley is trying to rescue from a life of shame and from the habits engendered by it. She was anxious to be saved, and went to the Cremorne Mission, attracted by the knowledge that women such as she had been reclaimed through God's blessing on Mr. McAuley's work. In her case, the way to peace was impeded by her habit of using morphine. It has become a favorite drug of fallen women. When conscience and shame disturb them, and they become depressed in spirits, they use morphine to make them cheerful. Small doses of a quarter of a grain have that effect at first, but with its continued use larger doses are required. When "Morphine Laura" went to Cremorne she was taking sixty-four grains a day. Mr. McAuley dare not insist on the practice being suddenly stopped, lest she should lose her reason or her life. He therefore tried to obtain admission for her into a hospital. Strange as it may appear, his application failed at all the three large hospitals of the city. The fact proves the urgent need existing for some special institution for the benefit of this neglected class. Mr. McAuley hopes, if subscriptions continue to come in, to have his Home for Fallen Women established this fall. If he can get it started there is a prospect of his obtaining orders for needlework from dry goods houses in the city, which will make it, to some extent, self-supporting.

THE GLORY IN THE REAR.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And the angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them."—EXODUS 14 : 19, 20.

"The glory of the Lord shall be thy rearward."—ISAIAH 58 : 8.

"For the Lord will go before you; and the God of Israel will be your rearward."—ISAIAH 52 : 12.

The Uses of the Pillar in the Desert—God Still with Them who are with Him—I. The Divine Presence Removed—When They Needed it Most—Always a Day of Trouble—Wrongly Accounted for—Trouble not Always Chastisement—II. The Divine Presence Still Near—A Guard Instead of a Guide—Seen by Looking Back—III. The Presence Revealed—A Trial of Faith—Taught their Best Guidance—God's Word Unpleasantly Laid Home—Why the Cloud Went behind—IV. A Future Clearer Revelation—All-Surrounding Light—Looking for Christ's Coming—V. The Twofold Aspect of the Presence.

WHEN the Israelites left the place of their bondage and came to the edge of the wilderness, a visible token of the Lord's presence and leadership was granted to them. They saw high in the air a pillar, which by day might be compared to rising smoke, but at night became a flame of fire. Such displays on a small scale were usual in the march of armies, but this was of supernatural origin. Where it moved the people were to follow; it was to be their companion, that they might not be alone; their conductor, that they might not go astray.

We have become familiar, by accounts of our own soldiery in Egypt, with the extreme danger of the Oriental sun when men are marching over the fiery sand: this cloud would act as a vast umbrella tent, covering the whole of the great congregation, so that they could march without being faint with the heat. By night their canvas city was lighted up by this grand illumination. They could march as well by night as by day, for we are told at the close of the previous chapter that by night tne Lord went before them "in a pillar of fire, to give them light; to go by day and night." Might they not have said, "The Lord God is a sun and shield?" Did they not realize not yet spoken in words, "The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night?" This sacred symbol of the divine presence must have been a very great solace to them in those early days, when their pilgrim life was novel to them, and their newly-found liberty was darkened by a terrible fear of recapture.

Beloved friends, God is always with those who are with Him. If we trust Him, He hath said, "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." There is a special and familiar presence of God with those who walk uprightly, both in the night of their sorrow and in the day of their joy. Yet we do not always in the same way perceive that presence so as to enjoy it. God never leaves us, but we sometimes think He has done so. The sun shines on, but we do not always bask in his beams; we sometimes mourn an absent God—it is the bitterest of all our mourning. As He is the sum total of our joy, so His departure is the essence of our misery. If God do not smile upon us, who can cheer us? If He be not with us, then the strong helpers fail, and the mighty men are put to rout.

It is concerning the presence of God that I am going to speak this morning. You and I know how joyous it is. May we never be made to know its infinite value experimentally by the loss of it. If we see no cloud or flame, yet may we know that God is with us, and His power is around us. In that sense we will pray,

"Cover us with thy cloudy shrine,
And in thy fiery column shine."

Or in more familiar words we will sing,

"Let the fiery cloudy pillar Lead me all my journey through."

I. In considering the subject of the Lord's abiding with His people, I shall first call attention to mysteriously removed. According to our text, "The angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed." The chosen of the Lord may lose the manifested presence of God; and, indeed, often they may miss it in the particular form in which they have been accustomed to enjoy it.

The symbol of God's presence removed from where it had usually been. From the day when they entered upon the desert, they had seen the fiery, cloudy pillar well to the front; but now suddenly it wheeled about, and left the van comparatively dim, because the glory had departed. Those who looked forward saw it no more. So has it been with us at times; we have walked day after day in the light of God's countenance, we have enjoyed sweet fellowship with Jesus Christ our Lord, and on a sudden we have missed His glorious manifestation. The prospect is darkened, the clouds return after the rain, and our soul out of the darkness cries, "Oh, that I knew where I might find Him!"

Moreover, they missed the light from where they hoped it would always be. They had been given to understand, I do not doubt, that the Lord would be always with them; and yet now, as they looked forward, the bright light was gone from its place of leadership. They looked for it as their guide, and, behold, that

GUIDANCE WAS GONE!

The pillar might be behind them, but it was not before them; they could see nothing ahead to lead them into the land flowing with milk and honey, which the Lord had promised them. Sometimes you also may imagine that God's promise is failing you; even the Word of God which you had laid hold upon may appear to you to be contradicted by your circumstances. Then your heart sinks to the depths, for "if the foundations be destroyed, what can the righteous do?" If ever the Word of God becomes a subject of doubt, where can any certainty remain? Where any hope for the future?

The pillar of fire also removed from where it seemed more than ever to be needed. Now they were in a cleft stick; how could they possibly escape? Pharaoh was behind them, with all the horsemen of Egypt. They could hear the noise of the chariots, and the neighing of the horses, and the shouts of the armies, eager for the prey. Before them rolled the Red Sea in its might. How could there be a way in the mighty waters? Now, if ever in their lives, they must have looked anxiously for the symbol of the divine presence. What could they do if Jehovah did not lead their van? Yet the token of His presence was not there.

Even thus is it with you, dear friend, who once walked in the light of God's countenance; you perhaps have fallen into temporal trouble, and at the same moment the heavenly light has departed from your soul. Is the track quite gone? Does the sea seem shut in with an iron-bound coast without a harbor? Does he

"See every day new straits attend,
And wonder where the scene will end"?

Then let him trust; but he will need all the faith of which he can be master. Oh, my Lord, if ever Thou dost leave me, forsake me not in the day of trouble. Yet what have I said? It is a day of trouble when Thou art gone, whatever my condition may be. Yet, brethren, our Lord said, "Pray ye that your flight be not in the winter." Pray that if you must for a while bewail the Lord's absence from you, it may not be in a time of dire and dark necessity.

Thus it did seem a mysterious thing that the Covenant Angel should no longer direct the marchings of the host of God, and I dare say that some of them began to account for it by a reason which their fears would suggest. Naturally there was only one way of accounting for this removal of the guide, and that way was a wrong one, but one to which the Lord's people often refer their trials. I should not wonder that, if they had been asked why the blazing pillar was no longer in the van, they would have replied, "Because of our murmurings against the Lord and His servant Moses. God will not go before us because of our sins." Now, it is true, and does happen, that the Lord often hides His face behind the clouds of dust that His own children make by their sins; but this is not always the case. But in this case God was not punishing them for their sins, as He did on after occasions. There was about this withdrawing of His presence from the van, not even a trace of anger; it was all done in loving-kindness and tender mercy, and no sort of chastisement was intended by it. So, dear child of God, you must not always conclude that trouble is sent because of wrath, and that the loss of conscious joy is necessarily a punishment for sin. All trouble is not chastisement; it may be a way of love for your enriching and ennobling. Upon the black horse of trouble the Lord sends His messengers of love. It is a good thing for us to be afflicted; for thus we learn patience, and attain to assurance. There are a thousand precious uses in this adversity. Yet it is a mysterious thing when the light of the future fades, and we seem to be without a guide.

II. Now, secondly, all this while the divine presence was still near. The angel of the Lord had removed, but it is added, He "removed and went behind them," and He was when He was in the rear, as when He led the van. He might not seem to be their guide, but He had all the more evidently become their guard. He might not for the moment be their Sun before, but then He had become their Shield behind. "The glory of the Lord was their rearward." The Lord may be very close to thee, dear child, when thou canst not see Him, perhaps closer than ever He was when thou couldst see Him. The presence of God is not to be measured by thy realization of it. When thou canst not tell that He is with thee at all, and thou art sighing and crying after Him, those very sighs and cries after Him are the holy fruit of His secret presence.

Note in the text that it is said the pillar went, and "stood behind them." I like that, for it is a settled, permanent matter. The Lord had removed, but He was not removing still. He would stay as long as was needful where He then was. It is glorious to think that the Lord stood there, and the furious enemy was compelled to halt. Even thus the Lord remaineth with the dear child of God. Thou canst not see anything before thee to make thee glad, but the living God stands behind thee to ward off the adversary. He cannot forsake thee.

What is more, these people had God so near that they could see Him if they did but LOOK BACK.

Earnestly I desire you to think of this. If you cannot see the Lord bright before you, and you are very dull and heavy, then, I pray you, look back and see how the Lord has helped you hitherto. Sit not down with your eyes shut, but look back! Steadily observe the past! What see you there? Loving-kindness and tender mercy, and nothing else. The fountain will not fail; it has flowed too long for us to raise the question. If there be no light breaking in the east, behold, it is lighting up the western sky.

III. Thirdly, let us see the divine presence

WISELY REVEALED.

That the symbol of God's presence should be withdrawn from the front and become visible behind, was a wise thing. Observe, there was no fiery pillar of cloud before them, and that was wise; for the going down into the Red Sea was intended to be an act of lofty faith. The more of the visible the less is faith visible. The more you have of conscious enjoyment the less room there is for simple trust. Faith performs her greatest feats in the darkest places. These Israelites were to do what after all was a grandly glorious thing for them to do—to march right down into the heart of the sea. You and I would have needed great faith to have gone down into such an abyss as that; but they descended without fear. I have seen children cosseted into the grave by their fond mother; and I suppose that a great many more will follow in the same way; but God never spoils His children. He educates them for nobler ends. He takes visible guides away from them that they may exercise faith in Him. Why, Job would have been nobody if he had not lost everything. Who would have heard of the patriarch of Uz? Where the word of King Solomon was there was power, but nothing to equal the power of Job's word when he blessed the God who taketh away. Solomon spake many proverbs, and wrote many songs; but none of them attained unto the glory of that saying—"Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him." Here was a triumph of faith! Beloved, you and I lose the enjoyments of religion and the comforts of hope in order that we may walk by faith and not by sight, and may the more greatly glorify God.

Moreover, let us mark that the cloudy pillar was taken away from the front because the Lord meant them simply to accept His Word as

THEIR BEST GUIDANCE.

The Lord said to Moses, "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward." That word was sufficient guide. Suppose they had said, "Lord, we will go forward if the fiery pillar leads us forward, but not else." What then? Why, they would have been rebels. We are to obey God's Word as God's Word. I heard a brother say some time ago that he should be baptized when it was laid home to him. I thought of what a father would say to his boy if he said, "Father, I shall obey you if it is laid home to me." In all probability the child would have it laid home to him more feelingly than he desired. There are some disobedient children in the Lord's family who, if they do not mind, will have Scriptures laid home to them in a way they do not quite reckon upon. What have you and I to guide us but the word of the Lord?

"Well," says one, "I guide myself by outward providences." Do you? You will get into a terrible maze one of these days. Jonah wanted to flee from the presence of the Lord, and therefore he went down to the seaside, and lo, he found a ship going to Tarshish. Might he not have said, "I must be in the way of duty in going to Tarshish, for no sooner did I go down to the wharf than I found a ship starting immediately, and a cabin vacant for a passenger. I paid my fare, and walked on board at once. I had not to go off to the shipping-agent's, and wait for the next liner, but all was prepared for me. Was not that a providence!" Yes, but if you get following providence, and turning aside from the Word, you may soon find yourself in the sea, and no whale prepared for you. Our way is clearly set before us in the Word of God, and that most sure word of testimony should be followed.

I have known a brother wanting to go abroad to preach the Gospel to the heathen, but a great many difficulties have been thrown in his way, and therefore he has said, "I can see that I am not called to go." Why not? Is no man called unless his way is easy? I should think myself all the more called to a service if I found obstacles in my way. The course of never did run smooth. I should say, "The devil is trying to hinder me, but I will do it in spite of all the devils in hell." You are not worthy to be a soldier of Jesus Christ at all if you look for ease. Go home! Has not the Lord spoken? Who shall ask for plainer guidance?

Moreover, God was teaching them another lesson, namely, that He may be near His people when He does not give them the usual tokens of His presence. Who shall say that God was not in the van of Israel when they went down into the sea? Truly the Lord was there, triumphing gloriously. No cloudy pillar was seen across the waters as Israel looked forward to the shore; but yet the Lord was there majestically; and you may have but little comfort of the Lord's presence at this time, and yet God may be with you wondrously. Do not so much set your heart upon comfort, but rejoice in the fact which gladdened Hagar in the wilderness: "Thou, God, seest me."

Let me whisper to you one word more. After all, the host of Israel did not require any guide in front when they came to the sea. "How is that?" say you. Why, beloved, there were no two ways to choose from; they could not miss the way, for they must needs march through the sea. No room for wandering remained; their road was walled up, and they could not miss it. So when men come into deep trouble, and cannot get out of it, they scarcely need a guide; for is submission and patience. Tried child of God, you have to bear your trouble, and when that is quite clear your way is no longer doubtful. Cast all your care on Him who careth for you, and in patience possess your soul.

What they did want was the pillar of cloud behind them, and that is where they had it. What was that cloud behind them for? Well, it was there for several reasons; the first was to shut out the sight of their enemes from them. May I ask you just to try and use your eyes a little now? There are your sins; will you look back on them for a minute? Look steadily. They are quite as dreadful as the Egyptian horsemen and chariots. I have looked intently, and I cannot see a sin remaining. "What, have you lived such a live that you have never sinned?" Ah, no, beloved, I have to mourn over many offences; but I cannot see one of them now, for my sin is covered.

"Ah," saith one, "I know that my sins are forgiven, but I am troubled about my circumstances." Will you now look back with all your eyes? How about the circumstances you have passed through? Do you see anything wrong about them now? Oh, no, say you, they were all right. As you look back you can only see the glory of God;

THE LORD HATH LED YOU

by a right way. Very well; learn to look at your circumstances through the light God hath set between Israel and the Egyptians.

The cloudy pillar went behind for another reason, namely, that the Egyptians might not see them. Their enemies were made to stumble, and were compelled to come to a dead stand. "The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil; my lust shall be satisfied upon them." Why does he halt? Why does the lion pause when about to spring? He is blindfolded. He shivers in the dense blackness, bethinking him of that former day when all the land of Mizraim quailed beneath a darkness that might be felt. Be calm, oh child of God; for the Covenant Angel is dealing with your adversaries, and His time is generally the night. You will hear by-and-by of what He has done.

IV. Now, beloved, I must draw toward a conclusion by observing that the divine presence will one day be more gloriously revealed. I have been speaking about the Lord being the rearward of His people, and so explaining my second text: but I must now refer you to my last text, in the fifty-second of Isaiah—"The Lord will go before you; and the God of Israel will be your rearward." This is the condition into which the Lord brings His people when they depart from Babylon, and are no more conformed to this present evil world. I trust He has brought many of us into this at this good hour. The Lord is behind us, we know; our sins and iniquities are covered, our past mistakes are all erased, we are accepted in the Beloved. But we have not to look forward and say, "The angel of God has removed." Oh, no; we can see the bright light before us still. Our ways are ordered of the Lord, and none of our steps shall slide. We glory in tribulations also, believing that we shall glorify God in them. We look forward to the time of old age, believing that to hoar hairs He is the same, and that in our days of decline He will carry us. We of our Lord with delight; or, if that may not be in our day, we look to falling asleep upon the bosom of our Saviour. Before us we see the resurrection morning and all its splendor; we anticipate the risen body, that glorified fabric in which our pure and perfect spirits shall dwell forever. A few more months, a few more years, and we shall be in the land of the unclouded sky. What will it be to be there! What will it be to be there forever!

LOOK FORWARD TO THE ADVENT

"Far from a world of grief and sin,
With God eternally shut in."

How willingly would I fly away and be at rest! I feel my wings; they are not strong enough, as yet, to bear my soul away; but they will be. God is making His children ready to depart, and He will only have to beckon them, and they will cry, "Here am I," and then they shall be with Him forever. Yes, the glory of the Lord is above us and beneath us, on the right hand and on the left, without us and within us. We depart not from it, though it is behind us; we are going ever into the glorious light, for it is before us, too. The Lord shall be a wall of fire around about us, and the glory in the midst.

V. But now I have a sorrowful word to say, and with that I have done. This divine presence has that same glory which lit up the canvas city, and made it bright as the day, darkened all the camps of Egypt. They could see nothing, for the dark side of God was turned to them. I am afraid it is so with some of you. Oh, dear friends, is it not a dreadful thing that to some men the most terrible thing in the world would be God? If you could get away from God, how happy, how merry, how jolly you would be! You want to depart from Him; you are departing from Him. One of these days Jesus will tell you to depart. "Keep on as you were," says He, "you were always departing from God; keep on departing. Depart from me, ye cursed!" That will be the consummation of your life.

The Word of God has a dark side to sinners. I will tell you what they say; they say, "We do not understand this Book, it is so full of mystery. We find it full of dark sayings, and hard things, and things difficult to be believed. It is all knots and snarls." Just so; you are an Egyptian, it is dark to you. Let me call up the smallest babe in grace, and say, "Dear child, is that what the Bible is to you?" "Oh, no," he says, "it is my joy and my delight. I may not understand it all, but I love it all, and I feed on it all."

Now look at the Gospel itself. Why, there are many that sit and hear the Gospel, and they say, "I do not understand this believing, this atonement, and so on." No, I know you do not; you are an Egyptian, it is dark to you.

Why, even the blessed Lord Jesus Christ has

A DARK SIDE FOR SINNERS.

If He were to come here this morning, oh, how gladly would I stand back to let Him come forward and show His surpassing beauty. Why, some of you would think it heaven if you could but see Him here and look into His pierced hands and side, and mark that blessed, marred, unutterably lovely visage. Yes, but it could not bring any joy to you who do not love Him. You do not trust Him; and if the news were given out, "Christ has come," why, you would swoon with fear in your pews, for you would say, "He has come to judgment, and I am unprepared. He that is not my Saviour will be my judge, and sentence me to everlasting woe." There is a dark side in the Mediator to the Egyptians while there is a bright side to Israel.

Oh, that ye would believe in Jesus Christ! Oh, that ye would "kiss the Son, lest He be angry, and ye perish from the way, when His wrath is kindled but a little," for "Blessed are all they that put their trust in Him." You can come and be numbered with Israel, for the door into Israel is Christ Himself. If you come to Christ you have come to His people, you have come to safety, and henceforth "the Lord will go before you; and the God of Israel will be your rearward." Amen.

REV. THOMAS SPURGEON.

THOMAS SPURGEON and his twin brother Charles were born on September 20th, 1856, and are now twenty-eight years old.

Their first appearance in public life was at a meeting of the United Kingdom Band of Hope, which was held in the Metropolitan Tabernacle in January, 1865. They were then only nine years of age. They at this meeting declared themselves total abstainers, and received each a silver medal as a memorial of the event. They did not on that occasion sign the pledge, for they have been total abstainers all their lives.

They first left the parental roof for the purpose of completing their education in 1868. The seminary chosen was Camden House School, Brighton, where they remained until 1874, when they came home in order to prepare themselves to the professions which they had selected for pursuit in after life.

Thomas very early showed indications of a love for art and its surroundings, and he chose the profession of

AN ART ENGRAVER.

To his love for his art he added much industry, and with such assiduity did he apply himself to his work that he became proficient.

The two brothers early gave evidence of their conversion, and were baptized and admitted to Church fellowship. We find them seeking some work for the Lord, to which they could apply their time and energies, for a year or more before they had completed their technical education.

Their first fixed sphere of usefulness was found in a densely-populated neighborhood off Wandsworth Common, near Clapham Junction. This was a mission work in a cottage which had been carried on for some years by an aged servant of the Master, named Rides, but which needed to be extended, and, if possible, to be consolidated and formed into a Christian church. The two brothers relieved the evangelist of his voluntary charge, which allowed him to commence operations elsewhere, about the latter end of 1876.

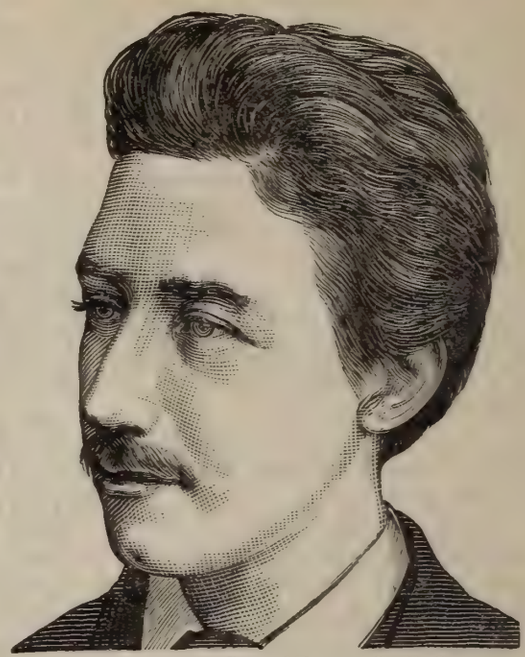
Finding the room in which the meetings had been held had become too strait for the increasing congregation, they essayed to build a permanent chapel. This step had their father's countenance, and he acted as their treasurer. They ventured to purchase a piece of land in Chatham Road, Wandsworth Common, and at once obtained the use of various neighboring chapels for the purpose of holding meetings and engaging the sympathy of their congregations on behalf of the souls in the neighborhood in which they had commenced to labor.

Their advocacy brought the effort they had espoused to a successful termination, at least financially. The opening of the books at the last great day will alone reveal the spiritual results of their loving teaching in the neat little chapel they established. In 1878 Charles decided to enter the Pastors' College as a student for the ministry, upon the completion of his training in the city for business life. Thomas, at the same time, had completed his college course, and as his health was far from satisfactory, a trip to the Antipodes was projected for him.

HIS VOYAGE TO AUSTRALIA.

For this purpose he sailed in the Lady Jocelyn for Australia on June 14th, 1877. There he was not to be idle, for while he himself set out in search of temporal health, he desired the spiritual health of his fellow-voyagers and the crew of the ship. Captain Jenkins, an esteemed friend of Mr. Spurgeon, who commanded the ship, requested him to conduct the religious services on the Sabbath. The experience through which the young man had to pass in prosecution of this duty was certainly novel.

Moravians in the Steerage in a Storm.



Rev. Thos. Spurgeon, Son of Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

He says, concerning it: "The second Sunday on board was anything but a pleasant day, as far as the weather was concerned; the sea was very rough, and the rain fell constantly. The bell for church commenced to ring about half past ten, and, not having far to travel, the audience soon arrived. It was not an easy task to stand, but after a while I succeeded in wedging myself between the table and the back of a seat, and presently forgot circumstances and inconvenience in the glory of my subject. Unfortunately many of my hearers were not so successful, for their white faces grew whiter every moment, and at last they were compelled to leave. It was no easy to sustain the thread of the discourse, for swinging trays and an audience 'moved' in anything but a desirable way are not conducive to retention of ideas or expression of thought."

His father remarks on this: "Evidently God was teaching his youthful hands to war and his fingers to fight, in anticipation of future battles. Three months' preaching to the same audience amid the rolling of the sea is an admirable preparation for addressing crowds on shore."

RECEPTION AT MELBOURNE.

He landed at Melbourne on August 28th, 1877, and his reception was most gratifying and enthusiastic. On the pier a crowd of friends awaited him, almost vieing with each other as to who should claim the young stranger as their guest. "I seemed to keep on shaking hands," he says, "and which of the many offered will be my home I cannot tell, but God seems to be arranging everything most graciously."

He was fêted and made much of, and treated in quite a princely fashion—doubtless as the representative of his honored father. He spent his twenty-first birthday at Geelong, a famous place in the early days of the gold-digging mania. He arose on that auspicious morning to find a new Union Jack waving in the breeze from the next house, and over a fence upon the other side hung a bunch of freshly-gathered violets for the son of "John Ploughman." A public dinner and tea—and, in fact, a general gala, in which the exuberance of the rejoicing did not exceed the sincerity—took place, and in the evening Thomas was presented with a gold watch in memory of the event.

At the conclusion of his travel into the interior of Australia, which occupied nearly eleven months, he sailed from Melbourne for Sydney, where he remained ten days. Hence he passed on to Brisbane.

On the 19th of September, 1878, he SET SAIL FOR ENGLAND.

"Right glad was I," he writes, "when forty-three days had gone, and a note at Plymouth told me that my dear mother had been spared." (He had hurried homeward on account of the critical condition of his mother's health.) His arrival in England was to him a new epoch in his life. He had, in the varied experience he had passed through in Australia, acquired confidence and learned many lessons which admirably fitted him to occupy a conspicuous position which was thrust upon him in the Tabernacle.

His father, within a few days after his arrival home, was suddenly laid aside by an attack from his old malady, rheumatic gout. He still clung to the hope that he would be able to preach to the great congregation in the Tabernacle even so late as Saturday evening. But on the Sunday morning this hope had proved delusive, and Thomas at once on Sunday, November 10th, 1878, much to the pleasure of his father as well as of the congregation. Mr. Spurgeon had announced that the seats of the Tabernacle would be free to all comers upon that Sunday evening. To this great but strange congregation Thomas preached a second sermon that day. He has subsequently preached on several occasions in the Tabernacle.

Not long afterward the condition of his health required that he should again visit the Antipodes. The providence of God directed him finally to New Zealand, where, in the city of Auckland, he has for the past few years found a happy and successful sphere of labor for Christ, and has been the means of gathering a large congregation, of which he is the pastor. A new tabernacle is in course of erection for him, and during its progress he is taking a holiday, and arrived in England on July 8th.

Mr. Thomas Spurgeon has more manliness and vigor of speech than has his twin brother Charles who visited this country recently. Physically, however, he is not so robust, and it was remarked by those who were present at the Orphanages at the recent celebration when he made a brief speech that he was looking ill and bore on his face traces of suffering. He is, however, earnest in his work, and intends collecting in England sufficient money to pay the balance still owing on his Tabernacle, so that he may open it on his return free of debt.

MORAVIANS IN THE STEERAGE.

(See Illustration.)

"Let your light shine" is an injunction too often forgotten at times when its observance might be of lasting benefit to the unconverted. At no time is it more likely to be a blessing than in seasons of danger. When terror is filling every breast, and sudden death seems imminent, the spectacle of men and women standing calm and unmoved, not by reason of natural strength, but sustained by their faith, moves men to ask what that faith must be to have such power. One such case, so operating, has become historical.

On board the ship in which John Wesley sailed for Georgia there were a number of German Moravians. During the voyage a tremendous storm arose. Wesley was greatly alarmed, feeling unprepared to die. The lively faith of the Moravians he admired, which in the midst of danger kept their minds in a state of tranquillity to which he and the English on board were strangers. While the Moravians were singing, at the beginning of their service, the sea broke over the ship and split the mainsail in pieces, the water pouring in between the decks as if the great deep would swallow them up. The English were greatlty terrified, and screamed with fear, while the Moravians were unmoved, and calmly sang on.

Mr. Wesley asked one of them afterward if he were not afraid? He answered, "I thank God, no." "But were not your women and children afraid?" He replied, mildly, "No; our women and children are not afraid to die."

THE JOINER'S BEREAVEMENT.

It was a poor little home Samuel Ware had—only four rooms in a large house, which had once been the home of an aristocratic family, but had now, in its old age, lost caste, and was divided off into residences for several families. Ware was a joiner, and not a very prosperous one, or he would have been able to provide better accommodation for his wife and children. He was a steady man—in fact, a good Christian man—but somehow he was never considered a good workman. One employer who discharged him used to say, "He could never hold anything tight—things dropped out of his hands—he'd no backbone, sir, that's the reason I got rid of him. 'Reliable?' oh, yes, he was reliable—that is, he always came regularly to work; but if you wanted a real good job made, you couldn't rely on Ware unless you stood by him to see he made everything firm. He never took any pride in his work—always seemed to be thinking of something else."

So Ware did not get on, but always had some work chiefly such as required no thought and was the worst paid of all. He was often reproached on this account by his wife, who had more than her share of spirit and temper as her husband had less than his share of each. But he never resented his wife's hard words. "Poor girl!" he would say, "she has a hard life of it, and she might ha' married some one who'd ha' done a deal better for her." So he only replied in kind words, which confirmed his wife's opinion of him as a mean man, with no courage in him.

To-day the joiner's home is more dull and depressing than usual. Gloom sits on every face; even the three little children have not their usual vivacity. All are thinking of yesterday, when a little coffin was carried out of the home, containing all that remained of a little girl, the prettiest and brightest of the family. Mrs. Ware, in her new black dress, sat cowering over the open fire, having made no attempt to clear up, but seeming to derive comfort from having the room in disorder as being more appropriate to her feelings. On her face discontent, almost resentment, sat rather than sorrow. "Why was her little girl taken of all the children in the house? There were the Jones's on the same floor, with ever so many sickly children and one a cripple, yet they were living, while her little Nellie, who had never had a day's illness, and was so bright and pretty, caught the fever and died. All the ill-luck came to her and her husband."

The Joiner's Declaration of Unmoved Faith.

A knock at the door disturbed her in her repining mood. One of the children opened it, and admitted two ladies. One of them was little Nellie's Sunday-school teacher and the other a district visitor. Both had heard of the affliction, and intent on giving comfort to the afflicted family started out to visit them, and by accident met at the street door.

"I heard of your loss, Mrs. Ware, this morning; I am so sorry for you," said the district visitor.

"Ah! we're getting used to trouble," said the woman; "we ought to, we have plenty of one kind or another."

"Man is born to trouble as the sparks fly upward," quoted her visitor. "God's word recognizes that fact, and that is why its consolations are always so suitable."

"I don't find them suitable to me. Samuel is always reading it, and he don't get on any better, nor so well as men who aren't pious. It seems to me his religion is no good to him. I suppose you'll say the same as he does, that troubles are sent for our good; but you'll never make me believe that. You can't make me think as it wouldn't ha' been better to ha' kept our little Nellie."

"She was a dear child," said Miss Brown, speaking for the first time; "I was her Sunday-school teacher. I do not wonder you grieve over her death. It is hard to feel resigned in parting with so sweet a child, but you cannot forget how happy she must be now. This is a hard life at the best. She is spared many sorrows in going into Jesus' presence so young."

"You are right there, miss," said the mother. "None knows better than I do how hard life is, and it seems to get harder. I don't see any hope of things getting better."

"Nellie is in a place where they are better. She loved Jesus with all her sweet simplicity, and now she sees Him, and is enjoying the bliss He promises. The hope of the same happiness, and of seeing her again, would make your troubles easy to bear. Perhaps, your despair comes from not having that hope."

"Perhaps so; I have not had time to think of such things; there is always so much to do and so many things to think of! Samuel is always talking about religion, but he is a man, and when he has done his work, it is done. Mine is never done."

"But now that little Nellie is in heaven you will think more of it, and ask Jesus to take you there when you die."

At that moment the joiner came home to his dinner, but seeing two ladies in the room would have retired had not his wife, recognizing his step, called him back, without turning her head. He glanced at his apron and working clothes as if in apology, and came forward, standing with his hand on the back of his wife's chair. The man's helplessness and nervelessness were revealed in his face, as were also his good-humor and honesty. Tears stood in his light blue eyes as Nellie's name was mentioned. "It is the Lord's will," he said; "the Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away." There was a slight quiver of the lip, and then he added, "Blessed be the name of the Lord."

"You find your faith supports you in this trial?" asked the district visitor.

'Madam," he said, solemnly, raising his hand, "that child was the light of my home. If I had not faith to believe that God had taken her, I should die of grief; but 'I know in whom I have believed.' She has gone to be with Him, and when the Lord has no further need of me here I shall go to Him and I shall see Nellie, too." There was a distant, far-away look in his eyes as he spoke, which suggested the thought that his spiritual vision could almost take in that place of bliss to which he looked forward, and could see his child there. Sorrowful as his face was, the ghost of a smile played around his mouth as he spoke.

The two ladies, knowing that the midday meal must be had, and their presence in the crowded quarters might be inconvenient, rose to leave. To their surprise, but to none so much as to the joiner, Mrs. Ware said to Nellie's teacher: "Will you come and see me again? You have made me think better of religion than I ever did."

The promise was given and kept. Many visits were paid, until at last the woman, to whom religion had been a hateful subject, was rejoicing in Him who is "the Resurrection and the Life."

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Hiding-Place for Rose.

AT breakfast, with lowered eyelids and a voice which betrayed her intense anxiety, Hester made her request to John Morley.

"I met a poor woman last night at chapel," she said, "a stranger in the town, without friends. She has been a lady's maid for some years, but she is now in great destitution. She thinks of getting her living by needlework, but she can scarcely do more than earn bread by that. I wish we could help her, father."

"It is very little that we can do," he said.

"Yes, we can do a great deal," she answered; "what she dreads most is associating with drunken and ignorant poor people."

"What can we do for her then, Hester?"

"There is the old nursery in the yard," she said, with a feeling of desperate resolve; "it is only filled with rubbish now, but there is a good grate in it, and the roof is whole. If a few panes were put into the window, and I found some old furniture for it, it would be quite a home for the poor creature. We might even ask a small rent for it, if you thought that was best."

"Hester!" ejaculated her father, in a tone of reproach.

"Then I may do it," she answered, eagerly; "oh! you will never repent it, dear father. She will never come into your way, poor thing! You will never see her, I am sure; for she is afraid of being seen. She has been very unhappy in her marriage, and she is afraid of ever meeting her husband again. No, you will never see her."

Hester was speaking to herself rather than to him, in a manner which might well have excited his suspicions. But John Morley saw nothing of her agitation; he was plunged into more personal and more perplexing contemplations.

"Hester," he said, "I am in sore need of money. We must raise near upon £200 ($1000) before the beginning of next week. I have some heavy bills to meet."

For some years past John Morley's method of conducting his business had been by drawing bills, which always came due so long before he had the money to meet them. Hester had been very early initiated into these anxieties.

"How can we do it?" she asked, with some natural disquietude at the mention of a sum so large.

"There is but one way that I can see," he answered; "we must mortgage the house. Yet it is the only property I could leave to you if I died; and it came to me with your mother. Everything has gone wrong with me since I lost her. I would not do anything with it without your consent, Hester."

"Don't think of me, father," she said, "and don't trouble about me. If that is the only thing we can do, let us do it at once. Who would lend us the money upon the house?"

"I don't know," he replied, with a helpless shake of the head.

"Father," she continued, with a beating heart, "I know who would do it, and it might be kept a secret, so that all the town may not talk about it. Will you let me tell the person I am thinking of?"

"Who is it?" he asked, in a low voice.

"Mr. Waldron," answered Hester.

"Mr. Waldron!" he repeated; "I could not receive any favor from him. It would be like taking money for my— Oh, Hester, life is very hard!"

She understood his half-uttered sentence perfectly; and her heart ached for him and the broken-spirited, desolate woman hidden away from his sight.

"It would be no favor," she said, earnestly; "we should pay the interest of the money, or he should have the house. You should not see him yourself, but I will in your place. You could write to him, you know, and I will take your letter, and explain everything to him. He would not think he was doing you any favor; I will take care of that. Then nobody would know except ourselves and him."

"I cannot make out how the business has fallen away so much," sighed John Morley.

Any one seeing his melancholy and abstracted face, and hearing the mournful tones of his voice, would very easily have understood why customers were few and their visits brief in John Morley's shop. No one chooses to do his shopping where he meets with a face and voice adapted to a house of mourning. Hester understood it better than her father, but she could not make it plain to him. She knew, too, that he tacitly agreed to her plan, and she said no more about it. For the rest of the day she was busy over the more pressing duty of getting Rose's refuge ready before night-fall. When it was over, she lit a fire in the grate, so long empty and cold.

The nursery looked but a poor place after all her care. The walls were discolored and stained, and the rafters of the sloping roof were black with age. There was a little bed in one corner, with the softest mattress and pillows off Hester's own bedstead. Two chairs stood one on each side of the narrow fire-place, with a small round table between them. It all looked bare, dingy, and forlorn. In the solitude of her long lonely hours, the occupant of this room would have time for repentance; but there seemed no place for atonement and reparation. What could she do in this poor refuge and hiding-place? In the dusk of the evening Hester led her stepmother to the only home she could provide for her. Rose stood motionless in the centre of the little room, looking about it with searching and troubled eyes.

"It is the best I can do," said Hester, anxiously; "we are very poor."

"Poor!" echoed Rose.

She said no more, and her face grew paler and more troubled; but afterward there rested upon her worn features an expression of solemnity amounting almost to dignity, such as had never been seen upon them in her bright girlish days.

"God bless you, Hetty," she cried; "you are better than a daughter to me. This is the place where I am to die, seeing you to the last; and your father. He cannot be relentless, when you are so good. Oh, my darling, my darling, you are like an angel from heaven to me!"

She flung herself on her knees and threw her arms around Hester, with tears of profound anguish, and sobs such as might be wrung from tortured lips.

When Hester quitted the old nursery, Rose waited for some minutes without stirring, in the attitude of one who listens eagerly. Then very cautiously she stole to the door and opened it a little way to look out into the yard. The house opposite seemed to tower above her very high and very black in the darkness, with one window lighted up in the highest story of the gable to the right, and another on the ground floor of the gable to the left. She knew their meaning well. Lawson was still at work in his attic, and her husband was sitting in his old place with his books about him. She could remember him so well; the thick brown hair just catching a tinge of silver, and the studious handsome face which had been wont to brighten with a smile as sudden as a flash of lightning when he met her eye—a rare smile, reserved exclusively for her. She wondered to herself whether he had ever smiled so upon his daughter.

Since she had seen Hester, she had felt a little more comforted about her husband, and a little less remorseful. He had not been so deserted or so lonely as she had pictured to herself. He had watched his child growing up at his side. There came a pang, an unreasonable pang amounting almost to jealousy, at the thought that he had grown forgetful of her and her sin in the companionship of Hester. In the brief space of her married life she had fostered a profound jealousy of Hester's mother. And now, as she looked down into the yard toward the lighted window behind which he was sitting, an unconquerable longing seized her to steal down the crazy staircase, and in among the blackened stems of the lilacs and the dwarfed laburnums, to look once more upon her husband whose love she had bartered for the boyish passion of Robert Waldron.

She listened again, but there was no movement, no sign of life in the yard below. On the other side of the house lay the street and the busy world of which she had taken her last farewell. For to venture out into these streets and to show her familiar face among the townspeople would be to banish herself forever from the home where she had come to die. Was she positively come to die here? Was she never more to sleep on any other bed but this until she fell into the last awful unbroken sleep? Were these walls and this narrow court the only spot of the wide world on which her eyes were ever to look again?

She stretched out her arms and raised her bent figure to its fullest height. She felt no pain, nothing but the feebleness, often worse than pain, which is the result of long mental suffering. The London physician had perhaps been deceived by her symptoms, which, possibly, she had exaggerated to him. She might live many years yet. But to live—what was that? To die was dreadful; but she could not choose to live. She tried to send back her thoughts to the time when she fancied she had loved another better than her husband; but it was in vain. The thought of John Morley was there quick and poignant in her inmost soul; but Robert Waldron was forgotten. She must see her husband.

Still she lingered and listened, watching the gleam through the uncurtained window, and the black naked boughs of the trees standing out clearly against its feeble light. She turned back and looked at her own faded face in a small glass which hung against the wall, over a little toilet-table. If her husband could only see it and read in it the story of her bitter repentance, would he not forgive her? But how much would his forgiveness mean? Was it possible that he could be reconciled to her? That he could receive her again? Call her his wife, and restore her to her forfeited place? No, no; that could never be. He might look upon her again, and pardon her if she was in the hour of death. But if life were strong within her, and many years lay before her, would he not spurn her from him, and refuse to lay his finger to her burden of shame?

At length she hurried down the steps and into the dreary little garden. She crept stealthily toward the window, lest she should enter into the revealing light, and her husband should lift up his eyes and see her standing without in the chill of the wintry night. Her face, wan, faded, and withered, approached cautiously the uncurtained panes. The room—she had seen that last night, with its ten years of added dinginess and decay. But who was this aged man, with a head bowed and white with years, who was bending over her husband's desk, and turning, from time to time, anxiously, to the great account-books she had hated years ago. Her husband could not yet be fifty years old, a man in the full vigor and strength of life. The lamp beside him was covered with a shade which cast a gloom over the rest of the room, while it threw a full light upon him. The thin, shrivelled hands, the rounded shoulders, the gray and hollow features, the white hair—Rose saw them as in a dream. He got up at last, pushing away his books, and took his stand upon the hearth, with his back to the fire and his full face turned toward her. She drew back with a creeping thrill of terror.

"Hester," she heard him say, "I have finished my letter to Mr. Waldron. But if it were not for your sake, I would sooner let things take their course than ask him to lend me money. Ay, I would sooner die!"

Rose waited to hear no more. She cast one terrified glance at her husband, and then she fled back in a panic of fear to her hiding-place.

"Oh, what have I done?" she cried, in a frightened whisper, speaking as if some one was near enough to hear her; "he was a good man and a prosperous man! I did not know what I should do. God forgive me! He never will; but God, in His great mercy, forgive me!"

She counted no more upon her husband's forgiveness. What there was in his face she did not know, but it had cast out all hope from her heart. For the first time, looking into the deep gulf of her husband's wrongs, she knew that it must be forever fixed between her and him. Perhaps in the last hour he might lay his hand in hers, and let her feel its warm forgiving clasp as she went down into the dark valley of separation. But only in that supreme moment of death. Life, if she lived, must be a perpetual banishment from his presence.

The next morning, Hester, with her father's letter in her hand, wended her way slowly across the park to Aston Court. She felt a natural reluctance to the merest chance of meeting Robert Waldron, toward whom her feelings had undergone a great revulsion. Until now he had claimed from her an undefined and rather pleasant pity, mingled with admiration. If Carl had not come into her narrow world, her sentiment for Robert would have bordered upon a girl's first love for a seeming hero; and her heart, free and tender, might have centred in him its interests, and possibly its affections. But with Rose at home, with this dark sad shadow at her side, she recoiled from the idea of seeing him again for the first time. To her infinite relief she just caught a glimpse of him leaving the park on horseback by another route. Mr. Waldron then would be alone, and she could ask him not to let his son know of the transaction.

She quickened her steps, and took the nearest way to the room where he was generally to be found in the morning. It led past the window of the breakfast-room, where Hester saw a vision of Miss Waldron sitting near the fire, and Carl in close conversation with her. She nodded to Carl, whose face was turned toward the window, and hurried on. Mr. Waldron was at that moment walking along the farthest end of the terrace, and Hester started to run after him. The color which this exercise brought to her pale cheeks gave her the beauty she lacked; and as Mr. Waldron turned sharply round, he acknowledged to himself that Robert's love had sufficient excuse. To Hester's extreme astonishment, he drew her into his arms, and imprinted a solemn kiss upon her glowing face. She had not the faintest idea that he was saluting her for the first time as the daughter of whom he had fondly dreamed these last two years.

"My dear," he said, drawing her hand upon his arm, and covering it with his own, "I was just thinking of you. You are often in my thoughts, Hester—how often you would be surprised to know."

No opening could be more propitious. In a few incoherent sentences Hester stammered out the purpose of her visit, as she walked down the terrace, leaning upon his arm. He opened the folding doors of his room, and led her into it, seating her in a chair close to his own, and regarding with delight her downcast face and her long eyelashes now beaded with tears. Nothing could have pleased him more; no overture could have come more opportunely. At the very moment when he was planning some mode of approach to John Morley, he had himself sent Hester to ask his help.

"Hester," he said, "your father has given me the greatest pleasure I have known for a long while. I am right glad he did not go to anybody else. What! are we not brothers? Have we not been members of the same Church these thirty years? He has acted like a Christian in coming to me. I will return at once with you to your home. This is the right thing. I find great pleasure in this."

CONFIDENCE IN GOD.

S. S. Lesson for Sept. 7, Ps. 27. Golden Text, verse 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Two Psalms Contrasted—David's Protestations of Innocence—His Dependence upon God—Fear Sinful—Repeated Injunctions against it—The Fear of Man—The Snares it Brings—God's Infinite Resources Pledged—Fear of Pain—Men of One Desire—A More Glorious Dwelling—God in the Place of Parents—Responsible for Education—Jesus as the Way—The People who See God.

THE contrast is very striking between Psalms 26 and 27. The one is full of self, the other full of God; the one is a cry of David's, his eye on himself and his circumstances; the other a shout of victory, because his eye is upon God. In the one self is the centre, and I is prominent. In the other the Lord is the central thought. In the 26th David says: "I have walked in mine integrity: I have trusted also in the Lord, I shall not slide. . . . I have walked in Thy truth. . . . I have not sat with vain persons. . . I have hated the congregation of the wicked. . . . I will wash mine hands in innocency. . . . I have loved the habitation of thy house." In the 27th "the Lord is my light and my salvation. . . . The Lord is the strength of my life. . . . The Lord will take me up . . . wait on the Lord." In the 27th David is satisfied with God; he is not content with pious aspirations, but his soul goes out to his God present with him.

David strengthened himself in God. "The Lord is my light and my salvation;

WHOM SHALL I FEAR?

The Lord is the Strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?" Fear is one of the most common of Satan's temptations. Few look upon fear as sinful, or see what it really means—that God perhaps will fail us. About ninety times in the Bible we are taught to fear not or not to be afraid. God's repetitions are never "vain repetitions;" when He says a thing twice over, it is because it needs saying. Nothing opens the door to Satan so much as fear. "I feared a fear, and it came upon me," said Job (chap. 3 : 25, margin). Any child of God who gives a moment's thought to the subject, must remember that when temptation has come, and he has feared that he should fall, he always did fall. Why? He was giving that consideration to the temptation itself which he should have given to the Lord, his Deliverer. Every moment in which we are occupied in considering how often we have fallen in such and such circumstances, we are looking away from the Lord, who is "the Strength of our life;" how then can we but fall? "But," you say, "I must seek to understand how I came to fall, that I may provide against a recurrence." You came to fall by having your eye off God, and by attempting to manage your own spiritual life. If you are wholly given over to God in true consecration, let Him have the care and keeping of you, as much as the pardon and cleansing; and let yourself go into His hands. Then you will be able to say of all your enemies, when they came upon me, "they [not I] stumbled and fell."

Many there are who are afraid of man;

"THE FEAR OF MAN

bringeth a snare" (Prov. 29 : 25). Some are afraid of losing the good opinion of man—they live before others; these cannot say, "The Lord is my light," for they walk in the light of men. None are such slaves as these; their whole time, strength, money, influence is spent in standing right with their fellow-creatures, many of whom have no regard for them whatsoever. These have no independence of thought or of speech, and these are they who cannot have any actual communion with God. If their opinion is asked upon anything, they will say what somebody else has said, or defer their opinion until somebody else speaks, and then they join in with the majority. In clothing they must be in the fashion, however inconvenient or unhealthy it may be. Their whole life is spent in finding out what is "the thing," and then doing it. And such are full of fears. Oh, how hard it is for such to come face to face with God; they believe they are converted if somebody else thinks they are; they seek to get into the kingdom of heaven hanging on somebody else's skirts; for to them God is neither Light nor Salvation, nor the Strength of their life.

We may be tempted to fear a stronger will than our own, or we may fear the opposition of another mind; we may fear one who is determined to harm us or to defame our character. But if in very deed the Lord is our Salvation, then He is so on this particular point, and is pledged to save us just there. If He is the Strength of our life, then God's resources must break down if we fail. Although everything may look like defeat, yet the Lord's guarantee of victory is on our side. "Fear not; for I am with thee: be not dismayed; for I am thy God: I will strengthen thee; yea, I will help thee; yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness" (Isa. 41 : 10), "Whoso hearkeneth unto me shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from fear of evil" (Prov. 1 : 33).

FEAR OF PAIN

is another form by which Satan tempts us. And oh, how true it is in this also, "I feared a fear, and it came upon me." If one who is very sensitive to cold thinks, "I am sitting in a draught, I am sure to catch cold," the very fear opens the door to it. How often has infection in fever, cholera, etc., come just upon those who most feared it! For such as have taken the Lord for their Healer, God is indeed a Refuge, and we may say, "The Lord is the strength of my life; of what shall I be afraid." While we fear, we are counting the temptation, the enemy, the person, the circumstance, the sickness to be stronger than God. David was so strong in his confidence that he could say, "Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear;" for he matched God's resources against any host, and knew, "They that be with us are more than they that be with them" (II Kings 6 : 16); "Greater is He that is in you, than he that is in the world" (I John 4 : 4).

Really persuaded that God has taken our cause in hand, we become like David,

POSSESSED OF ONE DESIRE;

"One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord." Blessed be God, we have a more glorious dwelling-place still; for "He that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him (I John 4 : 16). To dwell in God, and not in circumstances, in God, and not in people, in God, and not in self—this is joy and victory all the day long. Thus dwelling, David says: "In the time of trouble He shall hide me, . . . He shall set me up upon a rock. And now shall mine head be lifted up above mine enemies round about me; therefore will I offer in His tabernacle sacrifices of joy; I will sing, yea, I will sing praises unto the Lord." Whenever we see things from the Lord's side we can triumph. Our loving heavenly Father loves our sacrifices of joy more than any other, because they flow out of our appreciation of Him. While we are occupied with our own experience, with what we are, and what we ought to be, we may be filled with the most pious aspirations; but we are expecting, and not accepting and possessing, the present power, joy, and holiness of our God.

David was in blessed communion. "Hear, O Lord, when I cry with my voice: have mercy also upon me, and answer me." David could not do without an answer; one-sided communion could not satisfy him. "When Thou spakest I answered Thee; I said, 'Thy face, Lord, will I seek,' and now answer me. Hide not Thy face far from me; put not Thy servant away in anger." God was not likely to do so, and He must have told him so, for he says, "When my father and my mother forsake me, then the Lord will take me up." Already he had the assurance which he wanted. If God was to take the place of his father and mother, then God became responsible for his education. Thus David says,

"TEACH ME THY WAYS,

O Lord, and lead me in a plain path, because of those which observe me" [see margin]. Thank God, He has answered this prayer in the New Testament by giving Jesus to be the Way at all times and under all circumstances; the Way into every blessing, the Way out of every difficulty. How is Jesus the Way? Oh, so simply; by our turning over everything to Him, and letting Him have it. An impossible circumstance arises in our business, in our family, in our souls, or in our bodily health. There seems no way out of it. Refer it to the Lord, and let Him extricate you. He knew how to make a way in the sea for His people. Only trust Him completely, fearlessly, and

HE CANNOT FAIL YOU.

The Psalmist does not dwell on his own goodness or his own integrity in this Psalm; it is "the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living." Any eye really opened to see God, cannot but see His goodness, "The pure in heart . . . shall see God" (Matt. 5 : 8); they who have yielded themselves to Him and been cleansed from all sin in the blood of Jesus, and whom the Lord is keeping day by day. These, not having to look after and study themselves, are at leisure to study God; and they "understand the lovingkindness of the Lord" (Ps. 107 : 43). The Psalmist recommends his God to others, and says, "Wait on the Lord"—that is, that we may count on Him; "be of good courage, and He shall strengthen thine heart: wait, I say, on the Lord." If the Lord is to be trusted, and we esteem Him so, we shall be of good courage; fear comes from suspecting God of unfaithfulness.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

War between France and China Commenced on August 23d, with the bombardment of Foo Chow. The Herald's correspondent cables that the French commander, Admiral Courbet, opened fire at two P.M., and the Chinese replied almost simultaneously. The dockyard arsenal fired immediately, but with only partial success. The eleven vessels forming the Chinese fleet were mostly light river and coast transports, and were really toys. The French had eight heavily armed ships. Several Chinese gunboats maintained bravely a desultory fire for about a quarter of an hour, when the survivors of their crews leaped overboard. The combat was practically finished in seven minutes. The superior French artillery made the contest, after disabling the Chinese vessels, no fight. It was a massacre. The sight is described as "sickening." Wounded men and corpses floated down the river. Several lives were saved by English ships, the crews of which flung out lines to the drowning men as they floated by. On Sunday the French recommenced firing, directing their shots against the Pagoda. It is surmised that the object of the renewed attack is to entirely obliterate the place. The French transports afterward shelled the villages which occupy the heights around the arsenal.

The French Premier, M. Ferry, Announces that he intends to confine the war to the chastisement of China for duplicity and to seizing a pledge for the payment of an indemnity. The Republique Française defines the programme explicitly. It is to destroy the forts and arsenal at Foo Chow, to occupy the ports of Formosa, and to sweep the Chinese flag from the sea. War, however, cannot be "confined" by the intentions of any one man or of a nation, and in this case there are indications that if not ended by mediation, it will assume large proportions. China has made many sacrifices to avert war; now that the sword is drawn, she may try to revenge herself for her useless humiliations.

The Cholera Panic is Spreading in Italy and Switzerland. At present there have been about three hundred cases in Italy, but the fear is based not on the number of cases, but on the condition of the towns in the course the plague is taking. Some of them are in that filthy condition which invites the disease and renders its attacks most fatal. If it reaches Naples, the scenes of Toulon and Marseilles will be repeated, for Naples has a bad eminence as one of the foulest cities in Europe. The total number of deaths from the disease recorded in France from its first appearance to the close of last week was 3952.

German Interests in Africa have Come in conflict with those of England. The German press is now urging the summoning of a congress for the discussion of affairs on the Congo and of sanitary and other international questions. Advices from West Africa state that Dr. Nachtigall, the German Commissioner, has appeared in a gunboat in the rivers Cameroons and Bimbia, Upper Guinea, and hoisted the German flag. In addition to this is what seems to be an act of German aggression at Bageida. The British authorities from Quitta recently visited Bageida, on the Gold Coast, and at the request of the inhabitants hoisted the Union Jack, indicating English protection. Shortly afterward the German warship Moewe arrived there, and the crew went on shore, cut down the flagstaff and removed the flag, and then hoisted the German colors.

The Marquis of Lorne, ex-Governor-General of Canada, has written a new book, entitled "Canadian Pictures, Pen and Pencil." It is non-political, and gives a glowing account of the resources of Canada. The writer, in inviting emigration to Canada, is enthusiastic over the democratic institutions of the Dominion. "Canadians," he says, "know that no political agitation, however successful, could enlarge their freedom, and there is nothing to disturb their perfect peace and satisfaction."

The World's Convention of Young Men's Christian associations has been in session during the past week in Berlin. The representatives from the United States were: Mr. R. R. McBirney and Mr. Thomas H. Cree, of New York; General O. O. Howard, of Omaha Neb.; Mr. John Field, of Philadelphia, and the Rev. A. J. Gordon, of Boston. There were also forty delegates from the United States in attendance. The session, which began on the 20th inst., was the tenth triennial International Conference of the young men's associations of all lands. The last triennial conference was held in Exeter Hall, London, in 1881, when one hundred and fifty-five associations were represented. The object of these conferences is to promote the common cause of the associations the world over and to bring about an interchange of methods, the aim of each association being to advance the general welfare of young men. On Thursday last Mr. James L. Houghteling, of Chicago, and Mr. Charles K. Ober, of Boston, presented to the Berlin Conference an interesting paper giving the salient points in the management of American Young Men's Christian associations. The paper was printed, and will be widely circulated.

The Marquis of Salisbury, the Leader of the British Conservatives, has adopted the tactics of the late Lord Beaconsfield. In a speech he delivered last week he advocated a more radical settlement of the Franchise question than that proposed by Mr. Gladstone. He would introduce for Great Britain the American plan of electoral districts on the basis of population. Under the present system there are many anomalies. In Warwick one member of Parliament is elected by a population of 5000, while in Birmingham only one member is elected by a population of 136,000. The most significant feature of the news is that the change to the American system should be advocated by a Conservative whose party has generally resisted change.

MRS. REANEY, THE AUTHOR AND TEMPERANCE PHILANTHROPIST—Scenes in Her Work.

MRS. REANEY,

Temperance Reformer and Authoress.

Early Days with "Nursie"—The Girl Student—Her Long-Standing Sympathy with Temperance Work—Canon Wilberforce's Remarks upon the Power of Women—Mrs. Reaney's Style of Address—A Village Cottage Meeting—Great Secret of her Wide Influence—Old Jonathan's Fellowship with Christ—A Visit to "Happy Betty" at the Poorhouse—Little Meggy's Home—A Typical Transformation.

ISABEL REANEY, whose portrait appears on our frontispiece, is the wife of the Rev. George Sale Reaney, a Congregational minister, now laboring at Stepney, in the East of London, but formerly, and with great success, at Warrington and at Reading. Both husband and wife have been long well known by their vigorous efforts on behalf of the spread of temperance among all classes of society, but especially perhaps among those whose education and wealth make their social influence of no ordinary value to any movement with which they connect themselves.

Mrs. Reaney has written several charming books, in one of which, entitled "Waking and Working; or, From Girlhood to Womanhood," she more than hints that the story she tells may be regarded in the light of an autobiography. In the preface to this volume she writes: "Having myself passed from girlhood to womanhood, with all its life awakenings, longings, and prospects, I yearn with great sympathy and love over those just entering upon an age so full of earnest questionings and solemn thought; and out of that yearning has grown this little volume. To my younger sisters everywhere I dedicate my heart, thoughts, and,

IN PART, MY LIFE'S HISTORY."

This book appeared first in 1873—a fourth edition is now published. Concluding that the experiences of the "May Percival" she so vigorously and gracefully depicts to be in large part her own, we have an interesting glimpse of her early days, upon which in one chapter she lovingly looks back: "In her earliest childhood's recollections were twined memories of those glorious sunsets—ay, as far back as the days when dear old nursie (in heaven now) stood with her by the nursery window, and told her sweet stories of the better land, tracing the pathway thither through the clouds twined with the golden light of the setting sun; strangely intermixing with this wild fairy tales—dark lands a long way off, huge monster giants, the terror of little children—Light, the good spirit always coming at the right moment to befriend the needy."

"Then came schoolroom days, and the quiet 'study hour,' when, with her elbows on the table, and forehead tightly clasped with her hands, she would repeat over and over to herself the lesson before her—a French verb, a page from Taylor's Class-book, or Slater's Dates, history, geography, or spelling—when all would suddenly be put to flight by a glance through the window at the setting sun."

It would seem that from an early period the woes which ever follow in the wake of intemperance had made a deep impression upon her mind and heart, and that, constrained by a glowing love to Christ, she determined to do what she could, by example and teaching, to strengthen that increasing who of late years have done such good service in the spread of temperance principles. Of course, as a minister's wife, Mrs. Reaney would have her own special duties in connection with her husband's pastorate, but the performance of these did not prevent her from casting in her lot with those who were working to stamp out the dark sin of drunkenness from her professedly Christian land.

At a recent meeting of the British Women's Temperance Association, Canon Basil Wilberforce said that the evils of drinking were spreading throughout the whole of the society of the land, not only among the working people, but among the very highest classes of society, and that at the present time matters had arrived at such a crisis as to threaten national decadence. At the same time the eloquent Canon found something to relieve the shuddering darkness of the picture which truth compelled him to draw.

He said: "I am happy to see throughout the whole length and breadth of the land the temperance movement is spreading. Among the numerous bright lights that I see dawning on the eastern sky, and heralding the era of temperance reformation in the country, I think there is not one that looks better at this moment than the fact that there are gathered together here English women who are coming boldly to the front on this great question. When women thus act there is no end to the power which they may wield if they choose. The great men of the world have almost invariably been

MOTHERS' CHILDREN, NOT FATHERS'.

They take their cue from the mother. They draw the first food that nature gives them from the mother, and if the temperance reformers can only persuade the women of England that they can, with perfect safety to their own health, resist the persuasion of medical men to make them take a little drink for their strength, there will soon be a nation freed from the hereditary taint of intemperance, and they will be able to sweep this withering curse from the nation."

That these are the convictions, not only of Canon Wilberforce, but also of Mrs. Reaney, is evident from the fact that she cheerfully devotes so much of her time and strength to the public advocacy of the cause of temperance, both in town and country.

HER STYLE OF ADDRESS

is singularly natural and effective, and it has led more than one well-known advocate of the movement to say that the speaking of Christian ladies at temperance gatherings, where they can command the necessary nerve and self-possession, will undoubtedly prove of invaluable service. Certainly those who have had the pleasure of listening to Mrs. Reaney unanimously and most heartily indorse this opinion. So intense is her interest in the cause she has so much at heart, that all thoughts about self are put to flight, and she is chiefly desirous of turning a valuable opportunity to the best and highest account.

It is to be regretted that many of her addresses on the question in which she takes so deep an interest have not been reported beyond the length of a brief newspaper paragraph, and those who have read her books must be left to form their own idea of her cheery and fascinating style of speaking from her vivid and picturesque style of writing.

Reverting again to her book, "Waking and Working," we find described therein one of her earliest efforts for the Saviour's glory, and which we have endeavored to illustrate in our frontispiece picture No. 2. It was a cottage-meeting, which she and her friend, Grace Sullivan, were wont to hold in a country village. Upon their arrival one Sunday afternoon they found the humble room already full, and received a most kindly greeting. They took their seats near the window, where a table had been placed for them. Upon the table was a glass of water and a bunch of flowers. Mr. Hartley, a sunburnt man of four and five and forty, dressed in a clean smock—a healthy-looking agricultural laborer—glowed all over with delight as he is thanked for the flowers—his gift. Rough and uncultivated as he was, he had a large soul for flowers; nothing so rejoiced him as to find them sincerely appreciated by others.

But the service begins. A well-known hymn is given out, and in a minute that little cottage is full of

HOLY SONG, TO WHICH ANGELS LISTEN.

Young and old join in it with a zest and earnestness that are unmistakable. Then a few words of simple, earnest prayer, another hymn, and a loving Gospel address. "Many a hardened drunkard, who had been induced to come out of respect for the young lady, had felt his first impulse to give up the drink and be a better man at these little meetings; many a Bible neglecter had first learned to love the Word there; many a sorrowing one had there first found where to take his sorrow and be comforted; and many now took their seat in church Sunday after Sunday, whose Sabbaths were once frittered away in public-houses and loitering about the fields and lanes, with companions as giddy as themselves."

Mrs. Reaney is pre-eminently characterized by her unforced and unfailing sympathy for the poor and sinful, and it is this which constitutes the golden key to unlock their hearts, and win their love both for herself and the Divine Lord whom she serves. Let us now depict, with the aid of "May Percival," a visit which she paid one evening to a pious cottager called Old Jonathan. Putting on her sun hat, she started on her mission of benevolence (see frontispiece picture No. 3). She carried a little basket with her, in which were some fruit and a small pudding for the poor man she was going to see. He was very aged, and almost deaf, but she usually managed to make herself heard by putting her mouth close to his ear. The cottage at length is reached, and as soon as she enters she hears Old Jonathan's voice in prayer upstairs. Sitting down on the lowest step, she waited until he had ceased. Very touching was his talk with God and after meditation: "Oh, my blessed Jesus, did not the soldier thrust his spear into thy poor side, as Thou hung upon that accursed tree, dying for me, a poor vile sinner, that I might be saved from my sins? Oh, blessed Jesus, what would have become of me if Thou hadst not died; and, blessed Lord, my precious Jesus, praised be thy name!" And in this strain he continued for some time in hallowed communion with God. The kindly visitor felt that she would not like to break in upon the placid and hallowed calm which would follow such a prayer, so placing the contents of her basket upon the kitchen table, she quietly left the cottage.

VISITING "HAPPY BETTY."

Mrs. Reaney's girlhood days of helpfulness were much brightened and helped by the genial companionship of three friends, whom she calls by the names of Grace Sullivan, and Alice St. George, and her brother, Mr. St. George. One bright September afternoon they drove together to Gotthelby Workhouse, to visit the inmates, and to take them flowers and some cheerful, profitable reading. At last they reached their destination, and entered the gloomy-looking, barrack-like building, where they found many radiant faces ready to greet them. They went first to the hospital wing, where one old lady, crippled in every limb from rheumatism, but with a face so sunny and peaceful that it seemed as if encircled by a halo, spoke in a clear, sweet voice when addressed, ending all she said with, "By the mercy of God." She was called "Happy Betty" by the other women, and the nurse whispered to the visitors that all the time she had been in the house—and it was nearly four years now—she had never seen her murmuring or angry. Others became fretful, and occasionally lost their temper, and quarrelled among themselves, but "Happy Betty" was always the peacemaker.

In scenes such as we have all too briefly described, Mrs. Reaney received her training and equipment for her after work of life, which, though arduous, she loves so well. Many homes in Warrington, Reading, and Stepney have been made bright by her sisterly presence, and their once sinful and unhappy occupants made wise unto salvation through her affectionate instrumentality. Her books also have been a means of blessing to thousands. Among her smaller but invaluable productions, perhaps "Sunbeam Willie, and Other Stories" shows as well as any that she has written, her power as a descriptive writer and her ability to seize upon salient points of character. The following extract is from her touching little story of

"LITTLE MEGGY'S HOME."

"In the mean time, with a sad, sad heart and heavy step, little Meggy trudged back to the dreary home, thinking out dreary thoughts, which often puzzled her sorely. 'Why don't good people prevent other people being so cruel? Why should they let Mr. Cuttel make people drunk? Why didn't the squire do something? Wasn't he a great man? Didn't everybody bow to him and mind their manners? Even that cruel Mr. Cuttel always touched his cap to him. Couldn't he do something to prevent the people making the wicked beer?

"'But then his wife didn't get drunk, and his little children didn't have to go without their food, so perhaps he didn't think how other folks suffered! Then there was Parson Meredith; people said he was a good man. It could not be true, though, or he wouldn't say he didn't see any harm in people drinking beer, as he said at the school feast last year, when he gave a glass to all the old people there. Of course he didn't want people always to take too much; but weren't there dozens like mother, who if they touched a drop couldn't stop there? Oh, wasn't there anybody would come and do something? Oh, if everybody had only little babies who cried all day long because they had got nothing to eat! If everybody knew what it was to chop up the chairs (leastways, those that hadn't gone to the pawnshop) for firewood in the bitter cold days, and have nowhere to sit but on the cold, cold floor; if everybody knew what it was to feel shivering in every limb, and so, so hungry, and to go to the cupboard and find it empty; if everybody knew what it was to have no warm bed to lie in, and only an old bit of a blanket to cover ourself up with, while the wind howled in the chimney, and blew through the broken window like anythink—and all because of the dreadful, dreadful drink—oh, folk couldn't be so wicked as to let anybody make more!'"

FRONTISPIECE PICTURES 5 AND 6 illustrate a home such as Meggy's when ruined and darkened by the drink fiend, and the change which takes place when temperance principles are adopted; and the love of Christ, the Saviour of the lost, gains admission into the heart. And to multiply such noble transformations as this, both Mrs. Reaney and her husband have consecrated their lives. In the midst of their labor may they increasingly enjoy the consciousness of their Master's smile, and finally reap a rich and abiding reward in heaven.

INCIDENTS OF FOREIGN MISSIONARY WORK.

The Baptist Missionary Society has Secured from the International Association of the Congo a deed granting perpetual tenure instead of the seven years' lease of land held by the former at Stanley Pool, and fresh grants at a nominal rental made for new stations in the interior. These arrangements will tend to increased facilities for work on the part of the mission. It is one of the principal objects of the Association to bring about the formation of a Free State, embracing the whole region of the Congo, in which free trade and full religious liberty shall be secured to all, independent of race or sect. Such a State, recognized by the United States and the European Powers, would be a happy solution of a difficult problem.

A Noble Confession in a Cloud of Smoke.—Mr. Gilmour, whose portrait appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of October, 1883, is once more among the Mongols. A recent communication describes a journey made by him since his return to Pekin. Travelling on foot, he found rest one evening in the tent of the mandarin of the district. Friends and neighbors, hearing of his arrival, soon came. "In a little while," he says, "I had round me a representative from nearly every family in the village. Among the others came my two servants—the priest and the layman who had driven my oxcarts for me. Escorted by these I went to another tent, rested there a while, and then moved into a mud-built house. The priest was busy lighting a fire, which would do nothing but smoke, and the room was soon full. Finding him alone, I told him that I had come to speak to him and my other friends about the salvation of their souls, and was pressing him to accept Christ when the layman entered. The priest related the drift of our conversation to the layman, who, tongs in hand, was trying to make the fire blaze. Whether the priest would join him or not, his mind was made up, he would trust the Saviour. By this time a cloud of smoke filled the room. I was lying flat on the platform, and the two men were crouching on the floor—I could just see dimly the bottom of their skin coats—but the place was beautiful to me as the gate of heaven, and the words of the confession of Christ from out the cloud of smoke were inspiriting to me as if they had been spoken by an angel from out of a cloud of glory." This was the first Mongolian convert.

How Two Missionaries were Enlisted.—The Rev. Dr. Valentine, medical missionary of the Presbyterian Church, says: "I have been connected with medical missionary work for the last twenty-three years. In 1869, when following the Maharajah of Jeypoor, whose private physician I was at that time, I delivered a lecture at Simla. There were two lads present listening to me, and, after the lecture was over, their father came and said they had been deeply impressed with what had been said about medical work, and were resolved to give themselves to the work, if they only knew how they might be led into it. That gentleman who came to me was William Carey, the great-grandson of dear old Carey, of Serampore. I had great pleasure in reporting to the Secretary of the Edinburgh Medical Missionary Society the desire of those two young men, and after some correspondence they were admitted into the Society. Scholarships were obtained for them, and in 1875 I had the great pleasure of seeing those two young men graduate in the University of Edinburgh. It has pleased God to take one of them to heaven, but there is one still at work, and that is William Carey, the medical missionary at Delhi."

Progress All Along the Line.—Dr. Valentine, concluding his address, said: "There is progress in India all along the line. Eighty years ago, in the principal towns of India, the fires of the suttee, upon which were tied the living widow to the dead body of her husband, and both reduced to ashes, were burning. Eighty years ago the Car of Juggernaut might have been seen crushing living bodies to shapeless masses. Of those things that disgraced India eighty years ago, not one single case is now to be found, and in that great work your own missionaries have done pioneer and pre-eminent service."

A Pundit's Conversion.—The Bishop of Saskatchewan relates the following incident: "In a town I visited I received a number of merchants, headed by a Pundit, an intelligent old man, who was regarded by them as a saint, and who invited us to explain the principles of the Christian religion to them and to discuss them with their leader. We accepted the invitation, and we were very attracted by the earnestness, the sincerity, and the intelligence of the old man Govindappa, and soon got to respect and love him. At the second meeting I put a copy of the New Testament into the old man's hands, and, turning to the Sermon on the Mount, asked him to read it and explain it to the company. He did so, and made various comments upon it. The Spirit of God got hold of him, and he made some most apt remarks, and gave some most striking illustrations in explanation of what he read, appealing to me every now and then. I listened to his explanation, so fresh and clear, with delight, and when the gray-headed old man waxed warm, and with sparkling eyes and earnestness of manner dilated upon the teaching, I could not but feel that the Spirit of the Lord was resting upon him. He never afterward gave up the Bible, and when I last visited him he said, with all the simple earnestness of a believer, 'I have no fear; my hope is in the love of the Father. I believe in Jesus. I am dying a Christian man.'"

A Well-used Bible.—"About Twelve Years ago I remember selling a Canarese Bible to a villager in my district, who had shown great interest in the truth of Christ. He said, 'I have heard you preach; I believe what you say, but I want to know more about it,' and he asked me to sell him a Bible. 'But,' I said, 'you cannot read,' and I knew there was no member of his family who could read, so I asked him what was the use of him taking the Bible. He replied: 'There are people in my village who can read, and I shall get them to read to me as often as possible.' We sold him the Bible, and we did not see him again for many years. Eighteen months ago I went to the village and I inquired for the Bible. I saw it had been well used, and I asked if it had been read. A little man, a clay potter, came forward and said: 'I have been reading this book regularly to Basappa, and the words are very precious to me.' I examined him, and I found that the book had been well used, and that he had obtained a very correct and true view of the Gospels. A few months ago, when I again went to the village, Basappa asked me to baptize him and his household, and it was my privilege and my pleasure to welcome ten persons into the Church of Christ, and this was simply the result of the circulation of the Bible."

How the Missionaries' Work is Hindered.—Mr. Jones, of Agra, India, says: "All the difficulties we meet do not arise from the Hindoos and Mohammedans. Many come from those who are called Christians, those who have gone out from Great Britain, but who are a disgrace to the name of Christ. The Hindoos and Mohammedans say of an Englishman, 'Oh, he is a Christian,' no matter what his conduct is. The Englishman who gets drunk, as many do in India, is with them a Christian, and when I say that, do you wonder, friends, that I put on the Blue Ribbon? I was the first to put on Blue Ribbon in Agra, and I would put on any number of ribbons if I could convince those in India I am really a Christian. At that time, and for the sake of the Mohammedans, I gave up eating pork, and if it will help me in my work with the Hindoos I will give up beef. These people wondered I was a Christian when I said I did not drink liquor. They have an idea that, when a man becomes a Christian, the missionary makes him drunk, and compels him to eat pork or beef."

Not Afraid of Being Beheaded.—Sir William McArthur, in a course of a recent speech, said: "When travelling from California to New Zealand I was accompanied by two missionaries who were going to Japan. These missionaries told me that a number of years before a young lad in Japan met with a tract (it was the first time he ever heard of Christianity), and this tract awakened his curiosity to know what this Christianity was. So intense was his desire that he got himself smuggled on board a ship sailing for Boston. The captain took an interest in him, and told a merchant in Boston about him, who sent him to school, and then to college. The young man was ultimately converted to God, and was actuated by a great desire to go back to his own country. He was told, 'If you go back to your own country you will be beheaded;' for the law was that any one going back to Japan having embraced Christianity should be beheaded. He said, 'I may, but I have gone to the Lord Jesus, and I have asked Him to have that law altered, and He will have it altered.' Strange to say, next year the law was altered through the influence of the American Ambassador. The young man went back to Japan, and is now at the head of a large institution, where there are upward of a hundred men training for the Christian ministry."

SUNLIGHT INTERCEPTED.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

WIND east. Barometer falling. Storm-signals out. Ship reefing maintopsail. Awnings taken in. Prophecies of foul weather everywhere. The clouds congregate around the sun, proposing to abolish him. But after a while he assails the flanks of the clouds with flying artillery of light, and here and there is sign of clearing weather. Many do not observe it. Many do not realize it. "And now men see not the bright light which is in the clouds." In other words, there are a hundred men looking for storm where there is one man looking for sunshine.

My object will be this morning to get you and myself into the delightful habit of

MAKING THE BEST OF EVERYTHING.

You may have wondered at the statistics that in India, in the year 1875, there were over nineteen thousand people slain by wild beasts, and that in the year 1876 there were in India over twenty thousand people destroyed by wild animals. But there is a monster in our own land which is year by year destroying more than that. It is the old bear of melancholy, and with Gospel weapons this morning I propose to chase it back to its midnight caverns. I mean to do two sums—a sum in subtraction and a sum in addition—a subtraction from your days of depression and an addition to your days of joy. If God will help me I will compel you to see the bright light that there is in the clouds, and compel you to make the best of everything.

I. In the first place, you ought to make the very best of all

YOUR FINANCIAL MISFORTUNES.

During the panic a few years ago you all lost money. Some of you lost it in most unaccountable ways. For the question, "How many thousands of dollars shall I put aside this year?" you substituted the question, "How shall I pay my butcher, and baker, and clothier, and landlord?" You had the sensation of rowing hard with two oars, and yet all the time going down stream.

You did not say much about it, because it was not politic to speak much of financial embarrassment; but your wife knew. Less variety of wardrobe, more economy at the table, self-denial in art and tapestry. Compression; retrenchment. Who did not feel the necessity of it? My friend, did you make the best of this? Are you aware of how narrow an escape you made? Suppose you had reached the fortune toward which you were rapidly going? What then? You would have been as proud as Lucifer.

How few men have succeeded largely in a financial sense and yet maintained their simplicity and religious consecration! Not one man out of a hundred. There are glorious exceptions, but the general rule is that in proportion as a man gets well off for this world he gets poorly off for the next. He loses his sense of dependence on God. He gets a distaste for prayer-meetings. With plenty of bank stocks and plenty of Government securities, what does that man know of the prayer, "Give me this day my daily bread?" How few men largely successful in this world are bringing souls to Christ, or showing self-denial for others, or are eminent for piety? You can count them all upon your eight fingers and two thumbs.

One of the old covetous cardinals, when he was sick, and sick unto death, used to have a basin brought in—a basin filled with gold, and his only amusement and the only relief he got for his inflamed hands was running them down through the gold and turning it up in the basin. Oh, what infatuation and what destroying power money has for many a man! Now, you were sailing at thirty knots the hour toward these what a mercy it was, that honest defalcation! The same divine hand that crushed your storehouse, your bank, your office, your insurance company, lifted you out of destruction. The day you honestly suspended in business made your fortune for eternity.

"Oh," you say, "I could get along very well myself, but I am so disappointed that I cannot leave a competency for my children." My brother, the same financial misfortune that is going to save your soul will save your children. With the anticipation of large fortune how much industry would your children have?—without which habit of industry there is no safety. The young man would say, "Well, there's no need of my working; my father will soon step out, and then I'll have just what I want." You cannot hide from him how much you are worth. You think you are hiding it; he knows all about it. He can tell you almost to a dollar. Perhaps he has been to the county office and searched the records of deeds and mortgages, and he has added it all up, and he has made an estimate of how long you will probably stay in this world, and is not as much worried about your rheumatism and shortness of breath as you are.

that you can give your child is the fortune you put in his head and heart. Of all the young men who started life with forty thousand dollars capital, how many turned out well? I do not know half a dozen. The best inheritance a young man can have is the feeling that he has to fight his own battle, and that life is a struggle in which he must throw body, mind, and soul, or be disgracefully worsted.

Where are the burial-places of the men who started life with a fortune? Some of them in the potter's field; some in the suicide's grave. But few of these men reached thirty-five years of age. They drank, they smoked, they gambled. In them the beast destroyed the man. Some of them lived long enough to get their fortunes, and went through them. The vast majority of them did not live to get their inheritance. From the gin-shop or house of infamy they were brought home to their father's house, and in delirium began to pick off loathsome reptiles from the embroidered pillow, and to fight back imaginary devils. And then they were laid out in highly upholstered parlor, the casket covered with flowers by indulgent parents—flowers suggestive of

A RESURRECTION WITH NO HOPE.

As you sat this morning at your breakfast-table, and looked into the faces of your children, perhaps you said within yourself, "Poor things! How I wish I could start them in life with a competency! How I have been disappointed in all my expectations of what I would do for them!" Upon that scene of pathos I break with a pæan of congratulation, that by your financial losses your own prospect for heaven, and the prospect for the heaven of your children, is mightily improved. You may have lost a toy, but you have won a palace.

"How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God!" "It is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven." What does that mean? It means that the grandest blessing God ever bestowed upon you was to take your money away from you. Let me here say, in passing, do not put much stress on the treasures of this world. You cannot take them along with you. At any rate, you cannot take them more than two or three miles; you will have to leave them at the cemetery.

Attila had three coffins. So fond was he of this life, that he decreed that first he should be buried in a coffin of gold, and that then that should be enclosed in a coffin of silver, and that should be enclosed in a coffin of iron, and then a large amount or treasure should be thrown in over his body. And so he was buried, and the men who buried him were slain, so that no one might know where he was buried, and no one might there interfere with his treasures. Oh, men of the world, who want to take your money with you, better have three coffins!

II. Again, I remark, you ought to make the very best of

YOUR BEREAVEMENTS.

The whole tendency is to brood over these separations, and to give much time to the handling of mementoes of the departed, and to make long visitations to the cemetery, and to say, "Oh, I can never look up again; my hope is gone; my courage is gone; my religion is gone; my faith in God is gone! Oh, the wear and tear and exhaustion of this loneliness!" The most frequent bereavement is the loss of children. If your departed child had lived as long as you have lived, do you not suppose that he would have had about the same amount of trouble and trial you have had?

If you could make a choice for your child between forty years of annoyance, loss, vexation, exasperation, and bereavement, and forty years in heaven, would you take the former? Would you snatch away the cup of eternal bliss and put into that child's hand the cup of many bereavements? Instead of the complete safety into which that child has been lifted, would you like to hold it down to the risks of this mortal state? Would you like to keep it out on a sea in which there have been more shipwrecks than safe voyages?

Is it not a comfort to you to know that that child, instead of being besoiled and flung into the mire of sin, is swung clear into the skies? Are not those children to be congratulated that the point of celestial bliss which you expect to reach by a pilgrimage of fifty or sixty or seventy years, they reached at a flash? If the last ten thousand children who have entered heaven had gone through the average of human life on earth, are you sure all those ten thousand children would have finally reached the blissful terminus? Besides that, my friends, you are to look at this matter as a self-denial on your part for their benefit. If your children want to go off in a May-day party, if your children want to go on a flowery and musical excursion, you consent. You might prefer to have them with you, but their jubilant absence satisfies you. Well, your departed children have only gone out in a May-day party, amid flowery and musical entertainment, amid joys and hilarities forever. That ought to quell some of your grief, the thought of their glee.

So it ought to be that you could make the best of all bereavements. The fact that you have so many will make your own departure very cheerful. When you are going on a voyage, everything depends upon where your friends are—if they are on the wharf that you leave, or on the wharf toward which you are going to sail. In other words, the more friends you have in heaven the easier it will be to get away from this world. The more friends here, the more bitter good-bys; the more friends there, the more glorious welcomes.

Some of you have so many brothers, sisters, children, friends in heaven, that I do not know hardly how you are going to crowd through. When the vessel came from foreign lands, and brought a prince to our harbor, the ships were covered with bunting, and you remember how the men-of-war thundered broadsides; but there was no joy there compared with the joy which shall be demonstrated when you sail up the broad bay of heavenly salutation. The more friends you have there, the easier your own transit. What is death to a mother whose children are in heaven? Why, there is no more grief in it than there is in her going into a nursery amid the romp and laughter of her household. Though all around may be dark, see you not the bright light in the clouds—that light the irradiated faces of your glorified kindred?

III. So also, my friends, I would have you make the best of

YOUR SICKNESSES.

When you see one move off with elastic step and in full physical vigor, sometimes you become impatient with your lame foot. When a man descries an object a mile off, and you cannot see it at all, you become impatient of your dim eye. When you hear of a well man making a great achievement you become impatient with your depressed nervous system or your dilapidated health. I will tell you how you can make the worst of it. Brood over it: brood over all these illnesses, and your nerves will become more twitchy, and your dyspepsia more aggravated, and your weakness more appalling. But that is the devil's work, to tell you how to make the worst of it; it is my work to show you a bright light in the clouds.

Which of the Bible men most attract your attention? You say, Moses, Job, David, Jeremiah, Paul. Why, what a strange thing it is that you have chosen those who were physically disordered! Moses—I know he was nervous from the clip he gave the Egyptian. Job—his blood was vitiated and diseased, and his skin distressfully eruptive. David—he had a running sore which he speaks of when he says, "My sore ran in the night and ceased not." Jeremiah had enlargement of the spleen. Who can doubt it who reads Lamentations? Paul—he had a lifetime sickness which the commentators have been guessing about for years, not knowing exactly what the apostle meant by "a thorn in the flesh." I do not know either; but it was something sharp, something that stuck him.

I gather from all this that physical disorder may be the means of grace to the soul. You say you have so many temptations from bodily ailments, and if you were only well you think you could be a good Christian. While your temptations may be different, they are no more than those of the man who has an appetite three times a day, and sleeps eight hours every night.

From my observation, I judge that invalids have a more rapturous view of the next world than well people, and will have higher renown in heaven. The best view of the delectable mountains is through the lattice of the sick-room. There are trains running every hour between pillow and throne, between hospital and mansion, between bandages and robes, between crutch and palm branch. Oh, I wish some of you people who are compelled to cry, "My head, my head! my foot, my foot! my back, my back!" would try some of

THE LORD'S MEDICINE!

You are going to be well anyhow before long. Heaven is an old city, but has never yet reported one case of sickness or one bill of mortality. No ophthalmia for the eye. No pneumonia for the lungs. No pleurisy for the side. No neuralgia for the nerves. No rheumatism for the muscles. "The inhabitant shall never say, I am sick." "There shall be no more pain."

IV. Again, you ought to make the best of LIFE'S FINALITY.

Now, you think I have a very tough subject. You do not see how I am to strike a spark of light out of the flint of the tombstone. There are many people who have an idea that death is the submergence of everything pleasant by everything doleful. If my morning subject could close in the upsetting of all such preconceived notions, it would close well. Who can judge best of the features of a man—those who are close by him, or those who are afar off? "Oh," you say, "those can judge best of the features of a man who are close by him!"

Now, my friends, who shall judge of the features of death—whether they are lovely or whether they are repulsive? You? You are too far off. If I want to get a judgment as to what really the features of death are, I will not ask you; I will ask those who have been within a month of death, or a week of death, or an hour of death, or

A MINUTE OF DEATH.

They stand so near the features, they can tell. They give unanimous testimony, if they are Christian people, that death, instead of being demoniac, is cherubic. Of all the thousands of Christians who have been carried through the gates of Greenwood, gather up their dying experiences, and you will find they nearly all bordered on a jubilate. How often you have seen a dying man join in the psalm being sung around his bedside, the middle of the verse opening to let his ransomed spirit free!—long after the lips could not speak, looking and pointing upward.

Some of you talk as though God had exhausted Himself in building this world; and that all the rich curtains He ever made He hung around this planet, and all the flowers He ever grew He has woven into the carpet of our daisied meadows. No. This world is not the best thing God can do; this world is not the best thing that God has done.

One week of the year is called called so all through the land because there are more blossoms in that week than in any other week of the year. Blossom week! And that is what the future world is to which the Christian is invited—blossom week forever. It is as far ahead of this world as Paradise is ahead of Dry Tortugas; and yet here we stand shivering and fearing to go out, and we want to stay on the dry sand, and amid the stormy petrels, when we are invited to arbors of jessamine and birds of paradise.

One season I had two springtimes. I went to New Orleans in April, and I marked the difference between going toward New Orleans and then coming back. As I went on down toward New Orleans the verdure, the foliage, became thicker and more beautiful. When I came back, the further I came toward home the less the foliage, and less and less it became until there was hardly any. Now, it all depends upon the direction in which you travel. If a spirit from heaven should come toward our world, he is travelling from June toward December, from radiance toward darkness, from hanging gardens toward icebergs. And one would not be very much surprised if a spirit of God sent forth from heaven toward our world should be slow to come. But how strange it is that we dread going out toward that world when going is from December toward June—from the snow of earthly storm to the snow of Edenic blossom—from the arctics of trouble toward the tropics of eternal joy!

Oh, what an ado about dying! We get so attached to the malarial marsh in which we live that we are afraid to go up and live on the hill-top. We are alarmed because

VACATION IS COMING.

Eternal sunlight, and best programme of celestial minstrels and hallelujah, no inducement. Let us stay here and keep cold and ignorant and weak. Do not introduce us to Elijah, and John Milton, and Bourdaloue. Keep our feet on the sharp cobble-stones of earth instead of planting them on the bank of amaranth in heaven. Give us this small island of a leprous world instead of the immensities of splendor and delight. Keep our hands full of nettles, and our shoulder under the burden, and our neck in the yoke, and hopples on our ankles, and handcuffs on our wrists. "Dear Lord," we seem to say, "keep us down here, where we have to suffer, instead of letting us up where we might live and reign and rejoice.

I am amazed at myself and at yourself for this infatuation under which we all rest. Men you would suppose would get frightened at having to stay in this world instead of getting frightened at having to go toward heaven. I congratulate anybody who has a right to die. By that I mean through sickness you cannot avert, or through accident you cannot avoid—your work consummated. "Where did they bury Lily?" said one little child to another. "Oh," she replied, "they buried her in the ground." "What! in the cold ground?" "Oh, no, no; not in the cold ground, but in the warm ground, where ugly seeds become beautiful flowers."

"But," says some one, "it pains me so much to think that I must lose the body with which my soul has so long companioned." You do not lose it. You no more lose your body by death than you lose your watch when you send it to have it repaired, or your jewel when you send it to have it reset, or the faded picture when you send it to have it touched up, or the photograph of a friend when you have it put in a new locket. You

DO NOT LOSE YOUR BODY.

Paul will go to Rome to get his, Payson will go to Portland to get his, President Edwards will go to Princeton to get his, George Cookman will go to the bottom of the Altantic to get his, and we will go to the village churchyards and the city cemeteries to get ours; and when we have our perfect spirit rejoined to our perfect body, then we will be the kind of men and women that the resurrection morning will make possible.

So you see you have not made out any doleful story yet. What have you proved about death? What is the case you have made out? You have made out just this—that death allows us to have a perfect body, free of all aches, united forever with a perfect soul free from all sin. Correct your theology.

WHAT DOES IT ALL MEAN?

Why, it means that moving-day is coming, and that you are going to quit cramped apartments and be mansioned forever. The horse that stands at the gate will not be the one lathered and bespattered, carrying bad news, but it will be the horse that St. John saw in Apocalyptic vision—the white horse on which the King comes to the banquet. The ground around the palace will quake with the tires and hoofs of celestial equipage, and those Christians who in this world lost their friends, and lost their property, and lost their health, and lost their life, will find out that God was always kind, and that all things worked together for their good, and that those were the wisest people on earth who made the best of everything. See you not now the bright light in the clouds?

Messrs. Moody and Sankey are Announced to commence the season's work by a short series of services in St. Louis, by invitation from the Young Men's Christian Association. Mr. Moody desires that a misstatement cabled here from England during his work there should be corrected. He writes: "I am very sorry to learn that a statement has been widely circulated in the public press, in which I am represented as having announced that Mr. Sankey was so broken down, physically, that his restoration to health was entirely improbable, and that his voice, which had so often led thousands of assembled worshippers in the songs of Zion, would probably never be heard again in our services. As much sympathy has been expressed, and many inquiries made, I would be glad to have the statement in regard to Mr. Sankey's health corrected. Mr. Sankey was not quite well during the latter part of our long stay in London, but I never looked upon his illness as permanent, neither did I make the statement attributed to me in the newspaper article referred to. I am glad to know that the short season of rest taken by Mr. Sankey has already restored him to health again, and we are looking forward to the time when we shall be allowed the privilege of working together again in this country, which, we trust, will be at no distant day."

THE PARTICLES IN PROPHECY.

By Wiley Jones (in The Restitution).

Who are the Promisees—What is Promised—The Land of Canaan Understood—What Eternal Inheritance Includes—The Reference to the Seed—Not to be Dispensed with—The Importance of the Particles—The Circumstances in which Paul Wrote—The Eternal Title.

FOR the sake of analyzing this verse (Gal 3 : 16), let us look at it in three sections:

(1) "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made; (2) He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; (3) but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ."

In the first section Paul refers to the promises in the historical style, using the pronoun in the third person—"his." Then, wishing particularly to explain one clause, he is very exact about it, reminding us, in the second section, how that clause does not read. Then, in the third section, by quoting verbatim and strictly from the sacred record without varying a single letter, he shows us how it does read, and explains who is meant by the last word ("seed") of that clause.

Now, as Paul's explanation shows

WHO ARE THE PROMISEES—

namely, Christ and Abraham—so the immediate context from which the clause "And to thy seed" is quoted, shows what is the thing promised—namely, the land.

In the history of Abraham, according to the Septuagint or Greek version of Genesis, the following are its only occurrences:

"For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it and to thy seed forever" (Gen. 13 : 15).

"Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it: for I will give it unto thee and to thy seed forever" (Gen. 13 : 17).

"And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God" (Gen. 17 : 8).

"Unto thee and to thy seed I will give this land" (Gen. 24 : 7).

I have not here noted the occurrences of this phrase in the history of Isaac and Jacob, but only in that of Abraham, because Paul makes special mention of him in Gal. 3 : 16.

As now many believers read only the English common version, so it is highly probable that in the Apostolic age many Christians read only the Greek, and could not read the Hebrew. When those early Christians turned to the Greek version of Genesis and saw the connection in which the words "And to thy seed" occur, must they not, beyond a doubt, have concluded that Paul was referring to the promise of "the land of Canaan?" And was not this perfectly logical conclusion confirmed by the fact that in verse 18 he calls it "the inheritance," and that in Heb. 11 : 8, 9 it is called "the land of promise" and "the place which he should afterward receive for an inheritance?" Could they not see also that Stephen refers to the same "inheritance" that Paul does, and applies it to the land, even "This land wherein ye now dwell," as he said to the Jews then living upon it? (Acts 7 : 4, 5.) Surely, then, the testimony of two such witnesses as he and Paul must be conclusive that the land was the thing promised to Abraham and his seed.

The third of Galatians is well worthy of careful study. At its conclusion Bishop Ellicott, as quoted by Alford, says, "the declaration verse 7 is substantiated by twenty-two verses of the deepest, the most varied, and the most comprehensive reasoning that exist in the compass of the great apostle's writings." And Alford himself, on verse 18, defines "the inheritance" as "the general term for all the blessings promised to Abraham, as summed up in his Seed who was to inherit the land—in other words, for the kingdom of Christ."

Taking only the common English version and the original Hebrew we find in Abraham's history according to Genesis, that "And to thy seed" occurs but three times—once in Gen. 13 : 13 and twice in Gen. 17 : 7, 8.

Two out of these three occurrences are connected with one is connected with the promise that the Lord will be a God to Abraham and to his seed. Now, is it for a moment to be supposed that Abraham discredited and rejected the repeated "promises" of the land, and accepted only the promise that the Lord will be a God to him and to his seed? surely, he must have believed with an equal faith all three of these promises, and so should we. For whether we follow the Greek or the English version of Genesis, or whether we drop both of these and appeal only to the original Hebrew, the promise of the landed inheritance to Abraham and his seed is something that we dare not dispense with. That land is the primordial territory of the saints' inheritance when the kingdom is established upon it that will afterward extend over the entire "world" or kosmos (Rom. 4 : 13; Ps. 2 : 8; Zech. 9 : 10).

THE PROMISE OF THE LAND;

Paul himself, guided by divine inspiration, has included in his quotation, and therefore we have no right to drop them out, leaving only the words "Thy seed," to build on. It would be very unsafe building erected by such a process, for prepositions and conjunctions are the cements and ligaments of speech, and to drop them out of a language would be like dropping the cement or mortar from between the bricks of a house, causing the whole edifice to tumble into confusion and ruin. A very accomplished linguist has said, "Much more than any of us is aware depends upon the import of the particles of language. These are the cement of speech and the connectives of thought. They give all the meaning which the principal words in language possess, in their various acceptations."

THE PREPOSITION AND CONJUNCTION

The fact that the originals of the two words, "And to" have been translated and retranslated, still retaining all their force in each language, does not in any way weaken their authority, but rather confirms and strengthens it by the laws of comparative philology; so that these words, in this connection, are perfectly "safe to build a doctrine on."

To understand the masterly argument in Galatians we must remember that Judaizers insisted on circumcision and its train of ceremonial observances as essential to salvation (Acts 15 : 1). But Paul shows that circumcision, in the sense that they were contending for it, renders one "a debtor to do the whole law" (Gal. 5 : 3). Hence, if they rested their plea and hope of salvation on such perfection of legalism they would be disappointed, for none of them did "the whole law" (Jas. 3 : 2), and none can be justified by the law unless he keep it wholly (Gal. 3 : 10). Therefore, while the moral law, at least, is to be observed as a rule of life, yet we are not to rest the hope of salvation on the grounds of perfectly keeping that law.

He then shows them the true way of justification, as exemplified in Abraham, who, long before the law, was called out from the Gentiles, promised an eternal inheritance of Canaan, and had his faith counted to him for righteousness. On the same grounds we, called out from Jews and Gentiles, have the promise of the same eternal inheritance covenanted to Abraham, are justified by faith, and blessed with him.

Gentiles have been permitted to occupy Canaan and other parts of the earth much more than a thousand years, without invalidating the promise that "the meek shall inherit the earth" (Matt. 5 : 5), and the fact that the Jews, in a subordinate condition, are to occupy Canaan during the Millennium does not invalidate to it, for that title belongs primarily to Christ, and secondarily to the saints as joint-heirs with Him. For thousands of years the saints, as a persecuted and downtrodden class, have dwelt on the same earth with the wicked; is it unreasonable, then, that as a triumphant, immortalized, and reigning class they should dwell there one thousand years with mortal inhabitants, especially when we consider that the mortal inhabitants during that age are to be restrained greatly from their wickedness, and made almost as harmless as the saints now are?

Where the righteous will dwell is plainly settled by many such testimonies as this—"The righteous shall inherit the land and dwell therein forever," or, as Bagster's version reads "The righteous shall inherit the earth, and shall dwell forever upon it" (Ps. 37 : 29). That they may not be taken "out of the world," but kept "out of the evil" is the Great Redeemer's prayer (John 17 : 15).

A NOTEWORTHY EXPERIENCE.

By the Rev. Charles F. Deems, LL.D.

A YOUNG gentleman of sincere character, a member of the church of which I am pastor gave me the following experience:

He said that, to the best of his knowledge, not a drop of any sort of intoxicating liquors had ever passed his lips. He knew it had not so far back as he can remember in his childhood. He has, therefore, no temptation to drink—from either a strong habit, or a love for the taste of wines and other liquors—and yet he maintains a daily warfare with the appetite. He never passes a saloon without a strong inclination to enter. He has to rein himself up, and draw himself away, not to enter and take his first drink. This is not an occasional or spasmodic feeling; it is the one regular daily conflict of his life.

My friend gave graphic descriptions of one or two such pitched battles, when the desire became almost strong enough to overpower his will.

I did not ask him about his father, but I did say to him: "Was your grandfather addicted to drinking?"

He said: "No, neither he nor my father; but my great-grandfather was an habitual drunkard."

I desire the young men who may be among my readers to ponder these facts, not in the light of religion, but under the illumination of science. Observations, scientifically conducted, have demonstrated the doctrines of heredity pointed out in the Bible. Hereditary traits often leap a generation. An insane man's son may be perfectly sane, and the insanity break out in his grandson. In the crossings of marriage that tendency to insanity may be weakened, and by and by entirely disappear, just as any taint or stain in the blood may be largely purged out in the course of generations where marriages happen to bring better blood into the family. I say "happen," because, alas! so few marriages are ever formed with any view whatever to the improvement of the race.

In the case of my young friend it leaped two generations. If he become a father, his son may not be afflicted with this great trial to which he is perpetually subjected; but his grandson may, and, if not he, almost surely his great-grandson will. If he should give way and become a drunkard, it will spring up again in some of his descendants. But if he should successfully resist to the end, and should marry a woman in whose family the poison of strong drink has never come, the desire in the next descendant who has it will be much feebler than in the case of my friend. And so it may finally be purged out of the blood.

Every manly man, of noble impulses and high character, who takes upon himself the responsibility of parentage, must have a profound interest in the fate of his descendants. A feeling of reverence which men have for ancestors shoots out a branch in the direction of descendants. If I honor my grandfather, who was a hero, and my great-grandfather, who was a saint—neither of whom I have ever seen—I will naturally desire that my great-grandchildren, although they may never have seen me, will, if they do not honor my memory, at least have no occasion, in the despair of their inability to fight against an inherited evil, curse my name and curse my existence as the fountain of their sorrows.

Setting aside all the teaching of the sacred Scriptures, with all other ethical considerations, one's honorable self-love should keep one in purity of living, not simply for one's own sake, but for the sake of those for whose existence in the world he is responsible.

I ask the young men among my readers to go back and ponder the experience of my friend. Upon reflection I am inclined to think that it is extraordinary only in the perfect resistance which he has made to his strong inclination, up to this date. There are probably tens of thousands who, under other circumstances, have fallen. Nothing is more absurdly against the truth of nistory than the statement that "such a man is only his own enemy."

CHINESE SUPERSTITION.

In a recent letter from Mr. Charles H. Judd, a missionary in China, he gives the following incidents, which illustrate the superstitious credulity of the people, and the great need there is for a wider publication of the Gospel of Christ's salvation. The first story refers to

A CHINAMAN SURPRISED.

Two days ago Mr. Broumton and myself were in the street preaching. A Chinese gentleman stood and listened. He asked some questions as to who Jesus was, which I answered. He then followed us home some half a mile, and we sat and talked together for about an hour. "Oh," said he, "your doctrine is very much like ours, for we have some wonderful stories about persons doing miracles." "But," I said, "Jesus is a Saviour." "Oh, yes, we Chinese have a saviour, too," he replied, "the compassionate and merciful goddess of mercy, saviour of the world." "No," I said, "there is a great difference. The father of the Lord Jesus Christ was God; the father of your goddess of mercy was only a man. Jesus died for our sins and rose again, and went up to heaven, and His own disciples saw Him ascend."

At this the man seemed somewhat surprised. I then read with him part of Acts 1 about the Saviour's ascension and the promise of His coming again. "Now," I said, "no one ever saw your idols rise from the dead nor do any of your books say that any one ever saw them go up to heaven; but the Lord's disciples wrote what they had seen. Beside which, I see that many thousands of the followers of Confucius, of Buddha, and of the goddess of mercy are still no better than other people; they lie, they cheat, take opium, and commit all kinds of sins; but we find that the Lord Jesus changes the heart and is able to save us from sin."

"What," he said, "do you mean that your Saviour really changes your hearts?"

"Indeed I do, for He has changed mine. Once I loved bad things; now I love God and good things, and therefore I know in my heart that Jesus lives."

This seemed to surprise him. He bade us farewell, and promised to come again. His home is many, many miles away, so that we may never meet here again.

PREPARING FOR A GHOST'S RETURN.

A few days ago, on passing our landlord's house, I saw that the windows were closed and boarded up, the doors all shut, and papers pasted upon them, with the words, "Don't enter." A ladder made of reeds was leaning over the front door, and a number of pieces of paper, made into artificial money, hung upon the ladder. The house floors were covered with dust from the stove. The family had all gone to spend a day and night in a neighbor's house, not to sleep, but to watch. What did it all mean? Why just this. One of the family had died a few days before and was buried. The Taouist priests had told them by calculations that on a certain day and hour the ghost of the dead person would be led into the house by the god of vengeance, and then taken back again into the dark regions. The ladder of reeds was for the man's spirit to enter the house The paper money was for his use in the unseen world. The feast spread out in the house was to feast the god of vengeance and his prisoner. The dust spread on the floor was put there to see if he left any footprints, and to show whether he had been or not, for they say he comes in the shape of either a fowl or a cat, and as cats and fowls often get inside these empty houses, it is not difficult to find their footprints and to believe that the god of vengeance has been.

After the time appointed by the heathen priests is passed over, a number of crackers are let off to drive away the god and all his evil influences. Of course the priests are well paid for their craft. Poor souls! Deceived and deceiving one another. They know nothing of God, whose name and nature is Love, and yet who alone can say "Vengeance is mine." They never love their gods, but dread them, and well they may, for most of them are hideous figures. The highest of all Chinese worship is to worship heaven and earth; they know of nothing beyond. All the gods they worship (besides heaven and earth) are ancient men and women of renown. Oh then, let your hearts and ours swell with the praises of Him who hath called us out of darkness into His marvellous light, and hath washed us in the precious blood of Christ.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Only Three Steps to Heaven!—At a Recent meeting the Rev. Mr. Lee related: "A young man on his way to an evangelistic meeting was stopped by an infidel, who rudely asked him, 'Is it a long way to heaven?' 'No,' was the quiet, incisive reply; 'there are only three steps to take, and you are there; first, out of self; second, into Christ; third, believing in Christ.' I do not know what the infidel thought of this answer, for he said nothing, but looked considerably surprised and nonplussed; but it is just the way the truth is put in the Bible, and I cannot make it plainer."

Rebuking the Gamblers.—The Rev. Leslie Murray related: "Whitefield was staying in an inn along with a pious friend. In the room next to theirs a company of gamblers were gathered; their language and oaths were so fearful that Whitefield could not get any sleep. He rose from his bed and went into the gamblers' room, and spoke very faithfully to them of their danger, and then returned to his bed. There was no apparent effect made upon them, and Whitefield's friend said, 'What good did you do?' 'I have got a soft pillow,' was the reply. Faithfulness in duty always gives us ease of mind, and though to be loyal to God's call to serve Him may under some circumstances be painful at the time, yet the pain is invariably mixed with joy, arising from a sense of the divine approval."

A Foul-Mouthed Butcher's Wife.—In Corunna, Spain, was one of the most wicked persons in that very wicked place. The usual Spanish oaths are vile, but her delight was to invent new and viler ones. Some freak induced her to attend an evangelistic meeting which was held in the town. Next day the priest called, and said, "You have been to the meeting of heretics?" "Are you against them?" she inquired. "Yes," the priest answered. "Then I will attend them regularly after this," was her reply. She was as good as her word, and attended simply to spite the priest. But soon she was convicted of sin by the Holy Spirit, and surrendered to Christ. She saw her husband did a great business on Sundays, but the first Sunday after she had found Christ, they agreed to shut the shop up on that day for the future. This action caused great surprise among the customers, who thronged about the door, wondering what was the matter. On Monday and Tuesday the place was crowded by people, eager to know the reason of the shut door on Sundays. The woman told them the story of her salvation over and over again, and is now proving the truth of the promise, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you;" for they do more business now on Mondays and Tuesdays than they formerly did all the week before, Sunday included.

From Gloom into Glory.—The Rev. Mr. Soresby said: "I knew a man who, though a Christian, was always depressed in spirits. He was attentive to his duties, and regularly took advantage of the means of grace, but if you spoke to him about spiritual matters, and gave him a chance of replying, he spoke in a most disheartening way. I studied his case carefully, and thought that I might reach him by a little plain speaking. 'Friend,' I said to him, 'I have studied your case, and think that your depression of spirits comes from physical causes.' 'No, sir, it does not,' he answered, 'it comes from my moral depravity.' I then felt from his tone that I could not reach him. One day a gentleman called, and said, 'Our friend is ill, and I believe he is dying; I am going to see him; will you come?' 'Certainly,' I replied. On entering his room I asked, 'How are you?' 'All is bright! all is bright! all is bright!' was the cheerful reply. Light was sown in darkness, and as eternity opened up to his sight, through the riches of divine grace given unto him, the clouds were rolled away by the brightness of its glory."

A Pharisee's Confession and Change.—The following testimony was given at a recent meeting: "For years I coveted the smiles of my friends and neighbors by appearing to be a Christian. I went to church every Sabbath, taught a Sabbath-school class, and, in fact, actually thought that I was 'a bright and shining example to those who did not do as I did.' But all the time I was a pharisee, deceiving myself and friends, and I only discovered it lately. In one of Mr. Moody's meetings a friend put his hand on my shoulder, and asked, 'Are you a Christian?' Rather rudely I answered, 'Of course I am.' Immediately I began to fear, and got very anxious; then I thought, 'Why should I fear; am I not a Christian, as good as any of them?' 'No,' said conscience, 'you are not, for if death were to come now where would you be?' My whole life began to rise up before me, and I trembled; my self-righteousness fell off me, and I saw myself a sinner in the eyes of God. In my trouble a Christian friend pointed me to Isaiah 53:5: 'He was wounded for our transgressions; He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; and with His stripes we are healed. Rest came to my soul simply by believing on Him."

A Spanish Priest Converted and Imprisoned—Mr. Graham related: "I met a Scotchman in the north of Spain, whence I have just returned, who told me that he was converted in Glasgow, and that immediately he got out to Spain he began to work for Christ. One day he got into conversation with a Roman Catholic priest, and made Christ the subject. The priest got much interested, and they made arrangements to read and study the Bible together. This was attended by the usual result, and the priest found himself compelled to write to his Archbishop on the subject of his doubts. The reply was that the Archbishop wondered that a sensible man like him troubled himself about such things. The priest again wrote, saying that he was actually converted to Christ, and intended leaving the Roman Catholic Church. This made a great turmoil, and the Archbishop visited him personally, when, finding that he was grounded on the rock, Christ Jesus, he had the regenerated priest put into prison, where he was kept six months, till the Scotchman got some people in power to let him out. Now these two men have gathered together a living Church of true believers in Christ and His Word of about one hundred persons."

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

NOTICE.

THE announcement made, in this place, in the last two issues of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, that the size of the paper would be increased on the first of January next, must be qualified. The paper will be enlarged, but the date of the alteration has not been fixed. The promise made was, therefore, premature. The enlargement will involve a large outlay, but it will be made as soon as there is a sufficient increase in the circulation to justify it. The steady growth that has taken place in the subscription list this year encourages us to hope that the paper may be enlarged on the date mentioned, but it is as yet too early to make a definite promise to that effect.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Prohibition Candidates, Ex-Governor St. John, of Kansas, and the Hon. William Daniel, of Maryland, were formerly notified of their nomination on August 25th, at Cuba, N. Y. A temperance camp-meeting was being held there, and an audience of nearly three thousand persons listened to the speeches of the committee and the candidates. Ex-Governor St. John, in the course of his remarks, said: "There are more political parties in the field to-day than there are political issues. Upon the great question as to what should be done with the traffic in intoxicating liquors as a beverage, both the Democratic and Republican party are united in favor of making the traffic permanent, while the Prohibitionists demand that it shall be forever placed under the condemnation of the laws of the land. Thus an issue is clearly made, and I think it safe to say the only one to-day that really reaches the heart and consciences of the citizen. Upon this issue we go to the people, the source of all political power. Let us appeal to reason rather than to prejudice. Let those resort to personal abuse and scandal who have nothing better to uphold their cause. The Prohibition party was not organized as a mere threat or menace. It is the outgrowth of a rapidly increasing and crystallizing sentiment against the great evil of the age—an evil that the old parties dared not attack, but against which this young party of the people, in defence of the homes of the nation has entered upon a warfare that shall never cease so long as the flag of our country waves its protecting folds over legalized dram shops." St. John is the only one of the four candidates for the Presidency whose private character has not been assailed.

The Irish Vote in the Approaching Election appears to be a matter of paramount concern to the politicians of both parties. During the past week Republican and Democratic journals have devoted a considerable portion of their space to an effort to prove that the candidates, whose election they respectively advocate, are entitled to the Irish vote. What Mr. Blaine did or did not do to effect the liberation of Irish suspects from English prisons under the coercion law; what Mr. Cleveland would have done and what General Butler advised, have all been exhaustively discussed, as if the whole question of capacity for the Presidential office turned on the holder's disposition to protect Irishmen who cross the Atlantic for lawless purposes. It is one of the most suggestive and humiliating features of this remarkable campaign. If the Irish vote can be gained only by giving pledges to protect dynamiters when they go abroad, it will be dearly purchased, and such pledges may alienate other citizens, who judge of a candidate's fitness for the office by his character, intelligence, and knowledge of national concerns.

The Work of Raising Money for the Republican Campaign Fund is being cautiously conducted. Congress intended to prevent a repetition of the Jay Hubbell scandal, and the law it passed to protect the Civil Service employés from assessments has apparently been carefully studied, so as to avoid the enforcement of the severe penalties attached to a violation of its provisions. The National Committee contains no person holding office under the Government, so that embarrassment from one section of the law will be avoided. Complaints have, however, been made that the spirit of the law is being violated while the letter of it is being observed. Voluntary contributions are invited, and the clerks are perfectly well aware of the consequences that may ensue if the invitation is declined. The Civil Service Reform Association has appointed a committee to watch the proceedings of the Republican Finance Committee, with instructions to report any evasion of the law. It is time that assessments, direct and indirect, should cease. When the Government clerks have performed the work for which they are paid, their obligations to the Government are discharged. It is unjust to require partisan services and payments from them.

Further Disclosures in the Grant & Ward affairs may be expected. Mr. Ward has been held in prison as if he were the only culprit in the case, and he is, besides, being sued by several parties. He threatens now to make a full exposure of the whole business, with names and dates. It may be hoped he will do so. No one supposes that Mr Ward had all the proceeds of the business, and it is generally believed that the people who benefited were aware of the character of the transactions from which their "profits" were derived. Mr. Ward cannot do a better service to the public than to put it on its guard against those who are now shielding themselves behind him.

A Holocaust in a Railroad Car is Reported from Colorado. A train of seventeen cars, containing a circus, was proceeding, on August 29th, from Fort Collins to Golden. When nine miles beyond Greeley the engineer saw fire and smoke proceeding from the car next the engine, in which about sixty men lay asleep. He at once reversed his engine and blew the whistle. Only one of the doors of the car could be opened, and as the fire was burning close to it, there was neither entrance nor egress by it. Two men climbed into the car through a small window and passed a pipe in connected with the engine tank. It was, however, evident that there was no hope of extinguishing the fire. Most of the inmates of the car were stupefied with the smoke, and it required almost superhuman exertions to carry them to the window and pass them through. Several limbs were broken in endeavoring to save the insensible men. At length axes were obtained, and a way was cut for those who could move to get out, but it was too late to save many lives. Some were carried out dreadfully burned, only to die in the open air. Others—it cannot be learned how many—were utterly consumed. Seven men were taken to the hospital at Denver, all of whom were badly burned. The scene during the burning is described as horrible beyond description. The shrieks of the burning men, the roars of the wild beasts on the train, and the howls of the wolves on the prairie added to the horrors of the spectacle. A number of the rescued agree that in the cars were two barrels of gasoline, which exploded either from sparks from the engine or from the naked torch with which the men were accustomed to light themselves to bed.

Disastrous Tornadoes Visited Several Western States and Dakota on August 29th. Evansville, Ind., suffered severely, and cities in Minnesota, Tennessee, and Kentucky report heavy losses. At Evansville hundreds of houses were injured, roofs torn off, walls blown down, and hundreds of shade trees destroyed. Several were injured by flying timbers, and a negro was killed below the town, being struck by a falling wall. The spire of the Lutheran Church was blown down, and a schoolhouse which cost ten thousand dollars was demolished. The steamer Belmont, plying between Evansville and Henderson, Ky., was capsized, and fourteen persons on board were drowned. Huron, D. T., felt the full force of the cyclone, which there presented the form of three gigantic funnels travelling in a south-westerly direction and destroying everything in their path. Many lives were lost by falling walls.

The Prohibition Amendment in Maine will be submitted to the vote of the people on September 8th. Persistent and untiring efforts are being made to carry it by a large majority, thus giving permanence to the prohibitory law. Miss Frances E. Willard is actively engaged in the campaign, and three hundred speakers are laboring in the same cause in various parts of the State. Mrs. L. M. N. Stevens, the President of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, is organizing and managing the woman's work. A telegram from Portland states that a majority of 50,000 is expected for the amendment.

The Spread of Mormonism in Arizona has aroused public sentiment in that territory. The United States Grand Jury has found seven indictments for polygamy, the first ever found in Arizona. A brief telegram by the Associated Press states that great excitement prevails, and both Mormons and "Gentiles" are watching the proceedings with profound interest. It has been one of the favorite projects of the Mormon leaders to establish colonies outside Utah, and they have succeeded to some extent in Idaho and Nevada. It may be hoped that this action of the Grand Jury will prevent a settlement in Arizona.

Three of Mr. Moody's Boys were Drowned at Gill, Mass., on August 25th. Two of the boys were picked up in England by the evangelist during his recent campaign, and the third came from Stamford, Conn. They were all about thirteen years old. They were staying at the Boys' School during the vacation, when it is the practice to allow those who are homeless or a long way from home to remain at the school. They went out to bathe in the Connecticut River, and never returned. Search was made, and an Indian boy discovered the bodies the following day. Appearances indicated that one of the English boys had been seized with cramp in the river, and that the others had lost their ives in trying to save him.

A Convention of Christian Workers will begin on Tuesday, September 9th, at the Twenty-third Street Tabernacle, between Sixth and Seventh avenues, New York, of which the Rev. A. B. Simpson is pastor, and will continue until the following Friday. The principal topics to be discussed are: "The Christian Life: Its Spirit and Power;" "Christian Work Among the Masses," and the "Evangelization of the World." Mr. and Mrs. Henry Grattan Guinness, the founders of the Training Institute for Home and Foreign Missionaries, at East London, England, and of the Congo Mission, are expected to be present. The object of the Convention is to quicken Christian faith and life and arouse Christians to the neglected work of our time; and, in some sense, to reproduce in this country the best features and results of the well-known Mildmay Annual Conference in London.

Another Arctic Expedition is Said to be in preparation. A Press Association telegram from Washington says that Chief Engineer Melville, who was on the Jeannette Arctic expedition, will shortly apply for a leave of absence from the navy for two years, in order to take command of a new Polar expedition, which, it is said, will leave in the fall of next year for the purpose of trying to reach the pole by way of Franz Josef's Land. Cyrus W. Field, Jr., has said that he will furnish one half the money needed to fit out such an expedition, and the members of the New York Yacht Club have volunteered to subscribe the remainder.

Mrs. Mary Clemmer Hudson, the Popular writer, died at Washington, August 18th, of hemorrhage of the brain. A few years since she was thrown from a carriage, and received serious injuries about the head, from which she has never fully recovered. She recently took a European trip, however, and since her return has appeared to be nearly well. But a few weeks ago she was taken ill, and it now seems probable that she had a slight attack of apoplexy. Mary Clemmer was born in Utica, N. Y., in 1830, but in early years her father moved to Massachusetts, and she was educated mainly in the Normal School at Westfield. She began to write at the age of fourteen; and has been known chiefly by her newspaper letters from Washington, though she has written several books. She was twice married, first to Rev. Mr. Ames, and afterward to Mr. Edmund Hudson, editor of the Washington Capital, but has always been known as Mary Clemmer, and has occupied a very prominent place among her sex as a woman of letters.

Montreal was Last Week the Scene of an illustrious gathering. The British Association for the Advancement of Science opened its sessions in that city on August 27th, when its President, Lord Rayleigh, delivered his inaugural address. The meetings are usually held in Great Britain, but this year, chiefly through the exertions of Captain Bedford Pim, an Arctic veteran, the Association has met in Canada. Over eight hundred English scientists have crossed the Atlantic to attend the meetings, and many distinguished Canadian and American scholars are also taking part in the proceedings. Mr. Edward Atkinson, of Boston, Mass., was the chief speaker in the economic section, and the Canadian scientists have charge of the department of geology. Lieutenant Greely received a special invitation from the association, and his address on August 29th excited much enthusiasm. He said, in the course of his speech, that one of the most interesting results of his observations at Lady Franklin Bay will be a comparison of the swinging of the pendulum at the furthest point north reached with that at Washington. He explained that, although most of their instruments had to be abandoned, the pendulum apparatus, which weighed ninety pounds, was brought back, and has been sent to Washington, where it has been reswung, and where comparisons will be made, he remarking, with evident pride, that he had told his party that the pendulum was a very important instrument, but if one man of the twenty-five complained, he would immediately abandon it. None would hear of this, and an important comparison is thus rendered possible. Speaking of the observation of temperature, he stated that the lowest temperature ever recorded was experienced in February last, when the mean temperature was 50° below zero.

Living Like a Prize-Fighter is a Recommendation to Christians, given by Ben Hogan the evangelist, who knows by experience how prize-fighters live. The trainer insists on cleansing and purifying, and the Christian can have that process through the blood of Christ; the weight has to be reduced, and Christ relieves him of the burden of sin; he must have a fighting suit; that too is provided (Eph. 6: 13–18); and he is cautioned never to look behind him, which is precisely his duty in his Christian struggle (Phil. 3: 13).

A Scrub-Woman's Work and Earnings are preferred to ease and luxury, as the product of vice, by a lady recently converted at the Cremorne Mission. Jerry McAuley's Newspaper relates that a woman who had been keeping two houses of bad repute was induced to visit Cremorne. While there the Spirit of God convicted her of sin. Feeling that her mode of gaining a livelihood was not compatible with the Christian profession, she relinquished her two houses, and gave up her pictures and decorations, saying that she had done with them. Work was obtained for her in the employ of a sewing machine company, where she earned $6 a week, "just what I have been accustomed to pay my washerwoman," she said. After some little while she obtained a sewing machine for herself and supported herself by its use. When she was asked if she wanted to go back to the old life, she replied: "I would rather scrub than leave my religion."

A Revival has Taken Place in Anderson, S.C., under the preaching of the Rev. J. De Witt Burkhead, evangelist of the Presbytery of Eastern Texas. He commenced a series of services in the Presbyterian church, which continued during twelve successive days, with increasing tokens of the divine blessing. It became necessary to obtain a larger building, and the Baptist church was placed at the disposal of the evangelist. Although that is a large building, it has been found necessary to hold overflow meetings. The number of those making a profession of faith through God's blessing on these services is very large, and all the churches of the city are receiving additions.

The Annual Meeting of the National Prison Association will be held in Saratoga from the 6th to the 10th of September. The annual sermon and discussion of the following subjects form the chief features of the programme: "Christianity and the Criminal;" "Interstate Extradition;" "Prison Labor;" "Progressive Sentences," and others of vital interest. On Tuesday afternoon, September 9th, a joint meeting will be held with the American Social Science Association, with a discussion on the topic, "Industrial Art Education in Prisons." Among those announced to make addresses and present papers during the Convention are Professor Francis Wayland, ex-Governor Henry M. Hoyt, of Pennsylvania; Walter Browne, Esq., of London; Professor N. A. Wells, of Syracuse, and Z. R. Brockway, of Elmira. This association, which is doing a very important work, is organized to improve the condition of our county jails; to assist ex-convicts who are struggling to reform, and yet who find the forces of society opposed to them and the ranks of labor closed to them; to counsel and otherwise assist families who are, by the criminal course of some supporting member, left to the bitter struggle of poverty and the added burden of disgrace; to provide wholesome reading matter to prisoners, and to secure proper spiritual and moral instruction in the penal institutions, where it does not exist already. Mr. W. M. F. Round, 65 Bible House, New York, will supply further information.

"RETURN, RETURN, O SHULAMITE; RETURN, RETURN!"

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Return, return, O Shulamite; return, return, that we may look upon thee. What will ye see in the Shulamite? As it were the company of two armies." —SOLOMON'S SONG 6: 13.

Christians Watched by the World—Voices Calling to Them—Pleading for Them to Return—I. The Lower Voices—Whence They Come—Old Companions—Old Joys—Old Cares—The Devil's Welcome for Returning Runaways—Why the Voices Come—The Wise Answer—II. The Higher Voices—Calling toward Holiness—Nearness to Christ—To First Love—An Instructive Call—The Humble Answer—What Christ Sees in Those He Calls.

THE translation into the word "Shulamite" is unhappy; it is unmusical, and misses the meaning. The Hebrew word is a feminine of "Solomon." "Solomon" may stand for the bridegroom's name, and then the well-beloved bride takes her husband's name in a feminine form of it, which is Shulamith, Salome, or perhaps better "Solyma." The King has named His name upon her, and as Caius has his Caiia, so Solomon has his Solyma. He is the Prince of Peace, and she is the Daughter of Peace. Aforetime she was called "the fairest among women," but now she is espoused unto her Lord, and has a fulness of peace. Therefore is she called the Peace-laden, or the Peace-crowned. You know how truly it is so with the justified in Christ Jesus. Because the sound is sweeter, and the sense is clearer, permit me to read the text thus—"Return, return, O Solyma; return, return, that we may look upon thee. What will ye see in Solyma? As it were the company of two armies."

A soul redeemed by blood, and brought by the Holy Spirit into loving, living, lasting union with the Well-Beloved, cannot remain unnoticed. Voices will cry after the bride of Christ. "Return! Return! Return! Return!"

A PILGRIM

bound for the Celestial City cannot go through the world, even through the worst part of it, such as Vanity Fair, without being noticed, and questioned, and sought after, and if possible ensnared. Do not think, thou who hast been made a living man by the quickening of the Holy Ghost, that thou canst glide through this world as the spiritually dead can do, for they may be quietly borne along to the place of corruption; the life within thee is too strange, too operative to be overlooked. Thou art a wonder unto many, and thou mayest well be so, for God hath wrought great marvels in thee and for thee. Oh, saints of God, you are never unobserved; you are compassed about with a great cloud of witnesses, and none of these witnesses are indifferent to you; they all watch you with steady gaze to see how you run your race. The good are intent that you should so run as to obtain; and there are evil ones who long for your defeat. Solyma is addressed by urgent voices, who plead with her to return to them. For good or evil,

MULTITUDES OF TONGUES

cry to her, "Return, return, O Solyma; return, return."

Will you kindly notice from the connection of my text what state Solyma was in when these calls came to her? She was in her glory and beauty. In admiration the question is asked, "Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?" As fire reveals itself, so also will grace. A bundle of lavender proclaims its own whereabouts by its fragrance, and so does the life of God in the soul. You may be sure that if the Lord of Hosts is with you, and in you, you will assuredly arouse the animosity of some, and the admiration of others. I pray that you and I may be in a bright, clear, forcible condition, as the bride was in this part of the Canticle; then shall we be sought after, and inquired about.

It appears that the Church in her beauty had gone down to attend to her work. A diligent life is an attractive life. Do thou, like an ant, work in thy season, carrying thy due burden upon the ant-hill, and if thou doest this for love of Jesus thou doest nobly. Plod on without courting approbation, and rest content to do thine utmost for the common weal. In fellowship with thy Lord humbly do thy day's work in thy day. Seek not great things for thyself. Ask not to rule in the court, but be willing to work in the field; seek not to recline on the couch, but take thy pruning-knife, and go forth among the vines, to fulfil thine office, and in that self-forgetting service thy beauty shall be manifested, and crying, "Return, return."

It appears, too, that while she was thus engaged, she was the subject of a great stir and emotion of heart. Perhaps she had felt dull and dreary till she entered on her work, but while she was busy with her pomegranates and her nuts, she cries, "Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib." She felt that she could hasten like the chariots of a willing people, who rush to the fight from love of their prince. She felt as if she could run after her Beloved; she could leap, she could fly. Like a chariot that is drawn by Pharaoh's swiftest coursers, her spirit left all behind. Thus vigorous and active, she was watched by many eyes, and soon voices coming from the four quarters of the universe, crying, "Return, return, O Shulamith; return, return."

I speak to you who are the beloved of the Lord, to you who labor in holy service, to you who are quickened with a high degree of spiritual life, and feel your souls within you stirred with sacred enthusiasm. You are worth addressing; may the Holy Spirit make my address worthy of your attention! Let us use our text in two ways; may each one be profitable!

First, she hears the lower voices that cry, "Return, return, O Solyma; return, return," and she answers them with most conclusive negatives. Read the text another way, and in the second place, she hears voices from above, which cry, "Return, return, O Solyma; return, return," and she answers them by her actions as well as by her words.

I. Let us listen for a minute or two, but only with our ears, not with our hearts, to

THE LOWER VOICES.

Whence come these voices? There are voices from the vasty deep of sin and hell, voices from the tombs which we have quitted, voices from the Egypt from which we have fled. They are crying evermore, like unquiet ghosts, "Return, return." Especially do they call to young souls, who are newly wedded to Jesus, in the hope that they have not as yet forgotten their own kindred and their father's house. When we have gone a long way in the divine life, the world feels dubious of our return, and almost gives us up, preferring rather to accuse than to invite. After many years of faithful service, and of resolute nonconformity to the world, many temptations which assaulted our youth are unknown to our maturity.

The devil is not altogether a fool, although he is great in that direction; and therefore he does not continue forever to use nets which have failed to entangle the birds. If he finds that cajolery will not ensnare us, he leaves his old tactics and tries other methods. When "Return, return" will not woo us, he puts on his lion form, and roars till the mountains shake. Upon young believers he very commonly uses very powerful inducements to go back. In the hope that he is dealing with Mr. Pliable, he exhibits the hardness of godliness and the pleasantness of sin, and draws the moral that they had better retrace their steps. To them he calls as sweetly as his cruel voice can tone itself, "Return, return, O Shulamith; return, return." By he does this. They say, "You have left us all, we do not know why. You have turned a fanatic; you have joined with gloomy Christian people, and you are not half the good fellow you used to be. Are you not getting a little tired of those dreary ways? Are not the rules of Christ too precise and Puritanic? You were a jolly fellow before you took those blues, and turned so squeamish; come, shake it off, and be yourself again." How winningly they put it! How cleverly they mimic the tones of true friendship! One would think they sought our good, and were anxious to be our guardian angels. Sometimes the desires of nature come to their help, and the tender passion is enlisted on the side of evil. Bright eyes and gentle lips speak to the natural heart, and plead with it to return. The tender love of women has thus played the tempter, and so has the strong affection of men. Courtesy and amiability cry, "Why do you fight so shy of us? See how much more free we are than they; do not live by rule and order; return to the liberty of sin." Thus do her former comrades cry, "Return, return, O Solyma."

THE OLD JOYS

sometimes, in moments of weakness which will come upon us, revive upon the memory, and attempt to mislead us. I have known the young Christian remember what he once thought were joys, and though he has clean left them, and hates them, yet in the distance which lends enchantment he does not notice so much of their shallowness, baseness, and brevity, and he thinks to himself, "In those days I laughed away the hours right merrily; life was light as a feather; in its froth and foam I saw rainbows of delight. Shall I try these things again? Was I not too hasty in renouncing them?" All the while the voices cry enchantingly, like the songs of the Sirens, "Return, return, O Solyma; return, return." They bring out their most melodious music, and omit all discordant passages from the sonnet of life. They would have us hark back to what was once our joy. Oh, brothers, 'tis a wretched temptation, and yet some fall before it.

THE OLD CARES.

Do you not know how the world will even call us back to our old cares? We used to fret and worry until by God's grace we were led to try walking by faith, and then the Lord helped us to rest in His love, and wait patiently for Him, and now perhaps for years we have had no burdens, for we have cast them on the Lord: we have gone in the morning, and told Him the fears of the day, and at night we have had little else to do but to bless Him for the mercy which has averted all those fears. We have lived in sweet content, rich in joyful expectation, and not poor even in present felicity; and now perhaps the world says, "You have spent too much of your money on religion; why did you not save it? Return from generosity to selfishness, from holy zeal to worldliness and prudence. Seek that which all the nations of the world seek after, that which thou canst see with thine eyes, and enjoy with thy mouth." Many are these calls; I need not go into details, you will hear them soon enough. The Sirens are a numerous and ensnaring sisterhood

WHEN DO THESE VOICES COME?

Their sound is heard full often. "Return, return, return, return"—four times over the text hath it. They come so often that the word in the epistle to the Hebrews is more than justified, "And truly, if they had been mindful of that country from whence they came out, they might have had opportunity to have returned." These opportunities come in our way everywhere, and at all times. If you wish to leave off being a Christian, if you wish to follow the world in its pleasures or in its labors, the doors are always open. It is a wonderfully forgiving world if you will but quit your protest against it. If we run away from our old master, and wish to return to his service, his yoke is always ready for our neck; he will never deny us employment, even though it be to feed swine. Only too glad is the devil to pardon runaways. He is not ashamed to return with seven others to the house which he aforetime quitted. Often, often the child of God in his early days hears the entreaties of destroyers, as with all subtlety they plead, "Return, return, O Bride of Solomon; return, return."

At times these voices come from quarters to which our hearts lie open. Many a man hath been wooed from the ways of holiness by her that lay in his bosom. Samson had his Delilah. Oftener still, the professing Christian woman has been solicited to forsake her Lord by him who should have helped her in her noblest aspirations. Children have been misled by parents, friends by friends; for Satan hath many servitors, and many who do his bidding almost unwittingly. It is a fight to reach to heaven, and few there be to help us in it; but the path to hell is downward, and multitudes thrust out their hands to urge us to the infernal deeps. These cries are borne to us by every gale, in tones both loud and gentle, "Return, return."

Notice that our text goes on to say

WHY THEY WISH US TO RETURN.

"Return, return, that we may look upon thee." And is that all? Am I to be a traitor to my Lord, and quit His holy ways, and forfeit heaven, to be made a show of by thee, O Satan? or by thee, O world? Is this a full reward for treachery—"that we may look upon thee?" Why, their looks are daggers. As the eyes of basilisks are the eyes of the ungodly world; as malignant stars that blast the soul. Whenever you long for ungodly men to see your piety, your piety will wither beneath their glance. Trust a wolf at your throat sooner than worldly men in religious matters. They cannot mean you good, nor do you good should they mean it. They will draw you out and then expose you; they will entice you into sin and then report your faults. When the world loves the holy man it is the love of the vulture for the sick lamb. Fear you the worldling, even when he bears you gifts.

Now hear

to her tempters. She says, "What will ye see in Solyma?" Dost thou ask me, O world, to come back and show myself to be thy friend? Listen, O blind world, while we tell you what you would see if we did come to you. "What will ye see in Solyma?" You would see—we grieve to say it—a conflict within us: "As it were the company of two armies." You would see two things in us; and yet neither would give you satisfaction. There is sin in us; but inasmuch as it grieves us to have it there we will not show it you. You would see in us a nature like your own; but it is mortified, kept under, and laid under condemnation. It would give you no great pleasure to see it, for we reckon it to be dead. The dead are poor company. There is in us, it is true, a capacity for all your worldly joys; but the world is crucified to us, and we are crucified unto the world. There is in us a capacity for all your merriment, but our nature that is like your nature is put under restraint, and dies daily, and its expiring groans would be sorry music in your ears. Then, do you know we have another army in us? We have a life beyond you and above you, into which you cannot enter. We are sorry for you that you will not receive the heavenly life which is in Christ Jesus, but as you have it not, we cannot make you our confidants or associates. You would grieve us, and we should provoke you; and therefore we are best apart. You say, "Return, return, O Solyma; return, return, that we may look upon thee," and our only answer must be, "What would ye see in Solyma?" Nothing but that which would rebuke and anger you; you would see a company of two armies, both fighting against you.

Come, young brothers and sisters, you that have been tempted to go back; you cannot even tolerate the thought. You have burned your boats behind you, and must conquer or die. Go back! It were to renounce heaven and all its glories; it were to choose a terrible death-bed, with a guilty conscience ringing the knell of your soul; it were to choose eternal banishment from the presence of God, and from the glory of His power. You cannot return; you cannot even look back. If thou art a true Shulamith, thou wilt not even deliberate for a moment about it, but flinging thyself into the Beloved's arms, thou wilt cry, "Lord, to whom should I go? Thou hast the words of eternal life." God help you so to do, for Jesus' sake. That is the first part of our subject.

II. Now we turn to listen, not with our ears only, but with our hearts too, to the call of which cry, "Return, return." Brethren, to go to heaven, to go to Christ, to go toward holiness, is a return to God's people; for God's people are originally His children. Though they are prodigals, and have gone into a far country, they always were His children; even when they spent their substance in riotous living they were still His sons, and each of them could speak of "My Father's house." To come to Christ, and holiness, and heaven, is to return.

To return, I think, means this—come nearer to Christ, nearer to God, nearer to holiness. You are saved; seek to be like your Saviour. You did enjoy splendid days at first, in the love of your espousals; return to them; walk always in the light as God is in the light. You were once in the banqueting-house, and the banner over you was love: return to that house of fellowship. Every day seek to lose yourself more in Christ, to live more completely in Him, by Him, for Him, with Him. Return, return, to greater heights of holiness, to deeper self-denial, to braver service, to intenser love, to more burning zeal, to more of the Godlike and the Christlike. Return, return. The holiest and that way. Every saint in heaven cries, "Return;" every child of God on earth who is full of the inner life entreats us to return; and chiefly, that dear voice, which once for us cried "My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?" is always calling to us, "return, return." These are the higher voices.

Notice that in the text that word "return" is put four times over. Is it not because it is of the highest importance that every child of God should keep returning, and coming nearer to the Father's house? Is it not because it is our highest joy, our strongest security, our best enrichment, to be always coming to Christ as unto a living stone, and getting into closer fellowship with Him? As He calls four times, is it not a hint that we are slow to come? We ought to come to Jesus not only at His first call, but even at the glances of His eyes, when He looks as though he longed for our love; it ought to be our rapture to think only of Him, and live wholly to Him; but as we fail to answer to first pleas, He cries four times, "Return, return, O Solyma; return, return."

I have shown you why the call is so oft repeated. Do you not think it is a very instructive call? Permit me to put it thus: "Return"—that is, to your first simple faith. If you have risen to greatness of conceit and pride of knowledge, return to your humble thoughts. Shrink to nothing again in the presence of your God. Come to the cross as you came at first, saying:

"I the chief of sinners am,
But Jesus died for me."

I beg you to observe what the spouse has to say to this when she is thus called upon to return to the Lord. The Lord saith to her, "Return, return, that we may look upon thee." Is not that

A REASON FOR COMING BACK?

The Lord says, "That I may look upon thee." He desires your society, and seems gently to hint that you have kept aloof from Him. He seems to say—"You have not been much with me alone lately, you have neglected the reading of the Word, and the hearing of it; I have scarcely seen thy face; therefore return, that I may look upon thee." Cover your face and say, "Lord, why shouldst Thou look on me? I am full of sin;" but then draw near to Him, that His look of love may bring thee to repentance, and cause thy sin to pass away. Remember He hath power in His eyes to look thee into purity and beauty. Come and say, "Look upon me, Lord; search me, try me, and know my ways." Return, that with infinite pity thy Beloved may see what aileth thee, and then with His dear pierced hand may perform a divine surgery upon thee, and make thee well again.

"RETURN, THAT WE MAY LOOK upon thee." I think I may use the phrase to express also that intense satisfaction which Jesus has in every believer. With what pleasure the mother looks upon her child; she remembereth no more the travail for joy that a man is born into the world; but with infinitely greater satisfaction doth Christ see of the travail of His soul in every believer. You ought to show yourselves to Jesus, you have cost Him so much; He has loved you even to the death, and loves you still; you ought to abide with Him. Return to Him that He may look upon you.

Did I hear you bashfully say, "What will ye see in Solyma? If Jesus looks on such a dead dog as I am, what will He see in me? I am so full of evil." He will see in you that which delights Him. He will see His own work there; yea, He will see Himself there. Did you never see the sun reflected in a little splinter of glass? The mirror was scarcely an inch in diameter, yet you saw the heavens in it. Have you never looked upon a bubble blown by a school-boy's pipe, and seen a thousand rainbows in it? When the Lord looks on His people, He sees the reflection of Himself. Be not to your Lord, for He lovingly urges thee to do so. Let your heart and your flesh, like two armies, welcome Him; let all your inward conflict aim at coming nearer to Him. Rest not till, like Jacob's two bands, you are altogether under the blessing of the covenant angel.

I will turn my text about a little, and give you another rendering, which will suit the heart which is welcoming its Lord. Our Mahanaim, our meeting of hosts, shall not be for war, now that the Lord invites us, like Jacob, to return to the land of milk and honey; but the companies shall be as musical as they are martial. There are within our experiences companies of choirs of camps. The text exhibits the warring soul, triumphant in her Lord, and meeting Him with timbrel and harp.

"Spouse of Christ, in arms contending,
Though thy battle-course must run;
Yet with prayers for help ascending,
Shout thy praise for triumphs won."

Oh, if my Lord will come and meet me, He shall see in me whole choirs of songsters! My heart, like Miriam, shall take a timbrel, and all my powers, like the daughters of Israel, shall follow, dancing and singing with glad accord. On the high-sounding cymbals my heart shall play, singing—"His own right hand and His holy arm have gotten Him the victory. Glory! Glory! Where He cometh glory dwelleth." When shall I come into His presence, and behold my God, my exceeding joy? Then will I praise Him with body and soul, with heart and with voice. His coming with all His perfections, and my coming with all my desires, shall make a Mahanaim; and the two hosts, once met, shall encamp together, guarding the King's pavilion, which glitters in the midst. Then shall the warriors become minstrels, and the soldiers shall be singers, as in the valley of Berachah, where all the people triumphed, and they returned to Jerusalem playing upon harps, and psalteries, and trumpets.

Here I leave you in the joyful presence of the King. We cannot cease speaking at a higher point. The Lord keep us in His presence, for His love's sake. Amen.

"THOU SHALT NOT COVET."

MRS. BALFOUR, in her "Plain Thoughts," relates the following incident: "In 1853 I knew a young girl whose great besetment was a love of dress. She looked pale and wretched whenever she saw any one among her companions better dressed than herself. She always lamented she was too poor to buy fine clothes. It happened that her aunt kept a lodging-house at a watering-place, and this girl lived with her as a servant. A lady from a distant city went down to lodge in their house, and on the very night of her arrival she was seized with the worst form of cholera, and died in a few hours. The clothes the lady had on when she was attacked with the disease the doctor ordered should be burned, for fear of infection. There had not previously been a case of cholera in the town, and the authorities were anxious to take very vigorous measures, if possible, to stay the pestilence.

"Now, the lodger had worn a very handsome silk gown. Jane noticed it with covetous eyes when the poor lady came. She heard the order given that the clothes should be burned, to which, of course, the lady's friends made no objection, and Jane's aunt threw out a large bundle from the window into an iron pot in the yard, in which there was some lighted tow. But Jane managed to get away the silk gown. She did not consider that she stole it, because it was condemned to the flames. She coveted it, and yielded to the temptation. Now, some people think that cholera is not infectious, and I cannot venture to say whether it is or not; but I know that no one shared the poor lady's fate but Jane. Ten days elapsed; she took an opportunity to wear that gown when she went to see her mother, and was taken ill with it on, and died after three days' illness, apparently from cholera. 'Thou shalt not covet.'"

THE LOST DRUMMER.

WHEN Napoleon was leading his army across the snowy Alps, the drummer of Macdonald's corps was suddenly shot off by a descending avalanche of snow into a frightful gulf. He must have sunk some hundreds of feet, and yet he still lived. For some hours he kept sounding his drum at intervals, to let it be known he was there and alive in the bottom of that abyss. The roll of the drum as they moved on awoke pangs of desire in his old comrades' hearts; but he was far beyond the reach of their help, and they were obliged to leave him to perish, far from home, friends, and country.

Is it possible a soul may know that it is in a lost state, be deeply affected by this consideration, bewail it, seek to escape from it, and yet perish after all? Quite possible—as possible as that this drummer should perish, in spite of his awful feeling of the gulf around him, and his most earnest advertisement to his fellows of his hourly approaching doom. You may be full of convictions; you may desire, day and night, to be delivered; you may yourself beat the drum, crying day and night for mercy, and you may ask the prayers of others—and yet you may perish.

Conviction is not salvation. Desire is not faith. Seeking is not the same as finding. Knocking is not opening. Sore crying out about your sin is not believing. All this is but the roll of the drum, while you realize the horrors of the crevasse through which you have sunk.

But think what would have saved that poor soldier. He needed some one to descend, or to let down means of rescue. And so you need help like that—One from above to lay hold on your soul. In all real conversion the Holy Spirit does this by sending in the Gospel to the sinner's soul. Has the Gospel of Christ taken a firm grasp of you?—as firm as your convictions—as really as your sense of danger? Has not Christ's glorious work for sinners, finished on Calvary, stirred your soul? Then it seems you are still at the bottom of the abyss. How awfully forlorn! And crying out about your guilt, your corruption, your lost state, will not save you. You must listen with open ear to Christ's cry, "Look unto me" (Isaiah 45 : 22).

THE STONE-BREAKER'S SERMON.

By every rule of the world's philosophy, William Dodd ought to have been a miserable, discontented man. He was very poor, to begin with. Many a man with a brown-stone house and horses and carriages has said he was poor, and when he compared his position with the Vanderbilts and Goulds and Stewarts of the world, he has really believed he was poor. But William Dodd's poverty was a real thing. He had to work hard all day and every day except Sunday, and his wages were very little more than enough to buy necessaries of the most necessary kind. Then he had lost his wife, who had been at his side for twenty years, but whom he had buried now, with many tears, nearly twelve years ago. His sons were gone away to seek their fortunes, and his daughters were married. All had ties of their own, and William seemed to be forgotten. Then, too, he had no pleasures. You never saw William in the grocery sampling the liquors, or with a pack of cards, or playing bowls. His life seemed nothing but work, except, on Sunday. So, being poor, and solitary, and having no pleasure, he ought to have been discontented. But he was not; he was a cheerful, happy man. A brief conversation with the great landowner of the county explains this strange fact.

Mr. Baron, the landowner in question, came upon him one morning as William sat on a mossy bank eating his early dinner beside the heap of stones he was breaking. Mr. Baron was on horseback, and his dog looked up at William, snuffed at his dinner, and appeared to compare it unfavorably with that he had eaten in his kennel that morning. Mr. Baron looked at him almost enviously, for the man's face wore a smiling, contented expression.

"Good-morning, Dodd," he said; "you look happy, as usual. I believe you are happier than many of us who have more to make us happy."

"Like enough, sir," Dodd answered. "The poor have fewer cares."

"You are quite a philosopher, Dodd; you put the whole thing in a nutshell. I should not be surprised if that is the secret. The more one has, the more chances there are of being harassed. But we have one advantage over you, we do not have to worry about what we shall do in old age or sickness. We are provided for; you would have to go to the poorhouse. I wonder that does not trouble you."

"Not a bit, sir. I never look forward to that. Years ago, my old woman and I, we agreed never to look ahead. We just did our duty, the best we knew, and left the future to the Lord. We found it a good plan, sir—saved us a pile of worry."

'Do you think the Lord will look after you in your old age, Dodd? I'm afraid you'll find, as many others have done, you'll end in the poorhouse."

"Well, sir, mebee; I'm not particular. If that's the Lord's way of providing for me, I'm agreeable. I don't despise money; it's a very useful thing, but I can get along as I am."

'I said you were a philosopher, Dodd, and you are proving it. There's many a rich man who could not show the same spirit."

"Ah, sir, it ain't philosophy; leastways, that ain't my name for it. A richer man than any about here found out a long while ago that money and houses and lands were a vexation to the spirit. Something more than that is wanted to make a man happy, and if he has that he'll be happy, whether he is rich or poor. Excuse my saying so much, sir, but you seem as if you envied me, and I tell you my secret gratis."

"Well, call it what you like, Dodd, it is sound philosophy, and your cheerful face proves it is so. I hope it will support you all through. I wish I had it," Mr. Baron added, with a sigh.

"It will support me, sir, I don't doubt, not only all through, but beyond that. Plenty beside me have tried it, and it never failed. Excuse me, sir, but if you wish you had it, why don't you; it's free enough. The Lord takes all who come, rich or poor."

"I cannot answer your question better than in the words of an Authority you will respect. 'How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God.'"

"Then, sir, I'm glad I'm poor, and if you'll take a poor man's advice, I'd say if it's a hard job to you, hows'ever hard it is, I'd tackle it."

It was a rough sermon, and Mr. Baron was not used to such. Nevertheless, he was not offended at Dodd's plainness. He could not help admitting that even if there should be no life beyond the grave—and sometimes he was in doubt about that—the poor laborer had the best of it in this life. "A contented mind is a continual feast," he quoted to himself as he rode on. But even in so quoting he knew he was evading the real issue. His pious mother, whose memory he reverenced, though he had learned to doubt the foundations on which she rested, had taught him when a boy that the words "a contented mind" did not express fully the faith that sustained such men as Dodd. "He is a poor, ignorant fellow," he said to himself; "it is a good thing religion has that effect on such men, or it might be worse for us if they were intent on a more equal distribution of property." But he was in a meditative mood, and he could not help reflecting that Dodd's poverty and ignorance did not discredit the faith. He knew rich men who were Christians, and he knew some who would, he thought, if put to the test, prefer to lose all their property than their faith. He knew learned men, too, who held the faith in quite as high esteem. What was his knowledge compared with that of the president of the college where he studied in his young days! Yet that old man, so profoundly learned, so acute a logician, so keen a disputant, was a firm believer, and he was not a man to hold to a delusion. Strange that a faith like this should attract men so wide apart as that college president and a common day laborer, like Dodd.

"William Dodd sat upon a mossy bank eating his early dinner."

Mr. Baron had much business to attend to that day. He was president of a bank and a director of a railroad, and his time, until night, was fully occupied; but, like a colored thread running through the strands of a rope, the thought of Dodd's sermon was never quite out of his thoughts. As he rode home at night his mind reverted to it. The Holy Spirit had applied the man's rough words to his soul, and he was conscious of a yearning for this simple faith, such as he had never before experienced. Day after day it increased. He was reading the New Testament, which he had not opened for years, except in church, and its sweet simplicity, its penetrating force amazed him as he read with opened eyes. At length the light broke upon him, and like a child he knelt and asked God to accept him and all he had for Jesus' sake. Then, and not until then, his troubled spirit was at peace. It was on a Sunday morning, and as he left the church afterward the words "the peace that passeth understanding" sounded like new music in his soul. "Yes," he said, "it passeth understanding."

The next day he went to the cottage where Dodd lived. He was at his work, the people there told him; but finding where that work was, Mr. Baron soon heard the clink of his hammer on the stones.

"Dodd," said Mr. Baron, "I want you to come and work for me. You understand gardening I can see by your own little plot, and I should like you to come to my place. I have a cottage empty that will suit you."

Dodd looked up, too much surprised to express the astonishment that shone in his eyes.

"You have read about the camel going through the needle's eye, have you not, Dodd?"

"Yes, sir; the Saviour said it was harder than that for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God."

"Yes, it was hard, but I thank God it's not too hard for the man God helps. I have entered, Dodd, and I owe it, under God, to your words that morning. I want to have you near me always, and I want to fulfil God's promise to you as long as you live. You shall never go to the poorhouse, as I told you you would."

There was something like a tear in Dodd's eye as he looked up and said, "Thank God, sir, you will know peace now."

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

An Insulting Gift.

THE reader, who is in the secret, knows why Mr. Waldron welcomed Hester's appeal for assistance so gladly. Having promised his son to help him to win Hester for his wife, he saw in her request an opportunity to render her an important service, which would make her grateful to him and dispose her to grant him the boon he longed for. Mr. Waldron was conscious that he did long for it quite as eagerly as his son did. He wanted to see Robert settled in life, abandoning his idle, vagabond habits, and devoting himself to the duties of a country gentleman, perhaps after a time entering Parliament. Robert was grieving him every day by his apathy, indolence, and carelessness. Perhaps if he married such a pure, good girl as Hester he would amend.

Neither Mr. Waldron nor Robert realized the enormity of Robert's sin. They were well satisfied with the world's rule in such matters. Society has settled with itself that when a wife leaves her husband's home, at the solicitation of a man, and lives in sin with that man, she alone shall bear the punishment. Her betrayer casts her off when his passion is satiated, and returns to his home to find society ready to welcome him, without making any demand upon him for repentance or contrition. He is received into the houses of his friends as if he had done nothing wrong, and ladies who ought to turn from his presence in loathing show no resentment for the wrong he has done their sex. They call him "the naughty breaker of hearts," and speak lightly of his foul crime. For her, the partner in his sin, the victim of his lust, they have no mercy. There is no place of repentance for her, though she seek it carefully and with tears. She is an outcast, and the way to rehabilitation, so easy for him, is for her blocked by insurmountable obstacles. That is the world's way, and Mr. Waldron so far accepted it as to seek to ally to Hester the foul leper, his son, who had manifested no sign of repentance.

He rubbed his hands heartily, looking down upon Hester with a smile of approbation. Already he was thinking of what house would be near enough to Aston Court, where he could bask a little in the freedom and gentleness of her presence whenever he grew slightly weary, as he did sometimes, of his daughter's piety.

"I was very much afraid of coming," said Hester, with a sigh of relief, and raising her eyes to his with a smile that enchanted him. His daughter-in-law promised fair to become his idol.

"Afraid of me!" he repeated, his austere face beaming with pleasure; "whatever could make the poor child afraid of me? Am I so very terrible to you, Hester?"

"Oh, no!" she said; "but you are the greatest man I ever have to speak to; and I don't know anybody else who would have been bold enough to come to you as I have."

"Bold!" cried Mr. Waldron; "she calls herself bold! And asks simply for two hundred pounds! I wish it was two thousand, and you should have it at once. Come, let us go to your father, and set this business to rights. But as for a mortgage on his house, that is all nonsense."

"We must not go to him," said Hester, earnestly; "and he will never consent to take any money from you except upon a mortgage, for which he will pay interest. I know my father, and he will not listen to any other proposal. He would put his affairs into some lawyer's hands immediately."

"But what then does he want me to do?" asked Mr. Waldron, disappointed.

"He has written to you," she answered, "and given a fair statement of his debts. What I want is to ask you to advance any sum of money you think will bring us through our difficulties; though I am sure I don't see how they can end."

She spoke very dejectedly, and Mr. Waldron longed to tell her what a brilliant lot lay at her feet for her acceptance. But he dared not do it yet. He opened John Morley's letter, and read it carefully, seeing from it far more clearly than the writer how complicated his embarrassments were. He determined to avail himself of the new confidence established between him and Hester, in order to advance the happiness of his son.

"I must deliberate over this," he said, "and I shall want you to come up again several times I dare say. You may take the money home with you at once; but still there will be papers to draw up, and I should like to know more about your affairs, as far as your father chooses to confide them to me. You will not dislike coming several times?"

"Oh, I shall like it!" she said, frankly; "I would spare my father any trouble that I could bear for him."

There was a fond and truthful devotion in Hester's manner which penetrated to Mr. Waldron's heart; and a treacherous doubt crossed it as to whether his daughter was really as devoted to him.

"And you are very poor, Hester?" he said.

"Very poor," she answered, gravely.

"You would like to be rich?" he asked.

"Dearly," she answered; "I should like to be as rich as you are, Mr. Waldron. I like a house as large and grand as this, and I think I could spend my money like any lady in the land."

"Like any other lady," he corrected.

"No," she said, "I am no lady. I belong quite to the working-class."

If she belonged to the working-class, Mr. Waldron wished that all the other ladies of his acquaintance, including his daughter, did the same. When the interview came to an end, he insisted upon taking her to see Miss Waldron, and himself conducted her to the breakfast-room, where she still was, though she was alone, Carl having taken his departure. Hester was not sorry to see Miss Waldron, as a new interest centred in her, now that she had to regard her as Carl's possible future wife. She was received with a distant condescension intended to keep her in her place, which Miss Waldron was afraid of her forgetting, since she had been invited to dinner at Aston Court. More than this, there was rankling in her mind a suspicion almost amounting to conviction about Robert's meetings with her in Madame Lawson's garret, in spite of that old lady's denials. Her father also seemed disposed to make too much of John Morley's daughter. It was one of the greatest disadvantages of their denomination that social distinctions were apt to be overlooked among the members of a church. Both Mr. Waldron and Hester seemed to ignore them; and it was high time to set her down a little. At the bottom of all lay a terrible doubt of Carl, who did not go on exactly as she wished, and who had never once set her heart beating by calling her Sophia.

"I am very much occupied with a bazaar," she said, after a freezing salutation; "and I have no doubt you can assist me in the plainer work. I will give you some to take home with you."

"I am afraid I shall have no time," she answered; "though, indeed, I thought of asking you if you could not find me some sewing to do at home. I mean for payment. I shall want a little money soon, and I cannot ask my father for any."

Her thoughts were running on the fresh burden she had added to the charge of their household expenditure. Rose would have all her time unoccupied; and Hester knew well how pacifying it is to a woman's spirit to have woman's work in her fingers. Besides, so far as her strength would permit, it would be only right for Rose to do something toward earning her own living. Hester had grown up in the practical school of poverty; so she asked Miss Waldron for work, and the payment for it, quite naturally, and with no overweening sentimental emotion.

"I intend to ask Mrs. Grant as well," she continued; "but I am afraid she will not have much to give me, as she has all her wedding clothes still unworn. But perhaps she will know of somebody else. I shall want a constant supply," she added, reflectively, "and it will be beautifully done."

To Miss Waldron an acknowledgment and request like these were a confession of immeasurable inferiority. She almost wondered to see Hester comfortably seated in her presence; and she cast a cold, supercilious eye upon her dress, which was plain and worn, but, in some manner, in perfect keeping with the sweet face of the wearer. She answered in a tone of stiff patronage, which marked the vast distance between them.

"I will see what I can do to assist you, Hester Morley," she said; "I have no doubt this is sent for your good, to humble you and prove you. I trust you are profiting by this discipline."

"I hope I am," she replied, simply. "I should be very miserable indeed if I did not believe that God sent all my troubles to do me good in the end. As to being poor, I dare not murmur at that, for Christ was poorer than I am."

Miss Waldron held her peace for a moment, and felt disquieted. If poverty were no inferiority, what advantage had she over Hester?

"You are only a child yet," she said, after a brief pause; "you are but a babe in spiritual things, and must still be fed with milk."

"Do you consider poverty milk for babes?" asked Hester, with a smile.

"I cannot jest upon solemn subjects," answered Miss Waldron, sternly; "but I will see what I can do to assist you, and I will send you a parcel by one of the servants to-morrow. You must excuse me now, for I am very busily engaged."

Thus dismissed, Hester took her leave. Miss Waldron felt happier and more reassured. She had not quite known the extent of John Morley's poverty; but now it had assumed a magnitude sufficient to form an insurmountable barrier between Carl and Hester. Very few young pastors, without private means, could afford the luxury of a portionless wife. But it was quite necessary to make Hester feel her position, for there had been a freedom in her manner which, more than ever, grated upon Miss Waldron's dignity now.

She retired to her dressing-room, and ordered her maid to bring out the summer dresses which she had cast off, with sundry articles no longer suitable for her own wear. The selection she made was not such as to excite the silent resentment and envy of her attendant. They would convey, she thought, a valuable lesson to Hester. To do her justice, she was not in the least aware of the full measure of her impertinence; for to her Hester was still only a young girl, and the daughter of one of their trades people who had solicited her for work. But she was quite willing to humble her and bring down her pride. Having completed her selection, she ordered her maid to make them up into a parcel and to convey them to Miss Morley the next time the carriage drove into Little Aston.

Unfortunately for Miss Waldron, it happened that when the Aston Court coachman handed her parcel out to Hester's little servant, who carried it up-stairs to her small sitting-room, Annie Grant was there, eagerly discussing with Hester how she could find some suitable work for her. They opened Miss Waldron's packet at once, and regarded its contents with astonished and incredulous eyes. Instead of the sewing they expected, they found, first, an old brown terry-velvet bonnet, of a fashion which had prevailed several years before; below that a soiled and tumbled dress of some thin material, and a white muslin pelerine which had been a good deal mended. In addition to this munificent gift there were several scraps of ribbons, some very large old collars, an odd flower or two, and a pair of black silk mittens. A note accompanied them, expressing Miss Waldron's hope that Hester Morley would find these articles of clothing useful to her.

Annie Grant possessed sufficient penetration, and had seen enough of Miss Waldron, not to accord to her quite as unhesitating an admiration as the general public of Little Aston. She was of a quick, fiery disposition, and not at all disposed to submit tamely, either for herself or others to the insolence or assumption of any one. When she saw the tears start to Hester's eyes, and her lips tremble with words she would not speak, her own indignation broke out.

"Never!" she exclaimed; "I never saw or heard or dreamed of such a thing in my whole life! What does the woman mean? How dare she do such a thing? Hester, what is the meaning of it?"

"I asked her for some sewing," said Hester, her lips quivering still, "and she has sent me this."

"Oh," cried Annie, "I only wish she had brought them herself! I wonder how she could venture to do such a thing! But she counted upon you never telling anybody else; upon no one hearing of it."

"I never should," said Hester.

"I am glad I was here," continued Annie; "very glad! I only wish her father and brother knew! Marry Carl, indeed! No, not if she had ten times her money—the mean, insolent, purse-proud creature! Hester, you shall give them to me. It would only aggravate you to keep them in your own sight. Let your girl carry them up to our house at once."

"Don't you think we had better keep it a secret?" asked Hester.

"Keep it a secret!" responded Annie; "I could not keep it. James will know, and Carl. I should like him to hear what his grand friend has done. I shall take them away with me; they don't belong to you, for I suppose you won't keep them as a gift. Just look at them, Hester."

She turned over the things strewed upon the table, with gestures and exclamations of indignant excitement. The insult rankled in her mind the more for the outward composure of Hester's manner. She wished to hear her speak with some of her own vehement resentment; but she was quiet, wounded to the quick, perhaps, but so silent that Annie could not rouse her to utter any words of reproach.

Very shortly Annie went home, followed by the servant bearing Miss Waldron's parcel. She was burning for some opportunity of making manifest her anger to the author of it, and she possessed too little worldly prudence to conceal it upon any ground of expediency. Carl was not at home, nor her husband. She carried the parcel into her own room, and contemplated the contents afresh. A vindictive thought struck her, and she immediately resolved to put it into execution.

Without a moment's pause for consideration, Annie arrayed herself in the cast-off finery which Miss Waldron had selected for conveying a useful lesson to Hester. She put on the shabby and crumpled dress, too short for her, and, in consequence, much too short for Hester, who was taller than either of them. Over that she threw the yellow and darned muslin tippet, with one of the largest collars, which reached to the tip of her shoulders; and she fastened to it the scraps of old ribbon and the odd flowers. Upon her head she placed the long poked bonnet, which almost concealed her face; and then she drew upon her hands the lace mittens. A more singular apparition than her own reflection in her glass had never met her eyes, and she burst into an uncontrollable fit of laughter at the sight of it. The distance between their own house and the park-gates was but short, and she was about to make a call upon Miss Waldron. If either Mr. Waldron or Robert should happen to be present, she would say nothing, and leave Miss Waldron to explain as she could the remarkable figure she presented; but if she should be alone—why then—

Annie sped along quickly toward Aston Court, escaping all observation till she came to the park-gates. Once within them she considered herself safe, and she could walk more quietly. What would she say to Miss Waldron if she found her alone? Annie did not feel as if she should be at any loss for words; but then what would be the end of it? Very likely Miss Waldron for her own sake would keep the secret, but there could never be any cordiality or friendliness between them again. Not that she shrank from this mode of revenge in the least. She could not help laughing out aloud as she imagined Miss Waldron's consternation and chagrin upon recognizing her valuable gift to Hester coming up to view again in so unexpected a manner. Would it not be best to say nothing at all, and leave her dress silently to rebuke and confound the impertinence of the giver? It was possible that it would be the most effectual and the most pardonable mode of reproof.

Her mind was busily discussing the subject, when she saw, not very far off, her husband and Robert Waldron coming to meet her. There was neither time nor a way for retreat. Grant, catching sight of a singular person coming toward him, with a figure and carriage like his wife, arrested his progress for a moment, with an exclamation of doubt and surprise. Robert Waldron, whose sight was longer and keener than his, recognized Annie perfectly.

"It is Mrs. Grant," he said, quickening his steps.

"But what is the matter with her?" asked Grant; "she does not look like herself."

She was so unlike herself, that, as she came nearer, Robert could scarcely restrain the ejaculation of surprise which rose to his lips. Grant did not attempt to restrain his.

"Annie!" he exclaimed, "is it really you? Where are you going to? What in the world has happened to you?"

"I am going to call upon Miss Waldron," she answered, with an hysterical laugh. For an instant a wild doubt crossed her husband's mind as to whether she had not lost possession of her reason; and he looked steadily into her excited face.

"Annie," he said, "what is the matter?"

This simple question was put by him so gravely, that Annie was more and more hysterically affected. He drew her arm into his own, and led the way toward the lodge.

"We had better go in," he said to Robert; "we can get water for her there, and the lodge-keeper will leave us her room for a few minutes."
